A Nihilist Printing-Press has been Discovered in St. Petersburg. The Russian correspondent of the New York Herald telegraphs that a secret printing-press was found on Saturday by the police, and a number of persons supposed to be connected with it were arrested. Further search of the police brought to light a large number of printed proclamations, being the long-expected reply of the nihilists to the Czar's coronation declarations. The proclamations are drawn up in violent language, demanding the distribution of the land to the peasants, and reasserting the nihilistic line of argument.

The Steamer Daphne, which Sank in the Clyde while being launched on July 3d, still remains under water. A number of unsuccessful attempts have been made to raise her. Eighty bodies of persons who lost their lives by the accident have thus far been recovered. An inquiry has been instituted by the government to ascertain the cause of the accident under the direction of the Naval constructor, Sir Edward Reed. The builders of the Daphne testified that she was launched in the usual manner, and that no fear had been entertained of danger. They said the deck on the starboard side had been removed to admit the boiler. Plates, planking and other material were stowed on other parts of the deck.

Alarm about the Cholera is Increasing in Europe. The news from Egypt, as cabled by the correspondent of the Times, is that outbreaks of the disease have occurred at Shebin-el-Kum, Ziftah, and Benhadi. The number of deaths at Damietta has fallen to about thirty-five a day, not because the disease has been mastered, but because the population, by death, flight, and famine, has almost disappeared. The death rate at Mansurah, Menzaleh, and other towns is increasing. The course of the disease still follows the Damietta branch of the Nile, and although occasionally striking some outlying towns like Menz Aleh and Tantah, it returns to the bank of the river. So far the precautions taken by the Egyptian Government have rather aggravated the evil. Many fugitives have succeeded in breaking through the cordon established by Baker Pasha's gendarmerie, and have carried the infection in all directions. The appearance of the disease at Malta has caused great consternation, both on account of the British troops and of the likelihood of the epidemic making its way further west. Damietta, where the plague first appeared, is described by Sir Samuel Baker as "a disgusting example of Oriental neglect and filth accumulation. A long, narrow street runs parallel with the river at the back of the dilapidated houses, which for a distance of a mile rise from the level of the stream. This street is without drainage, and is a miserable channel of communication, deep with poisonous mud after a heavy shower, and full of dust holes emitting germs of pestilence during hot and sultry weather. If cholera can be manufactured there could not be a more elaborate factory."

One of the Irish Assassins who is Implicated in the cowardly murder of Mrs. Smythe has turned informer. The murder was committed in April of last year, but it is only recently that any arrests were made. Patrick Hanlan, one of the men charged with the crime, now offers to make a full confession and to testify against his companions. The crime was of so foul and dastardly a nature that it will be a satisfaction to have its perpetrators brought to justice, even though it is purchased by the escape of one of them. Dennis Field, who was foreman of the jury which convicted Hynes, the murderer, and who was afterward stabbed, is in constant receipt of letters threatening him with injury, and his wife and daughters are often insulted on the street. An attempt was made recently to enter his house, but the marauders fled when Mr. Field fired upon them.

A Very Stringent Law to Secure Purity at Parliamentary elections has been passed by the British House of Commons. It deals not only with actual bribery, but prohibits every form of "undue" influence. It has made a penal offence to offer a voter meat, drink, or entertainment with a view of obtaining his vote. The proposed law also seeks to shield him from every other influence which may warp his judgment. The question of "spiritual intimidation" is also provided for. The bill contains serious penalties against any priest or minister who shall by "spiritual intimidation" influence a voter in casting his vote. This is the latest of several attempts which the House of Commons has made with the same object. In spite of all that has been done, the agents of candidates or persons employed by the agents are busy in a large number of constituencies before an election, and have hitherto been able to evade the law. This is generally done by purchasing from a voter some article in his possession at a price far beyond its value. A candidate often spends a sum worth fifty thousand dollars in the expenses of his election, and if successful he obtains no salary for the performance of his duties.

The Annual Festival of the Spurgeon Orphan ages was this year rendered additionally interesting by the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of a new block of buildings. More than ten thousand persons attended the ceremony. The popularity of the Orphanages is very extensive, owing to their non-sectarian character. Although established and maintained under the auspices of the pastor and congregation of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, the Orphanage is unsectarian, so much so that of the eight hundred and thirty-seven boys and girls who have been admitted since its foundation in 1867, while one hundred and ninety-six were of Baptist parents three hundred and six belonged to the Episcopal Church. Three of the remainder were Roman Catholics. At present there are two hundred and thirty-four lads and one hundred and thirty-one girls in the Orphanage. The selection of children for admission as vacancies occur is vested in the committee, who take the most needy cases, the voting and canvassing system being entirely discarded. The foundation stones of the new extension were laid by Mr. Samuel Morley, M. P., and Mr. James Duncan of Benmore. The estimated cost of the two buildings is $20,750, the bulk of which has been already subscribed. A public meeting was held in the grounds in the evening, Mr. Spurgeon presiding. He announced that he had received that morning nearly $2500 in "love tokens" for the benefit of the Orphanage.

MISS CLARA BARTON,

Superintendent of the Reformatory Prison for Women, at Sherborn, Mass.

Birth and Early Life—School Teaching—Work at Bordentown, N. J.—Clerkship in the Patent Office—First Hospital Work—Services on the Field—The Bureau of Information—Visit to Europe—In the Franco-German War — Her Work of Succor in Paris, Metz and Strasbourg —Trophies of Remembrance.

When, early this year, Gen. B. F. Butler, the Governor of Massachusetts, appointed Miss Clara Barton Superintendent of the Reformatory Prison for Women at Sherborn, Mass., a unanimous verdict of approval was heard from all quarters. It was emphatically, in the time-honored phrase, an appointment fit to be made, and Gov. Butler in making it won the praise of men not usually given to praise that gentleman and his works. To our younger readers, and to others whose sojourn in our land has been brief, this general approval may have been incomprehensible, and therefore as it is well that all who have served humanity and their country well should be known to our citizens, The Christian Herald this week honors itself in presenting its readers with a portrait and brief sketch of the life of this heroic self-sacrificing lady.

EARLY LIFE.

Clara Barton was born at Oxford, Mass., about forty-five years ago. Her father was Captain Stephen Barton, who sat for some time in the Legislature of Massachusetts. Her early education was conducted at home by her elder sisters in the public school of her native place, and was completed by a thorough course of study at Clinton, N. Y. She then commenced work as a school teacher, and took an active interest in the work her brother was then engaged in, of reorganizing the schools of the commonwealth. She subsequently removed to Bordentown, N. J., where she was appointed principal of the first public school established there. On the opening of the school only six pupils presented themselves, but the efficiency, tact, and administrative ability of the young principal were soon recognized, and pupils in large numbers were placed under her care. At the close of the year a new and commodious school had been erected in which six hundred pupils were receiving their education.

Clara Barton's experience as a school teacher closed with that year's labor. One of those afflictions which the world calls "misfortunes" befell her. The Christian who watches the workings of God's providence seldom or never speaks of "misfortune," knowing well that all things work together for good to those who love God. It was so in this case. A crisis was approaching in the national life in which Clara Barton was destined to take part, and God was in this way removing her from the work she was performing to a place where her mission would open out before her. She was not only to be prepared for her work, but to be brought to that work.

REMOVAL TO WASHINGTON.

A painful affection of the throat affected Clara Barton's voice. She was unable to perform her school duties, and she resigned. What course of life she would adopt she did not know, but a brief period of rest after her arduous labors at Bordentown was in any case indispensable, and she therefore travelled about a little, hoping that change of air and scene might reinvigorate her. In the course of her wanderings she visited Washington, D. C., and there made the acquaintance of Judge Charles Mason, who at that time held the position of Commissioner of Patents. Judge Mason was impressed with Miss Barton's intelligence and her acquirements, and finding that she was without occupation invited her to become a clerk in the Patent Office. After some consideration she accepted, and for some time efficiently discharged the duties of the position.

FIRST HOSPITAL WORK.

She was so occupied when in 1861 the call for volunteers was issued by President Lincoln. A Massachusetts regiment, of which many of the members came from her native place, were marching to Washington, and while passing through Baltimore had been assailed by Southern sympathizers. Some of them were killed and others seriously wounded. Miss Barton was one of the first to hear the news, and she promptly hurried to the depot to meet the train conveying the injured men. Forty of the poor fellows, faint and suffering, arrived, and were carried to the Infirmary on Judiciary Square. Thither Miss Barton went, and obtained permission to assist in nursing them. Other troops arrived, and soon Washington was the centre about which all the military stir and movement circled. Then came battles, and the wounded in large numbers were carried into Washington to slowly recover or to die.

Miss Barton had found her mission; she resigned her place in the Patent Office, and devoted her entire attention to the hospitals. As the corps of brave women who offered themselves for the noble work increased, Miss Barton had better opportunities for surveying the service in all its details. Her mind is of that order which distinguishes the leader and organizer of others. Quick to see defects in a system, prompt to remedy them, and profoundly convinced of the value of order in all service, she studied this department of warfare as a general studies the disposition of his troops on a battle-field. The first circumstance that impressed her in this study was the faint and exhausted condition of the wounded when they arrived at the hospitals. It was no uncommon occurrence for men to die of wounds that were not fatal. Exhaustion and neglect frequently brought the wounded into a state in which surgical skill was powerless to save them. The springs of life failed them before the hospital gate was reached. Miss Barton noticed this, and took the

in her path of mercy. She hired a vehicle which she filled with dressing and medical supplies at her own cost. With this she haunted the wharves of the city, driving from one to another as she heard of the arrival of the wounded. There she singled out such cases as seemed to her in urgent need of immediate attention, and these she cared for on the wharf or on the vessel. Many a wounded man almost dying, her prompt assistance recalled from the verge of the grave, and enabled to bear the ordeal awaiting him in the hospital.

NEARER TO THE FIELD.

The wisdom of this early attention to the wounded was proved, and Miss Barton proposed to follow the principle. The Battle of Cedar Mountain was fought August 9th, 1862, and news came that Culpepper Court House was crowded with the wounded waiting for transportation to the hospitals. Miss Barton knew what lives a kind and skilful lady might save were she there, and she went to Surgeon-General Hammond and applied for a pass. It was readily given to her, and then Miss Barton with her ambulance laden with her own stores, purchased from her slender savings, travelled to the Court House. The good she did there, the heartfelt welcome she received filled her with gratitude to God, and henceforward wherever there was a battle within her reach she ascertained where the wounded were, and there she went to succor them.

AT THE FRONT.

The 24th of September, 1862, found her, armed with a pass, in her wagon, surrounded with lint and medical appliances, entering the camp of Burnside's corps in Maryland. She found that a battle was expected, and she took up her quarters in a farmhouse, and there after the battle opened attended to the wounded as they were brought in, and gave them such help as was necessary to support them until the surgeons could dress their wounds. On the night of the battle, too, it was found that the army was entirely without lanterns or candles, and it was feared that the wounded on the field must lie unaided until dawn. But Miss Barton's plan had comprised that detail, and from her wagon came the thirty lanterns with which the search was carried on for the wounded men. Her forethought and her untiring exertions were reported at headquarters, and Col. Rucker, of the quartermaster's department, gave orders that for the future Miss Barton's expenditures should cease, and that her orders for mules, ambulances, and surgical appliances were to be promptly honored by the department.

"It was in this way," says Mr. Samuel G. Arnold, in his articles on the Red Cross Societies, "that she was in the field at Cedar Mountain, Chantilly, the second battle of Bull's Run, Fredericksburg, Falmouth, and the various battles of the Wilderness. She was for eight months with the army in front of Charleston, and was present at the fearful night assault on Fort Wagner, where, it was generally believed in the army, her assiduous attentions saved the life of Col. Leggett after the loss of his leg in the trenches. She left the army of the south and spent several months in the Army of the James, at the invitation of Gen. Butler, and returned thence to Washington at the close of the war." During her work she was constantly in danger from fever and even from the incidents of war. More than once she returned from the field of slaughter with her dress pierced by a bullet, or torn by the fragment of a shell, but she was mercifully preserved from death and wounds.

THE BUREAU OF INFORMATION

was a beneficent institution, which had its origin in Miss Barton's fertile mind. Mr. Arnold thus describes its organization: "She was greatly impressed with the number of those who, having friends or relatives in the army, were unable to get any traces of them, living or dead. Letters of inquiry addressed to senators or other distinguished persons, and handed over to officers of the army, generally failed to bring any satisfactory reply, for the obvious reason that there was no person in the army whose business it was to look up the desired information. Miss Barton, on discovering the deficiency, returned to Washington and, seeking an interview with the President, laid before him the great needs of the service in this particular, and said that if proper notice could be given to the country she would undertake the duty of answering these inquiries. The President took her at her word and, on the instant, took his pen and wrote a little note addressed to 'The People of the United States,' simply stating that Miss Clara Barton had volunteered to answer all inquiries respecting lost soldiers, and that she could be addressed at Annapolis, Md. This was signed, and published in the Washington Chronicle. In the next four days she received four hundred letters, and they soon increased to many thousands." Congress subsequently recognized the value of the Bureau by unanimously voting in both Houses the sum of $15,000 to recoup Miss Barton the expenses she had incurred, and enable her to complete her work.

At last came the close of that sad and terrible struggle, and Miss Barton's work of love and devotion was over. The strain on body and mind had been intense, the griefs she had sympathized with, the suffering sorrow and death, she had witnessed had all told on her sensitive and delicate soul. She was worn out, and after vainly seeking recuperation at home she was advised to try a sea voyage. She sailed for Europe in 1869, and by the advice of her physicians settled in Switzerland.

Again was the hand of God recognized in Miss Barton's life. Her sickness was the finger of Providence pointing to further service for SUFFERING SOLDIERS IN EUROPE.

Seven months after her arrival in Switzerland the armies of France and Germany commenced their march to the frontier. The European Societies of the Red Cross had heard of Miss Barton's devotion in her own land, and sought the aid of her valuable experience. To their surprise they found her on the sphere of action.

Church of God was established on the foundation laid in Christ Jesus, and although the Church has grown and extended, indwelt by the Divine, a habitation of God in the Spirit, yet having regard to her high vocation, exalted position, and consequent responsibilities, the Church has failed to recognize and fulfil the claims of Him who bought her with His own blood.

Thus, regarded from the human standpoint, all is failure. Man has failed, Israel has failed, the Church has failed. But have God's purposes failed? Assuredly not.

HAS TRUTH FAILED?

Have the promises failed? Will the sure word of prophecy fail? Will the hopes and aspirations of the faithful followers of the Lord be frustrated? Will man be left to sin perpetually in defiant disobedience to God? Will Israel be cast off forever in wicked rejection of her true Messiah? Will the Church always be the poor, feeble, disunited body she now is? Most assuredly not. God forbid! Man, redeemed, resurrected, and glorified, will yet come up to the ideal of the Divine and perfect standard. Israel, restored, converted, saved, will yet accomplish all the Divine purposes and plans. The Church, one with her risen Lord, will yet fulfil her high and exalted destiny, and, in loving obedience to her great Head, will continue ceaselessly to make known the manifold wisdom of God, according to the eternal purpose which He purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord.

Thus much for glowing introduction to the solemn, deliberate, and spirit-stirring statement of the Apostle Paul: "For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?" (Rom. 11 : 15). It will be useful to look a little at the context, and to connect this fifteenth verse with portions of the verses 1, 2, 11, 12, 25, and 26 of this eleventh chapter of the Epistle to the Romans. "I say, then, Hath God cast away His people? God forbid. God hath not cast away His people which He foreknew. I say, then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid; but rather, through their fall, salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy. Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their fulness? For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead? Blindness in part is happened to Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved, as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob."

Now, linking these passages of Scripture with all the previous Divine declarations concerning Israel, beginning with the threefold promise to Abraham elaborated through the ages, the Hebrew nation rising to its height in the early days of Solomon, and then, at first gradually, but afterward rapidly, declining, until the dispersion and utter breaking up of the nation and policy, we shall assuredly see that the Divine plan has been steadily pursued throughout.

GOD HAS NOT BEEN FOILED;

Satan has not really triumphed; the purposes of Jehovah have not been frustrated. For observe, when Adam failed in Eden, the promise of deliverance came, as recorded in Gen. 3 : 15; when the antediluvian generation failed, Noah and his family were taken into the ark; when the sons of Jacob failed, then God sent Joseph before them to preserve life; when Pharaoh thought to kill all the male children of the house of Israel, then the babe Moses was preserved alive; when the Hebrew monarch Saul failed, then was David anointed to be king over Israel; when Nebuchadnezzar burned the house of God, broke down the wall of Jerusalem, slew young and old, and carried away the remnant to Babylon for a seventy years' captivity, at the end of that period the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus to make a proclamation for the captives to return to Jerusalem to rebuild the Temple.

And when the last and final overthrow came, and the Roman nation, with its martial prowess, burned, destroyed, and utterly uprooted and dispersed the nation, then came the time and opportunity for God to extend the riches of His grace to the Gentiles. The Word was made flesh, the Lord Jesus poured out His soul unto death, and the door of mercy and reconciliation was opened wide. Israel is rejected, but not cast away; Israel is fallen, diminished, it is true, but there is to be

FULNESS HEREAFTER.

The branches are broken off because of unbelief, but they shall be graffed in again, for God is able to do so. Jerusalem is trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled. Blindness (or hardness) in part is happened unto Israel until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. But all Israel shall be saved; there shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and saved Israel shall be the heralds of salvation to the world at large; they shall declare God's glory among the Gentiles, and the healing of the nations shall be as life from the dead. "Oh, the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out!"

The receiving of Israel to the Divine favor and love, with all that it involves—conversion, salvation—is as clearly revealed in the Word of God as the scattering and dispersion. This may be more difficult to realize, because the scattering of the nation is before our very eyes; but God's Word is true, His promises are sure, He will not fail, "for He is faithful that promised," "who also will do it." The dealings of Jehovah with Israel, under the similitude of the marriage relationship, as enunciated by the prophets, forcibly and beautifully set forth the Divine purposes in the future. Jehovah proclaimed Himself as a Husband to the house of Israel and the house of Judah; but the wife was unfaithful, she went after other lovers, she was divorced from her Divine Husband, and, instead of repenting, she played the harlot, and a degenerate progeny was the result. But the love of Jehovah is unchanged, and the time comes when Israel repents, returns with weeping and supplication, and once more becomes manifestly the beloved of the Lord, the faithful wife.

It is important to distinguish between the restoration and the conversion of the Jews. The restoration takes place in unbelief, the Messiah being still rejected and unacknowledged. The conversion is a true turning to the Lord, looking on Him whom they have pierced. It may be regarded in the twofold aspect of individual conversion, the "remnant according to the election of grace," and when "Israel shall be saved in the Lord with an everlasting salvation." It is to this latter the apostle refers in Rom. 11 : 15, the passage under consideration. The promises and predictions in God's Word concerning the restoration and conversion of Israel are most distinct and emphatic: Jer. 31 : 10; 30 : 3; Ezek. 39 : 28; Amos. 9 : 15; Hosea 3 : 5; Jer. 1 : 4, 5; Zech. 12 : 10; 13 : 9; Rom. 11 : 26, 27; Rev. 1 : 7.

Now the result of this wondrous restoration and return on the part of Israel to her lawful King, Lawgiver, Husband, and her acknowledgment of Him who is the true Messiah, even the Lord Jesus Christ, is glorious in the extreme. The effects thereof will be so deep and widespread, the blessings to the nations of the earth so vast, the moral influence upon the waste places so genial and beneficial, such and solitary places, such an abundant blossoming of the rose, such an opening of the eyes of the blind, an unstopping of the ears of the deaf, a leaping of the lame, a singing of the dumb—so full shall the earth be of the knowledge of the Lord when the Light of Israel is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon her, Gentiles and kings coming to the brightness thereof—that the apostle, fertile though he be in descriptive power finding no language adequately to describe in prosaic words all the fulness of blessing, breaks forth into a metaphor as bold as it is beautiful and expressive—"life from the dead." It is, indeed, a counterpart of Ezekiel's vision, "in the midst of the valley which was full of bones; and, lo, they were very dry." But when he prophesied as commanded, the breath came into the slain, and they lived, and stood up upon their feet, an exceeding great army.

A MORAL RESURRECTION,

Oh, the blessedness of

and kingdom, when Antichrist and all his followers are utterly destroyed, and Satan is bound for the thousand years, deceiving the nations no more; when out of Zion goes forth the law, and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem, when the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it! Oh, the happy, glorious Millennial period, when the grand temple for Jehovah's worship, as delineated by Ezekiel, shall be erected on Zion's highest hill-top, when the holy city, the new Jerusalem, shall have come down from God out of heaven, with the glory of God to lighten it, and the Lamb the light thereof; when the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it, the typical meaning of Jacob's ladder of inter-communication being fully understood, and heaven and earth in happy, loving accord!

Then indeed shall be fulfilled to the very letter those glorious predictions familiar to many, but so often misquoted and misapplied: "And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." "Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders; but thou shalt call thy walls Salvation, and thy gates Praise. The sun shall be no more thy light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee, but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory. The sun shall no more go down, neither shall thy moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended."

Christian brethren, in view of all these glowing predictions and wondrous realities of the near and remoter future, with all the present personal responsibilities involved therein, let us not sleep as do others. Let us watch unceasingly, lest the Master of the house, coming suddenly, find us sleeping. Let us be constantly looking for the blessed hope and the appearance of the glory, resting in the Lord, waiting patiently for Him and occupying till He come. What for the Master is there presented to the loyal and obedient servant of the great King in these wonderful promises to the overcomers, all of which have reference to the glorious future! The very contemplation of these honors and rewards is almost too much for mortal beings; what will the realization be? Oh, for more singleness of eye and heart, more zeal, devotedness and love! Oh, to be entirely separated from the world, wholly detached from its frivolities, vanities, and pleasures, and to be entirely and forever the Lord's in spirit, soul, and body, His absolutely, fully and forever, waiting and watching, praying and working, in the daily expectation of the advent of Him who has said, "Behold, I come quickly, and My reward is with Me, to render to each man according as his work is."

"He which testifieth these things saith, Yea, I come quickly."

Christian brethren, let it be ours to say, "Amen; come, Lord Jesus."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The General Strike of Telegraph Operators, which commenced on July 19th, has already caused serious inconvenience to the public, and considerable loss to merchants, brokers, and the business portion of the community. The operators have for some time complained that they were subject to unjust reductions of pay and to many grievances. During the past ten years they say their position has been gradually becoming worse. Last week the committee of "the Telegraphers' Brotherhood," which had been appointed to represent the operators in the matter, presented to the companies a statement of grievances, and a respectful petition for their redress. They asked that the wages of all operators should be increased fifteen per cent, and the number of working hours reduced from nine hours in the day to eight, and from eight in the night to seven. This proposal the companies refused to entertain, and it is stated that to have complied with it, would have cost the Western Union Company alone, one million and a half dollars a year. The operators allege that opportunities were then given the companies for amicable negotiation, mutual concession, and peaceful arrangement of the difficulty, but they were all arrogantly rejected. Then the operators resolved on a strike. The signal was given at noon, Washington time, in the offices of all the leading cities of the Union, and the bulk of the operators closed their instruments and left the buildings. In the Western Union Company's building in New York, there were four hundred and fifty operators engaged, when the representative of the Brotherhood rose from his instrument at noon and gave the preconcerted signal by blowing a shrill whistle. In a few minutes only fifty persons, chiefly females, remained at work. The companies closed many of their branch offices, and would not accept any message unless the sender gave a written admission that he sent it subject to delay or to mailing en route, if necessary. The result was almost a paralysis of business, and a heavy loss to business men. Public sympathy, with a few unimportant or interested exceptions, is with the operators, and the general impression of the dispute appears to be that the Western Union Company especially, in making strenuous efforts to pay dividends on its watered stock, has not adequately paid its employés. The dispute between the companies and the operators is not, however, so much a matter of public concern as the relations of the companies to the public. The companies have been given a valuable franchise, they have disfigured and obstructed the streets with their poles and wires, and it is imperative that they render in return the service agreed upon. There is a steadily increasing opinion that if through greed, arrogance or any other cause they have disgusted their employés, and have in that, or any other way, incapacitated themselves for fulfilling their contracts, the opportunity should be seized by the government for the public good. In England, the telegraphs are operated by the Postal Department, and the benefit to the public and the government from the arrangement has been enormous. If the present disorganization of the service continues, there will be a loud popular demand that the same system be tried here.

The Presidential Preferences of the Two great political parties are being discussed by the press on both sides. Last week the New York Times published the result of a thorough investigation on the subject it had made in all the States. Two months ago it addressed inquiries to men in each of the thirty-eight States, requesting them to ascertain from the people, not the political workers, whom they would prefer for presidential nominee in 1884. The answers to this question number 344. From this informal poll it appears that of the 344 places from which answers came, Mr. Blaine is the choice of the Republicans in 103, President Arthur of 64, and Senator Edmunds of 57. The Democratic choice in the same places is Mr. S. J. Tilden in 120, McDonald in 72, Senator Bayard in 31. The number of names mentioned by Republicans is 42, and of Democrats 40.

The Star Route Frauds are to be Submitted to the courts in a new form, according to a Washington despatch. It states that the papers have been prepared upon which suits will be ordered by the Postmaster-General during the coming week to recover moneys paid out for expedited mail service and procured by the contractors to be sued, by false and fraudulent representations. It is known that the Postmaster-General has given these civil suits a good deal of attention, and that it was in consequence of that attention that Mr. Bliss was not permitted to "arbitrate" or "compromise" one of the cases upon which an amicable settlement had been proposed. It is the impression in the Post-Office Department that the civil suits, if tried with anything like ordinary skill and earnestness on behalf of the Government, must result in the recovery of large sums of money.

Dr. Walter C. Palmer, the Well-Known Advocate of the doctrine of perfect holiness, died suddenly on Friday evening last at Ocean Grove, N. J. He had commenced the series of daily meetings he has held there every summer since 1875, but had to absent himself from them during the past two weeks and return to New York, owing to a severe attack of dysentery. He returned to Ocean Grove on Thursday, and appeared to be completely recovered. On Friday evening he wrote a letter, and afterward sat on the piazza of his house enjoying the cool breeze. Suddenly he placed his hand on his heart, and calling to Mrs. Palmer he sank backward and died almost instantly. He had for many years suffered from a disease of the heart, and had expected that his end would be sudden. Dr. Palmer was nearly eighty years old, having been born in 1804. He studied in the New York College of Physicians, and graduated in 1825. He soon worked up a lucrative practice, which he finally relinquished in 1858. Since that year his time has been devoted to the promotion of the holiness doctrine by meetings in his own house and in the press. In 1859 Dr. and Mrs. Phœbe Palmer visited Europe, where they spent four years, holding religious meetings in the great cities. Mrs. Palmer died in 1874, and shortly afterward Dr. Palmer married her sister, who has enthusiastically assisted him in the special department of Christian work with which he has been identified for half a century.

The Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., the eminent pastor of the Church of the Strangers in New York, inaugurated three years ago the American Institute of Christian Philosophy, with the object of proving, more especially for the benefit of educated young men, that religion and philosophy were not antagonistic. The effort has been extensively blessed of God, and the Institute has prospered. Dr. Deems requests us to inform our readers that a Summer School of the Institute will be held at Atlantic Highlands, N. J., beginning Thursday, August 2d. It will continue six days. On Sunday, the Rev. Dr. Burr, author of "Pater Mundi," will preach. The following is the syllabus of lectures: Thursday, August 2d, Lyman Abbott, D.D., editor of the Christian Union, "The Theology of St, Paul;" Friday, August 3d, J. B. Thomas, D.D., Brooklyn, N. Y., "Darwin, Emerson, and the Gospel;" Saturday, August 4th, Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., Anniversary Address before the Annual Meeting of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy; Monday, August 6th, E. F. Burr, D.D., Lyme, Conn., "Certain Insignia of Organic Species;" Tuesday, August 7th, Rev. A. H. Bradford, Montclair, N. J., "Hereditary Environment and Religion." The Rev. Dr. Deems will preside. The prospect now is that this will be more successful than any previous summer school of this prosperous Institute of Philosophy.

The Sunday Closing Law in Kansas City, Mo., with the high license law for the other days of the week, has effected a remarkable change in the city. On Sunday, July 15th, the bars remained closed in obedience to the requirements of the new law. In the central part of the city only one shop kept open in defiance of the laws. The tobacco stores and other lines of business generally, except drug stores, were also closed. Only three arrests for drunkenness were made, the usual Sunday average being about twenty-nine. No arrests were made for violation of the law, but the police were instructed to report the names of all offenders. The gardens were open, but sold no beer.

An Effort to Thwart the Policy of the New Mayor of Chicago is being made by the Temperance party in the city. Mayor Harrison was elected chiefly by the votes of the liquor interest, and his rulings have hitherto testified his gratitude. A Chicago journal now states that the Citizens' League has instituted test suits, which will not only try the legality of the mayor's nullification ordinance, but will involve the legality of the manner in which he has been issuing licenses. The League has presented its case in a strong and thorough manner, and no point has been left uncovered. Every question bearing upon the validity of his ordinance and licenses has been guarded, and a long and interesting struggle may be anticipated, as both sides have enlisted for the war.

The Revival Services in Kansas City, Mo., conducted by the Rev. Thomas Harrison, have been signally blessed. Immediately after the meetings began, there was a remarkable interest manifested. They continued, with undiminished spirit and success, for six weeks. During this time the altar was thronged with penitents every night. As a result of the services, two hundred and eighty persons have united with the Church on probation and by letter, though the conversions are far more numerous, many persons having connected themselves with other churches in the city. There are twenty-six entire families who have been converted, and are now probationers in the Church. Mr. Harrison is now holding a camp-meeting at Jacksonville, Ill.

A Narrow Escape from a Horrible Death was experienced by an aged man on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad recently. He was attempting to cross a bridge near Moundsville, W. Va., in front of an approaching train. He might possibly have succeeded if he had been able to keep his footing as he ran over the slippery ties, but in the middle of the bidge he fell, and when he got up and looked around, the train was almost upon him. In an instant he decided that his only chance of escape was to lie flat upon the ends of the ties, and he promptly took that position. But there was not room enough, and the cow-catcher struck him. Instead, however, of killing him at a blow or pushing him upon the track to be crushed by the wheels, it threw him down upon a cross beam several feet below the rails, where he clung until the train had passed. The train was stopped as soon as possible, and a brakeman going back found the old man sick from fright but uninjured. The folly of attempting to outrun a train on a narrow bridge is one of which few would be guilty. It is, however, far less dangerous than that displayed by those who with death close upon them continue to walk the slippery path of life, postponing from day to day the duty of seeking their soul's salvation (Isa. 55 : 6).

A Romantic Wedding on a Bridge was Solemnized at Harper's Ferry, W. Va., on July 12th. The passengers at the railroad depot on that evening observed a procession marching from the West Virginia side across the bridge that connects that State with Maryland. The procession was headed by the best man, who carried a lantern in his hand and guided the bridal couple, who followed, while a venerable clergyman was in the rear. The party proceeded until they were certain that they had reached a spot on the bridge that was in the State of Maryland, when they halted and grouped themselves preparatory for the marriage ceremony. The scene was not only an unusual one, but picturesque. The starry sky looked down on the nuptials, and for music the murmur of the water below the bridge, rippling melodiously as it danced over moss-covered stones, made a good substitute for a Strauss's wedding march. The ceremony completed, the party again proceeded to West Virginia. It is not stated in the account of the marriage what was the motive of the party in selecting that spot for the wedding, but the bride and bridegroom in recalling the ceremony in after years may reflect that as they commenced their married life by crossing the bridge from the State they merely visited to another State which was to be their permanent home, so they may commence their spiritual life by crossing the bridge Christ laid down by His life and death to their eternal home in the heavens (Eph. 2 : 18).

A Singularly Inappropriate Prayer was offered in a church in a city of Massachusetts on a recent Sunday. It is the custom in that church for any of its members who may be in need of special prayer to send a note to the minister when he is in the pulpit. On this occasion a minister from another city was conducting the service instead of the regular minister of the church. On opening the Bible he found therein a note asking for the prayers of the brethren. The minister after reading it announced to the congregation that Mr. A. requested the prayers and sympathy of the congregation in the sudden death of his loved wife, and in the prayer that followed he offered up a fervent petition for "the brother sitting lonely and desolate in his pew." He noticed a movement in the congregation that almost amounted to a panic, and to his consternation he afterward learned that the note had been shut up in the Bible a year, and that Mr. A. was no longer desolate, but had married again, and was actually sitting, when the prayer was offered, with his new wife for the first time in the pew. That minister will, doubtless, be careful in future how he acts upon notes when he is in a strange church. The bridegroom had no need for shame in thus being reminded that a year before, he desired a certain prayer offered for him. There are many men, however, who if reminded of prayers offered in the past would be ashamed as they remembered the vows they had then made which were afterward broken (Deut. 23 : 21).

A Lady's Life Saved by a Cow, is the Subject of a remarkable narrative published in a Mississippi journal. It states that a lady residing at Vicksburg, the wife of a farmer, was walking alone a few days ago near a pond in a pasture, about a hundred yards from the house. She was passing near a cow which had a very young calf, when the animal made a plunge at her, caught her on its horns, and tossed her into the pond, then, jumping in, gored her again while in the water, and trampled on her with its feet. Another milch cow ran from a distance of sixty yards and drove the infuriated beast away, and stood guard over the prostrate form of the lady until aid came. Only for this it is believed she would have been killed. It is remarkable that the lady should have been saved by an animal of the same kind as that which threatened her life. It is so in spiritual affairs. While Satan employs men as his agents in overthrowing souls, God uses men to thwart them. And as in this case of the imperilled lady, the best thing we can do is not to attempt to save them ourselves, but to wait with them until aid comes from One mighty to save (Acts 3 : 12, 16).

A County Attorney has been Severely Rebuked by the Governor of Kansas. It appears that the attorney had applied to the Governor for the pardon of a criminal whom he had himself officially prosecuted and convicted of larceny. The Governor in his letter to the attorney tersely and truly tells him that if the party was innocent he should have seen to it that he was not wrongfully convicted, and that if he was guilty it is improper for him now to appear in the rôle of an attorney for the criminal. The Governor adds, moreover, that the ex-attorney by now becoming an advocate for the criminal has destroyed the only proper source to which he (the Governor) could have applied for information as to the propriety of granting the pardon asked. It would appear that the prisoner has injured his chances of pardon by employing an advocate whom he probably regarded as the most influential he could select. No such difficulty could ever arise in the position of the sinner and his Advocate with a justly offended God. The sinner could have no advocate so influential as the Son of God who, while admitting the guilt of the sinner, can plead His own atonement for that guilt (1 John 2 : 1, 2).

The Misplaced Switch, Responsible for Innumerable railroad disasters, is likely to be abolished, if an invention described in a Connecticut journal is all the inventor claims for it. A switch has been invented by a section master at New London which has no frog. By his invention the main line of track is made continuous, and the switching is done by moving the side rails up to the main line, which they overlap with a lip, and as they are slightly higher, easily take a train off. The ends of the side track are set upon a hinge or pivot, and are held in place by a strong spring, which will yield only to the flange of the wheels of a train passing on the main line. Hence, if the switch is left on, the rapidly passing train in the opposite direction does not shoot off the track, but keeps the line, the side track yielding automatically as the train passes. It is stated that this new safety switch has been tried and found to work perfectly. If that is true, we may hope that the safety of railroad travelling will be increased, for it is at the switches that the majority of accidents occur. It could be wished that some such safeguard could be introduced for the benefit of those whom we hope are travelling heavenward. Young people who seem not far from the kingdom of God go from country homes to great cities, and are often there switched off the track by temptation, and fall into eternal disaster. Only by unceasing prayer and constant watchfulness can they be preserved (Prov. 4 : 25-27).

THE WORKS OF THE DEVIL DESTROYED.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil."—1 JOHN 3 : 8.

A Sharp Distinction—Only Two Classes of Men—How to Distinguish Them—The Betweenites—I. The Works of the Devil—Sin—A Word of Detestation—A Word of Distinction—Of Descent—The Devil's Own Account—Of Description—II. The Purpose of God—To Destroy the Works of the Devil—A Divine Work—Complete and Conclusive—III. How it will be Done—By the Manifestation of Christ—In Life and Death—IV. The Experience of it—The Process in the Soul—The Brightest Saints Tempted—The Ultimate Abolition of Sin.

IN this chapter John makes a sharp and clear division of mankind into two classes. He gives not even the slightest hint that there is, or ever was, or ever can be a third class; but he describes men as being the children of God or else the children of the devil, and tells us how the two classes are made manifest (see verse 10). Now, this distinction would not have been drawn by John so sharply if it had not existed; for he was a man of most loving heart and gentle spirit, and if he could somewhere or other have found a space for neutrals, or what I call or people who come midway between saints and sinners, I am sure he would have done it. No one could suspect John of want of charity, and therefore as he was convinced that no middle position was possible, we may be quite clear upon that point, and at once dismiss every theory which is meant to flatter the undecided.

At this day the world is still divided into children of God and children of the evil one. This distinction ought never to be forgotten; and yet thousands of sermons are preached in which it is quite ignored, and congregations are commonly addressed as if they were all the people of God. How shall we preach the truth if we begin by assuming a lie? Yet to assume that all our hearers are Christians is to begin with an error. Is it not highly probable that men will be built up in falsehood if the very truth which is addressed to them is put in a false way? No, my hearers, we cannot talk to you as all the people of God, for you are not; some of you are the children of the wicked one, and though it may not be pleasant to be told so, yet it is no business of ours to please you. Our duty is to preach so as to please God and benefit the souls of men, and that can only be effected by an honest enunciation of matters of fact.

This important distinction ought to be observed in public prayer; and this is a point in which we are dissatisfied with most liturgies, because they are necessarily composed with the view of suiting both saints and sinners, and, as a necessary result, they are not suitable for either. The joyous notes of confidence which are becoming in the children of God are left out because the ungodly could not use such expressions of exultant faith; while, on the other hand, the wailing notes which are most suitable to anxious souls are put into the mouths of men who by the grace of God have long ago found their Saviour.

If this distinction is to be thought of in preaching and in public prayer, it should be specially considered in our personal religion. We ought to know whose we are and whom we serve. We ought to know the differences which the Lord has made by grace, and whether or not He has made us to differ from the unrenewed. Every man in trade wishes to be sure of his position, whether he is prospering or not; and surely we ought each one to know our position in that one great enterprise of life which if it finds us bankrupt at the last must leave us so forever. It is of the utmost importance for a man to know whether he has been enlightened or abideth in darkness, whether he is the slave of sin or the Lord's free man. Each man should know that he is either saved or lost, pardoned or condemned; he may not sit down in peace in the deceitful hope that though he may not be a child of God, he is nevertheless no heir of wrath, for it cannot be; he is one thing or the other at this moment.

Let this stand as the preface of the sermon, for the spirit of it will run through my whole discourse.

And now I come to the words of the text itself: "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil." We shall speak of four things: the works of the devil; the purpose of God; the manifestation of the Son of God; and the experience within ourselves of the meaning of this text. Oh, for the aid of the Holy Spirit, that we may think aright and speak with power.

I. First, then, let us say a little upon

THE WORKS OF THE DEVIL.

This very strong expression is descriptive of sin; for the preceding sentence so interprets it. I will read the whole verse: "He that committeth sin is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning. For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil," that is that He might destroy sin.

This name for sin is first of all a word of detestation. Sin is so abominable in the sight of God and of good men that its various forms are said to be "the works of the devil." Men do not like the idea of having any connection with the devil, and yet they have a most intimate connection with him until they are made anew by the Spirit of God. When it was supposed in a superstitious age that a man had commerce with the devil he was abhorred or feared, and most properly so; he that is in league with Beelzebub has forfeited all right to honor. Satan is "the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience." Think of that, ye ungodly ones, the devil is at work in you, as a smith at his forge. Is it not a shocking thought that if I am living in sin I am the bondslave of Satan, and I am doing his work for him? The expression is a word of detestation; may it enter into our hearts and make sin horrible to us.

Next, it is a word of distinction; it distinguishes the course of the ungodly man from the life of the man who believes in the Lord Jesus. For he that is of God doeth the works of God—his life is the work of God, it is a life which has much that is God-like about it, and he is upheld by the power of God, the ever blessed Spirit. But the ungodly man's life is very different—he lives for himself, he seeks his own pleasure, he hates all that oppose him, he is up in arms against the Lord, and His truth, and all that is pure and good; his spirit is not the spirit of God, but of the evil one. There is a radical distinction between the gracious and the graceless, and this comes out in their works; the one works the works of God and the other the works of the devil.

I know that this doctrine is not pleasant, but it is true, and therefore it must be plainly stated. I hear one say, "Look at me; am I a child of the devil? I may not be much of a saint, but I am no worse than many of your professing Christians." I answer, that such may be the case; for professing Christians are sometimes horrible hypocrites, but what has that to do with you? Ah, my friend, their perishing will not help your salvation. If you are not trusting in Christ and living under the power of His love, you may be as good as a hypocrite, or even better, and yet you may be widely different from a real Christian. If you have not the life of God in you, you cannot do the works of God.

The language before us, is next, a word of descent. Sin is "of the devil," it came from him; he is its PARENT AND PATRON.

Sin is not so of the devil that we can lay the blame of our sins upon him, for that is our own. Thou must not blame the tempter for tempting thee to do that which without thy will he could not make thee do. He may tempt thee, but that would be no sin of thine if thy will did not yield thereto. The responsibility lies with thy will. The devil has plenty of sin of his own to answer for, and yet he is often made a packhorse to carry loads of evil which are none of his. Mother Eve taught us that art when she said, "The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat;" and since then men have become wonderfully proficient in the science of excuse-making, frequently imputing their own guilt to the devil's guile. Yet sin in a sadly true sense does come of the devil. He first introduced it into the world. He brought the flame which has caused so great a burning.

Since then he has been in some degree the author of sin by often tempting men. I doubt not that he suggests to many a sinner the delights of the flesh, and the pleasures of self; and that he shuts the eye of conscience to the truth, and hardens the heart against the threatenings of God. Under these influences men doubtless rush into wild extravagances of evil, willingly yielding themselves to be led captive at his will. Doubtless, Satan not only suggests sin to men, but as one spirit influences another spirit, he influences men strongly toward that which is evil, and blinds them against that which is good. "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one," is a prayer which plainly connects the evil one with temptation, as we know that he is connected with it as a matter of fact. This is his constant employment, to be tempting one way or another the sons of men. Hence sin is the work of the devil, but not so that it excuses us; it is our work because we willingly yield; let us be thoroughly ashamed of such work when we find that the devil has a hand in it. May Almighty God deliver us from the mighty spirit of evil!

Consider, next, that we have here a word of description. The work of sin is the work of the devil, because it is such a work as he delights in. What are the works of the devil? They are such actions as are like himself, and exhibit his nature and spirit. Open your eyes, and you will surely see "the works of the devil;" they are everywhere in this poor world. The earth is defiled with

HIS HORRIBLE PRODUCTIONS.

Look abroad in the world and you see atheism; men made by God deny His existence. See, also, how much there is of ignorance abroad, a leaden night of ignorance of God and of His Son. Is not this the work of the prince of darkness? Note also the abounding unbelief of truth which would be believed at once if men's minds were pure, of truth which is salvation to those who accept it, and yet is rejected by many as if it were injurious to them. Whence comes all this indifference to God and His grace, and what is the origin of all this plague of doubting which is now upon us? Is it not of the same character as that which abode in the serpent's heart when he whispered, "Hath God said?" and, again, "Ye shall not surely die." Here is the liar that is from the beginning still producing a host of lies against God Himself.

My list is long enough; but I see a numerous brood hatched beneath the wings of hate: envy, strife, wrath, bitterness, malice, revenge. These are as fiery flying serpents in this wilderness, inflaming men's blood. I see these accursed evils rousing nations into war, dividing communities with discords, embittering families that else might be full of love; yea, making men to be the worst enemies of men. These come from him who is a murderer from the beginning, and is the aider and abettor of all hatred and strife. What a busy being he has been! How he has toiled incessantly day and night to set up a kingdom of hate in opposition to the empire of eternal love!

II. But now, secondly, and much more joyously, let us consider

THE PURPOSE OF GOD,

"For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil."

Ring out sweetly all the silver bells of earth, and all the golden harps of heaven; God has purposed that the terrible work of the devil upon the earth shall be every atom of it destroyed. Yes, mark that word "destroyed," not limited, nor alleviated, nor neutralized, but destroyed. Oh, men and brethren, what could you and I do against such a power as Satan; so malicious and so strong, and withal so cunning and subtle, and apt to deceive? Who among us can loosen his works, and cast his cords from us? But if God has purposed it, verily the purpose of Jehovah shall stand! If this be the divine decree, tremble, O Tophet, and thou, Beelzebub, for there shall come an end to all thy works, if God hath purposed to destroy them!

The work which lies in this purpose is assuredly a divine work. Destruction of forces so terrible must come from the Lord alone. What could you and I do in this business? Ourselves originally under Satan's power, ourselves destroyed, could we destroy the destroyer? It is a divine work, this destruction of the works of the devil, and herein lies our hope of its being accomplished.

And there is, to my mind, about it the idea of a conquering work. When are the palaces and the fortifications of great kings destroyed? Not till the kings themselves have been overthrown in fair fight; but when their power is broken, then it is that the conquerors raze the castle and burn the stronghold. Glory be unto Jehovah, it is His purpose to win such a victory over the Prince of Darkness that every work of his shall be destroyed. This means also

A COMPLETE WORK.

The product of evil is not to be cut down for a time and left to grow again. The tree of the forest is felled by the axe, but the root remaineth, and at the scent of water it will bud and send forth branches; but the purpose of God is utterly to destroy the works of the devil, and destroyed they shall be. Up from this poor planet there shall ascend, like smoke from a great golden altar of incense, the perpetual hallelujahs of a ransomed race, redeemed by blood and power from all the rule of the enemy. Glory be to God, He hath purposed it, and He will accomplish it. It is a complete work and a conclusive work; for the Lord Jesus will so break the head of the old dragon, that he shall never wear the crown again. Christ has come, not to fight a battle with Satan which shall continue throughout all ages, but to win a victory which shall so crush the power of evil that it shall not molest the world again. Rebellion shall not rise up a second time. Oh, how glorious is the text: "For this purpose the Son of God was manifest, that He might destroy the works of the devil." Sin in every shape and form the Lord shall destroy from off the face of the earth forever.

III. Thirdly, our text plainly tells us

HOW THIS IS TO BE DONE;

By the manifestation of the Son of God. "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested." The work of the devil was so clever, the foundations of it were so deeply laid, and the whole thing had such a semblance of omnipotence about it, and was, indeed, in itself so strong, that no champion was found in heaven or on earth that could hope to destroy it.

My text has in it to my mind a majestic idea, first, of the difficulties of the case, that the Son of God must needs be manifested to destroy the works of the devil; and then, secondly, of the ease of His victory. Have you been abroad at midnight when darkness has been all about you, dense and palpable? Not a star was visible, the moon had forgotten to shine; you could scarce see your hand when you held it before your eyes. The blackness seemed to be not only above, beneath, and around, but also within you. You were embedded in a thick, heavy, sensible ebon mass. How could all this be scattered? What power could uplift the pall and scatter the mass? Lo, in the east old Sol has lifted up his head, and the black walls have vanished; not a wreck remains, the works of darkness are destroyed by the manifestation of the light. That is the thought of the text, "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested." Uprising from His divine retreat in the silences of eternity, He appeared in human form, and thereby scattered and utterly destroyed the works of darkness. Let us see how this was done.

First, Christ's manifestation, even in His incarnation, was a fatal blow to the works of Satan. Next, look to the life of Christ on earth, and see how He there destroyed the works of the devil. It was in the wilderness when they stood foot to foot—the champions of good and evil! How dexterously the evil one played his weapons! how cunningly he tempted the Christ of God! But the Lord Jesus used the sword of the Spirit, and "It is written," "It is written," "It is written," struck home till the evil one spread his dragon wings and fled away, for he had found his victor. All our Lord's preaching, all His teaching, all His labor here below was in order to the pulling away the corner-stone from the great house of darkness which Satan had built up.

But oh, dear friends, it was in His death that Jesus chiefly overthrew Satan and destroyed his works. Satan built upon this—that man had become offensive to God and God must punish him; that punishment was his hope for the continuance of alienation. Behold, the august Son of God takes the offender's place! The deed was done. Man is no more offensive to heaven, for one glorious man's boundless merit has put away the demerit of the race. Jesus has, by His unutterable beauties, removed the deformities of all who are in Him. Man accepting this great sacrifice, loves and adores the Father who ordained it, so the works of the devil in his heart are destroyed.

Our Lord's rising again, His ascension into glory, His sitting at the right hand of the Father, His coming again in the latter days—all these are parts of the manifestation of the Son of God by which the works of the devil shall be destroyed. So also is the preaching of the Gospel. If we want to destroy the works of the devil our best method is to manifest more and more the Son of God. Preach up Christ and you preach down the devil. All kinds of reforms are good, and we are on the side of everything that is pure, and honest, and temperate, and righteous; still, is the Christ of God. The one medicine for man's moral sickness is the cross, and nothing but the cross. Preach the crucified Saviour; preach the incarnate God; preach Christ full of forgiveness and love, reconciling the world unto Himself, and you have applied the best remedy to the sore.

Only be it never forgotten that Jesus destroys the works of darkness by His Spirit. It is the Spirit of God who puts divine energy into the sacred word. When the Spirit manifests Christ in a man then the works of darkness are destroyed in that man. When Christ is manifested in a nation then the works of Satan begin to fall in that nation; and in proportion as the Holy Ghost shall more and more reveal Christ to hearts and consciences, bringing them into obedience to the faith, in that degree shall the works of Satan be destroyed.

Lastly, on this point, our blessed Lord is manifested in His eternal power and kingdom as enthroned, in order to destroy the works of the devil; for "the government shall be upon His shoulders, and His name shall be called Wonderful, the mighty God, the Father of the ages." He is such a Father, and the age is made to feel His forming hand. Kings, presidents, parliaments, poets, leaders, and such like—these are powers visible; but there is over them all a power invisible. A late philosopher asserted that amid all the confusion of affairs he could see a power over all which works toward righteousness. There is such a power; there is a King of kings and a Lord of lords; and who is He? It is He of whom we read, "The Father had committed all things into His hands."

IV. Lastly, I would come close home to each dear friend as we utter a few words of inquiry as to in ourselves. Has the Son of God been manifested to you to destroy the works of the devil in you? Come to the point, and look at home! At first there was in your heart an enmity to God; for "the carnal mind is enmity against God." Is that enmity destroyed? Has the love of God in Christ Jesus appeared to you in such a way that you can truly say you no longer hate God, but love Him? Though you do not love Him as you wish to do, yet your heart is toward Him, and you desire to be like Him, and to be with Him forever. This is a good beginning; the Son of God has destroyed your enmity; you have seen the love of God in Christ, and your rebellion against God has ceased.

The next work of the devil which usually appears in the human mind is self-righteous pride. The man says, "I am no enemy to God, I am righteous; if I am not perfect, yet I am tolerably good. God! I thank Thee that I am not as other men are. I do this and I do that, and I do not do the other." This is our natural boasting, but the Son of God destroys it. Has the Son of God destroyed all your self-righteousness? It is a precious lot of rags; but we so constantly practise the art of patching and mending that we dream that we are clothed in royal apparel. Have all those rags gone from you?

When the Lord has destroyed self-righteousness in us, the devil generally sets us forth another form of his power, and that is despair. "Ah," says he, "you see what a sinner you are—God will never be reconciled to you! There is no forgiveness for you!" Oh, that ever he should have the impudence to make a man believe so gross a slander of such a God as ours, whose very name is love, and who gave His Son to die for sinners! But, if the Lord Jesus Christ has been manifested to you, despair has gone, that work of the devil has been all destroyed, and now you have a humble hope in God, and a joy in His mercy.

What next? Have you any unbelief in your heart as to the promises of God? That is a favorite work of the devil; unbelief is one of his darling children. Now, I beseech you, do not say, "I must always feel this unbelief." No. Down with it! Christ was manifested to destroy the works of the devil. Grind your cutlasses, and

CUT DOWN THESE DOUBTS!

All mistrusts must die. Not one of them must be spared. Hang them up before the face of the sun!

Jesus has not come that He may lock up our sins, and keep them quiet, hidden away in a dark corner; He has come to destroy them. Israel was not to make a league with the Canaanites, as they unwisely did with the Gibeonites; but they were to sweep out the entire race, root and branch. Thus must sin be exterminated and extirpated.

Do fleshly lusts arise in your heart, my brother? In whose heart do they not arise? THE BRIGHTEST SAINT IS SOMETIMES TEMPTED to the foulest vice. Yes, but he yields not thereto. By the grace of God he says, "Christ is manifested to destroy the works of the devil." He will not play with these things and dally with them, and let them be his Delilah, for he knows that they will cost him his eyes, even if they do not ruin his soul. He cries, "Away with them!" It is not meet even to mention these vile things; they are works of the devil, and to be destroyed.

My brother, do you quickly become angry? I pray God you may be angry and sin not; but if you are of a hasty temper, I entreat you to overcome it. Do not say, "I cannot help it." You must help it, or rather Christ must destroy it. It must not be tolerated. Does your anger ever intensify into hate? Do you ever feel envious of those who are better off than yourself, or better than yourself? Does that envy ever lead you to think harshly of them, to indulge yourself in suspicions that are groundless concerning them? Oh, for the sword of the Lord and of Gideon! Slay all these Midianites, for Christ is revealed on purpose to clear the heart of the whole brood of them. God is love, and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God; and hate and ill-will must not live! Every form of evil must fall; destruction is meted out to them all. Every idol must be broken.

Oh, brethren, there is to be in every true believer of sin. What a prospect this is! The cutting up of the very roots of evil! The sooner the better. The day shall come when every child of God shall be transformed and transfigured into the likeness of Christ, and shall be without fault before the throne of God. This is already foreshadowed upon us, for the outlines are drawn in the fact that we hate all sin, and long after perfect holiness. The great Father has put His mark upon the lump of clay, and we can see from the rough draft that He will fashion it and form it into the perfect image of His dear Son.

After that image we are struggling. It is begun in us by the power of the Spirit of God, and He will not fail nor be discouraged till the purpose of God shall be accomplished, and all the works of Satan in us shall be destroyed. This robs death of all dread; the prospect of being totally free from sin makes us welcome even the grave, if by that road we are to come to the home of the perfect. Meanwhile, let us seek after sanctification; let us labor after holiness, and let us abound in it to the glory of God. Despite our failures and mistakes let us pursue holiness! Taking it by the heel, let us keep close to it. So may the Lord enable us for Jesus' sake. Amen.

SAMUEL CARTER HALL.

THE book of the season, a book widely read in every city in all the States, and enjoyed as well as read, is the book entitled 'The Recollections of a Long Life," by Mr. S. C. Hall. On page 477 is a portrait of the author, whose popularity in the literary world in which he is now a veteran is without a rival.

Samuel Carter Hall was born in the year 1800. After the completion of his education he studied law, but never followed the profession, literature having more attractions for him. In 1820, when only twenty years of age, Mr. Hall published his first book, and three years later commenced labor as a reporter for the London Times.

MARRIAGE.

In 1824—the same year that he became a member of the Inner Temple—Mr. Hall married Anna Maria Fielding, who shed so bright a lustre over his path of life, and whose writings were most popular. Mrs. Hall was born in Dublin in 1807–8. Her mother was of Huguenot descent, traced to French and Swiss lineage; and from her rare qualities, and the happy mixture of races thus grafted on the Irish, Mrs. Hall inherited much of the wild and vivid imagination, deep thought and pathos, warm-heartedness, and gentle refinement that so eminently distinguished her.

In 1825, Mr. Hall projected and established the Amulet, and this elegant work, one of the forerunners of the long race of "annuals" that afterward deluged the press, he most successfully edited, and was assisted by all the brilliant writers of the day.

In 1839, Mr. S. C. Hall projected and established the Art Journal, which for forty-two years he has, without a day's interruption, conducted.

Mr. and Mrs. Hall in 1845 jointly issued their work on Ireland, its scenery and character, and in 1859 "The Book of the Thames," which has passed through several editions. Other of their works were "Pilgrimages to English Shrines," which contained "pleasant illustrated sketches of the homes and haunts of genius and virtue;" "The Book of South Wales," "A Week at Killarney," and a gracefully conceived and exquisitely written Irish fairy-tale, "Midsummer Eve."

Mr. Hall has been for many years a most enthusiastic

TOTAL ABSTAINER.

In a letter to the eminent physiologist, Dr. Carpenter, Mr. Hall bore witness to the effect of the abstinence principles and practice on himself. He wrote: "I live by the labor of my brain; and I can testify that since I have become a tetotaler, I have had an increase of intellectual power, so that what I send out to the public never comes trickling through a disturbed and disordered medium. And as to the endurance of fatigue, I am able to work three times longer than ever I could while I indulged, even moderately, in the use of strong drinks. I am better in body, in mind, in home, in every comfort; and I feel proud, therefore, of the pledge I have taken to abide by the practice of Entire Abstinence."

The following lines are from his pen on

THE BLUE RIBBON.

Hail to the Ribbon, the Ribbon of Blue!
Hail to the outward and visible sign!
Hail to the Gospel-taught, honest and true.
Soldiers, whose Leader and Lord is Divine!
Hurrah for the Ribbon, the Ribbon of Blue!

What do we fight? All that tempts us to wrong!
Our Captain and Chief will be first in the strife:
We war with the pest that can beat down the strong:
The curse of the Soul and the poison of Life.
Hurrah for the Ribbon, the Ribbon of Blue!

Mr. and Mrs. Hall, in 1874, celebrated their golden wedding. In spite of their ardous labors their circumstances were not very prosperous. Their books had sold freely, but they entered with so much enthusiasm into all the philanthropic movements of the day, many of which they originated, and contributed to the funds for the support of those movements with so much liberality that they were comparatively poor. This fact was well known, and their friends thought there could be no better way of celebrating the golden wedding of the philanthropic pair than by presenting them with a sum of money to support them during the remainder of their lives. Accordingly an appeal was issued, and the response was prompt. Contributions came not only from friends, but many small sums from poor people whose lives had been benefited by the works of the two earnest philanthropists. Queen Victoria also contributed; her contribution was the portrait of herself and of the late Prince Albert.

The following beautiful lines were four years afterward written by Mr. Hall on the fifty-fourth anniversary of the wedding-day, in September, 1878:

"Yes! we go gently down the hill of life,
And thank our God at every step we go—
The husband-lover and the sweetheart-wife.
Of creeping age what do we care or know?
Each says to each, 'Our fourscore years thrice told Would leave us young.' The soul is never old.

"What is the grave to us? can it divide
The destiny of two by God made one?
We step across and reach the other side,
To know our blended life is but begun.
These fading faculties are sent to say
Heaven is more near to-day than yesterday."

But the grave has already divided them, as far as it was able to do so. Mrs. Hall died on January 30th, 1881, and the veteran author calmly awaits the summons to join her. Death has no terrors for him.

GEORGE WEBSTER'S SAVINGS.

(See Illustration.)

"Yes, yes, I suppose it's true. Let me see, what did he say? I'm 'getting too old for the work.'"

The speaker was an old man, bent of frame, and with head polished and bright as a mirror, where, forty years ago, a crop of luxuriant dark hair had been. He was busy with his plane in the one room that served him for workship, sitting-room, and bedroom. The delicate walnut shavings fell about his feet as the plane went briskly along for a few minutes, and then ceased, and the old man leaned back against the wall and began muttering to himself again.

"It will be hard work to live, I expect. I think the boss might have found me something to do. I don't want much, but I must have something to keep me alive. Nothing after next Saturday, and I've only four dollars left now, and the pay I shall have for this job. That'll be all I shall have to keep me next week. Rather a dull lookout for you, George, my boy."

A few turns more at the plane followed this summing up of his worldly position; but the work dragged to-day, and the old man's mind reverted to the conversation which troubled him.

"What did the boss say? 'Retire on my savings?' Yes, that was it, 'and live like a gentleman.' Wonder if I ought to have saved. I've had plenty of money in my time, but I never saved. Not I. Mary used to say, 'We'll put it in the Lord's bank. It'll be safe there.' God bless her, she was a good wife and a good Christian, but I'm a'most thankful she did not live to hear that Wace won't give me any more work. Wonder what she would have said. I don't believe she would have lost heart. She would have said God won't desert us in our old age. What was it she used to sing?

"'E'en let the unknown morrow
Bring with it what it may,
It can bring with it nothing,
But He will bear us through;
Who gives the lilies clothing,
Will clothe His people, too.'"

The old man's voice quavered a little as he sang the familiar words, but there was a note of conviction and joy and fervor that would have astonished any listener who happened to know that only four dollars stood between the old man and starvation.

"The Lord's bank," he soliloquized, as he stopped to take breath; "well, I don't know that there's much in it. Not much of my putting in, though the capital's e-normous. We've had our interest all along in the pleasure it gave us. After the boys died and then little Fanny, it was very lonesome, and we took little Willie when he was left an orphan, and we brought him up, and he's doing well now. And then we took Freddy Bertram when the widow died, and we brought him up, too, and he learned the trade. It cost us a deal of money, but it brightened the house like, to hear the children's voices, and there's no saying what might have happened to both of 'em if we hadn't seen to 'em. Then there was the money we gave Joe Brown when he broke his leg, but then we should have done that anyhow, because we were sorry for him. And then—but what's the use? It was all the same. We gave the money, and it was good to see how happy it made 'em. I can't say it's in the Lord's bank. I've no claim on Him for it. He'll take care of me now, I know, because He is so good. But I've no claim—no claim."

The old man shook his head with an air of conviction. He seemed satisfied that his case was bad, but he was not dispirited now. God was good, and he was not afraid. The work went on again, this time with a whistle of a cheerful hymn tune. It was getting too dark to see, and after a while the tools were laid aside, and the old man stood by his window enjoying the brief interval of twilight.

"I'd like to see Freddy's wife," he said presently. "He must be getting on well to get married. Fred was a smart boy, and I've no doubt his store in Montreal is a good-sized place. I'd like to see him again. He said in his letter he and his wife were going on their marriage tour. I wish they'd have come this route. I'm real glad, though, the boy's doing well. The money I spent on him has done good, and I shall manage somehow. It was better spent than put in the bank to keep me. David was an old man, and he said he'd never seen the righteous forsaken. Neither have I, and I'm over seventy."

Again the old man sang his wife's favorite hymn, and the words "will clothe His people, too," came forth with a roll of triumph. They were scarcely uttered, when the door of the workshop was pushed open without ceremony, and the old workman, turning round, saw a gentleman and lady enter. His first thought was that God was fulfilling His promise by sending him a customer, and he bent deferentially before his visitors.

"You don't know us, Mr. Webster," said the gentleman.

"No," said the old man, "no, I don't know you, but there's something familiar in the tone of your voice. I think I must have met you somewhere."

"Yes, you have, and if you had not met me I might have been in some State's prison now or lying dead in a drunkard's grave. I am a respectable tradesman now, with a good bank account and the best wife in the world. Fred Bertram's name is respected on the other side the frontier, but all he is, and has, he owes to a good old Christian named George Webster, who was a father to an orphan boy."

"Fred, my boy, is it really you? God bless you," said the old man, his voice thick with tears of joy. "God bless you and your wife, too. I'm glad to have seen you both before I die."

"Oh, don't you talk of dying yet; I have something else for you to do. I am coming in the morning to give away everything here but your old arm-chair and your old Bible. I am going to take you and them away with me to my home. I always said when I had a home I would not sleep in it until you were there, and I am going to keep my word."

"No, Fred, my boy. It's good o' you to say so, but I can't go to be a burden on you and your wife."

"Look here," said Mr. Bertram, "my wife knows all about it, and we're agreed on this, so, you obstinate old man, you may consider yourself booked north, and you are going to live in a house that is a good deal more yours than mine."

"Well," said the old joiner, when his visitors were gone, "I guess I'm provided for, after all. I wish Mary was alive to see it. I know what she would say. She was quite right. The Lord's Bank was the best place for our savings."

A SERIAL STORY.

Self-sacrifice too Costly.

"A DRUNKARD!" said Mrs. Bolton. "I am sure I never used such a word about Sophy. I cannot believe it possible that my nephew's wife, a clergyman's wife, could become a drunkard, like a woman of the lowest classes! And I cannot understand how you, a clergyman, could seriously propose so extraordinary a step. Why, there is no danger to me; nobody could ever suspect me of being fond of wine. I have taken it in moderation all my life, and I cannot believe it is my duty to give it up altogether at my age."

"Very possibly it has never been your duty before," answered Mr. Warden, "and now I urge it, not for your own sake, but for hers. She has fallen into the snare blindfolded, and you can extricate her, though at some cost to yourself. I feel persuaded you can induce her to abstain, if you will do so yourself. You call yourself a Christian—"

"I should think there can be no doubt about that," she interrupted, indignantly; "the archdeacon never expressed any doubt about it, and surely I may depend upon his judgment."

"Forgive me," said Mr. Warden. "I ought to have said you are a Christian, and a Christian is one who follows his Lord's example."

"Who drank wine Himself, and blessed it," interposed Mrs. Bolton, in a tone of triumph.

"The great law of whose life was self-sacrifice," he pursued. "If one of His brethren or sisters had been a drunkard, can you think of Him filling up His own cup with wine and drinking it, as they sat side by side at the same table?"

"I should be shocked at imagining anything so presumptuous, not to call it blasphemous," she said. "We can only go by the plain words of Scripture, which tell us that He turned water into wine, and that He drank wine Himself. I am not afraid of going by the plain words of Scripture."

"But we have only fragments of His history," replied Mr. Warden, "and only a few verses of His teachings. Would you say that Paul had more of the spirit of self-sacrifice than Christ? Yet he said, 'It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth.' And again, 'If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth.' If the servant spoke so, what do you think the Master would have answered if any one had asked Him, 'Lord, what shall I do to save my brother from drunkenness?' It will be a self-denial to you; people will wonder at it, and talk about you; yet I say, if you would truly follow your Lord and Saviour, there is no choice for you. You can save a soul for whom Christ died; and is it possible that you can refuse to do it?"

"Mr. Warden," exclaimed Mrs. Bolton, "I am astonished at your fanaticism!"

She had risen from her chair, and was about to sail out of the vestry with an air of outraged dignity when Mr. Warden said in a low tone and with a heavy sigh "See, there she is!"

Mrs. Bolton paused and turned toward the window, which overlooked the little grave of her nephew's child, who had been very dear to herself. Sophy had just sunk down beside it. There was a slight strangeness and disorder about her appearance, which no stranger might have noticed, but which could not fail to strike both of them. She looked dejected and unhappy, and hid her face in her hands, as though she felt their gaze upon her. The clergyman laid his hand upon Mrs. Bolton's arm with an unconscious pressure, and looked earnestly into her clouded face.

"Look!" he said. "In Christ's name, I implore you to save her."

"I will do what I can," she answered impatiently; "but I cannot take your way to do it; it is irrational."

"There is no other way," he said mournfully, "and I warn you of it."

Sophy Chantrey had strayed absently down to the churchyard in one of those fits of restlessness and nervous despondency which made it impossible to her to remain in the overcrowded rooms of Bolton Villa or in the trim flower-garden surrounding it. There was a continual vague sense of misery in her lot, which she had not strength enough to cast off; but at this moment she was not consciously mourning either for her lost little one or for the absence of her husband and boy. The sharpness and bitterness of her trouble were dulled, and her brain was confused. Even this was a relief from the heavy-heartedness that oppressed her at other times, and she felt a comparative comfort in sitting half-asleep by her child's grave, dreaming confusedly of happier days. She started almost fretfully when Ann Holland's voice broke in upon her drowsy languor.

"Begging your pardon, Mrs. Chantrey," she said, "but I thought I might make bold to ask what news you've had from Mr. Chantrey in Madeira?"

"David!" she answered absently; "David! Oh yes, I see. You are Miss Holland, and he was always fond of you. Do you remember him bringing me to see you just after our marriage? He is getting quite well very fast, thank you. It is only eight months now till he comes home; but that is a long time."

The tears had gathered in her blue eyes, and fell one after another down her cheeks as she looked up pitifully into Ann Holland's kindly face.

"Ah! it is a long time, my dear," she replied, sitting down beside her, though she had some dread of the damp grass; "but we must all of us have patience, you know, and hope on, hope ever. Dear, dear! to think how overjoyed he'll be, and how happy all the folks in Upton will be, when he comes back! It was hard to part with him; but when we see him again, strong and hearty, all that'll be forgot."

"Oh, I've missed him so!" cried Sophy, with a burst of tears; "I've been so solitary without him or Charlie. You cannot think what it is. Sometimes I feel as if they were both dead, and I was doomed to live here without them forever and ever. Everything seems ended. It is a dreadful feeling."

"And then, dear love," said Ann Holland, in her quietest tones, "I know you just fall down on your knees, and tell God all about it. That's how I do when my poor brother behaves so bad, taking every penny, and pawning or selling all he can lay hands on, to spend in drink. But you know better than me, with all your learning, and music, and painting, and pretty manners, let alone being a clergyman's wife; and when you are that lonesome and sorrowful, you kneel down and tell God all about it."

"No, no," sobbed Sophy, hiding her face again in her hands; "I am so miserable—too miserable to be good, as I used to be when David was at home."

The almost pleasant drowsiness was over now, and a swift tide of thought and memory swept through her brain. The gulf on whose verge she stood seemed to open before her, and she looked down into it shudderingly. She could recollect the temptation assailing her once before, when her baby died; but then her husband was beside her, and his presence had saved her, though not even he had guessed at her danger. What could save her now, alone, with a perpetual weariness of spirit, and a feeling of physical weakness amounting to positive pain? Yet if she went but a few steps forward, she would sink into the gloomy depths, which for the moment her quickened conscience could so clearly perceive. If David could but be at home now! If she could but have her little son to occupy her time and thoughts!

"Dear, dear!" said Ann Holland's low and tender voice; "nobody's too miserable for God not to love them. Why, a poor thing like me can love my brother when he's as bad as bad can be with drink. I could do anything for him out of pity; and it's hard to think less of Him that made us. Sure He knows how difficult it is to be good when we are miserable; and we can't tire Him out. He'll help us out of our misery if we keep stretching out our hands to Him. Nobody knows but Him what we've all got to go through. It's because you're lonesome, and fretting after old days. But they'll come back again, dear love, and we'll all be as happy as happy can be. I know how you miss Mr. Chantrey, for I miss him badly, and what must it be for you?"

Sophy lifted up her face, wet with tears, yet with a smile breaking through them. Ann Holland's simple words of comfort and hope had gone direct to her heart, and it seemed possible for her to wait patiently now until David came home.

"You've done me good," she said, "and I shall tell David next time I write to him."

"Dear, dear!" said Ann Holland, with a tone of surprise and pleasure in her voice, "couldn't I do something better for you? Couldn't I just go over to Master Charlie's school, and take him a cake and a little whip out of the shop? It would do me good, worlds of good; and he'd be glad, poor little fellow! Mr. Chantrey's so good to my poor brother; he'd save him from drink if he'd be saved, I know. I'd do anything for your sake or Mr. Chantrey's. But there's Mrs. Bolton coming out of the church, and I've a little business with her; so I'll say good-day to you now, Mrs. Chantrey."

If at this point of her life Sophy Chantrey could have been removed from the daily temptations which beset her, most probably she would not have fallen lower into the degrading sin, which was quickly becoming a habit. Until her husband's enforced absence, she had been so carefully hedged in by the numberless small barriers of a girl's sphere, so guided and managed for by those about her, that it had been hardly possible for any sore temptation to come near her. But now suddenly cut adrift from her quiet moorings, she found herself powerless to keep out of the rapid current which must plunge her into deep misery and vice.

There had not been a doubt in her mind that she was not a real Christian, for she had freely given a sentimental faith to the Christian dogmas propounded to her by persons whom she held to be wiser and better than herself. In the same manner she had taken the customs and usages of modern life, always feeling satisfied to do what others of her own class and rank did. Even now, though she was conscious that there was some danger for herself, she could not realize the half of the peril in which she stood. After Ann Holland left her she lingered still beside the little grave in a tranquil but somewhat purposeless reverie. There could be no harm, she thought, in taking just enough to deliver her from her very worst moments of depression, or when she had to write cheerfully to her husband. That was a duty, and she must keep a stricter guard over herself than she had done lately. She would take exactly what her Aunt Bolton drank, and then she could not go wrong. With this resolution she gathered a flower from the little grave beside her, and, turning away, hastened out of the churchyard.

Mr. Warden had scarcely glanced through the vestry window since Mrs. Bolton had gone away in anger, but he was well aware of Sophy's lingering beside the grave. He felt crushed and unhappy. His friend Chantrey had solemnly committed the parish to his care, and he to the utmost of his power had strenuously fulfilled his duties. But what was he to do with this new case? Except under strong excitement his constitutional shyness kept him dumb, and how was he to venture to expostulate with his friend's wife upon such a subject? It seemed to be his duty to do something to prevent this lonely and sorrowful girl from drifting into a commonplace and degrading phase of sin. But how was he to begin? How could he even hint at such a suspicion? Besides, he could do nothing to remove her out of temptation. So long as Mrs. Bolton persisted in her angry refusal to follow his advice, she must be exposed daily to indulge an appetite which she had not the firmness to resist.

Perhaps no two persons, outside that nearest circle of kinship which surrounds us all, ever suffered more grief and anxiety in witnessing the slow but sure downfall of a fellow-being, than did Mr. Warden and Ann Holland while watching the gradual working of the curse that was destroying David Chantrey's wife.

It was a miserable time for Mr. Warden. Now and then he accepted Mrs. Bolton's formal invitations to dine with her, and those few acquaintances who were considered worthy to visit at Bolton Villa. On the first occasion he had gone with a faint hope that she had thought over his advice, and resolved to act upon it. But there had been no such result of his solemn warning, which had been so painful to him to deliver. He abstained from taking wine himself, as he believed Christ would have done for the sake of any one so tempted to sin; but his example had no weight. There was a pleasant jest or two at his asceticism, and that was all. Sophy Chantrey took wine as the others did; and, in spite of her resolution, more than the others did; while Mrs. Bolton raised her eyebrows, and drew down the corners of her lips, with an air of rebuke. No one knew the meaning of that look except Mr. Warden. The other guests were only entertained by Mrs. Chantrey's fine flow of merry humor, and remarked how well she bore her husband's absence.

"You saw her, Mr. Warden?" said Mrs. Bolton to him, in a low voice, when they reassembled in the drawing-room.

"Yes," he answered, sorrowfully.

"You saw how I looked at her as much as to warn her," pursued Mrs. Bolton. "I am sure she understood me, yet she allowed Brown to fill her glass again and again. What could I do more? I have spoken to her in private; I could not speak to her before our friends."

"I have told you before," he answered, there is only one thing you can do, and you refuse to do it."

"It would be ridiculous to do it," she said, sharply. "I am not going to make myself a laughing-stock to all the world; and I cannot shut her up in her room, and send her meals to her like a naughty child. You ought to remonstrate with her."

"I will," he replied, "but it will be of little use, so long as the temptation is there. Have you seriously and prayerfully thought of your own duty as a Christian, in this case? Are you quite sure you are acting as Christ Himself would have done?"

"None of us can act as He would have done," she answered, moving away from him. Yet her conscience was uneasy. There was, of a truth, no doubt in her mind as to what the Lord would have done. Yet she could not break through the habits of a lifetime; no, not even to save the wife of her favorite nephew. She did not like to give up the hospitable custom. Her wines were good, bought from the archdeacon's own wine-merchant, and she enjoyed them herself, and liked to hear her guests praise them. No question as to the lawfulness of such an enjoyment had ever arisen before now; but now it troubled her secretly, though she was resolved not to give way. If Sophy Chantrey could not keep within proper limits, it was no fault of hers; and no one could blame her for preserving a harmless custom.

CITIES OF REFUGE.

S. S. Lesson for August 5. Josh. 20: 1-9. Golden Text. Ps. 46: 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Provision for the Levites—The Lord their Trustee—Lack of Faith in Workers—Protection for the Manslayer—Responsibility for Souls—The Manslayer's only Safe Refuge—Holiness as a Refuge—Strength the Second City—Our Shechem—The Third City Fellowship—An Entrance for Satan—Elevation and Joy.

OUR golden text says "God is our Refuge and Strength, a very present help in trouble." As we get better acquainted with Him this most precious fact becomes more and more real to us. In our lesson for to-day we find Joshua called of God, after he had conquered all the land of Canaan, and had divided it among the tribes for an inheritance, to "appoint out" cities of refuge. God had spoken unto Moses "in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho," that he should command the children of Israel, to give cities for the Levites to dwell in, with suburbs for their cattle and their goods, and all their beasts, measuring from the wall outward a thousand cubits. The Lord was the Portion of the Levites, they had no part nor inheritance among their brethren, the Lord was their inheritance (Deut. 10 : 9), the Trustee of their property, and when He made provision for those who had no portion on earth, He looked after their cattle, too. Oh, how safe it is to trust God! and yet thousands of believers would never dream of answering any call to work for God, unless their salary were assured to them, would count it a dreadful hardship to go out as Mr. Hudson Taylor's missionaries do, to China,

LEANING ON THE LORD ALONE;

they would think that to go as George Müller's missionaries do, or Dr. Cullis's, with only God to trust to, was certain ruin, because in their hearts they do not think God equal in resources; and in faithfulness to the missionary societies, they say what many believe is in the Bible (but it is not), "God helps those who help themselves."

God ordained that among the cities which should be given to the Levites, there should be six cities of refuge for the manslayer who had slain any one unawares, "And they shall be unto you cities for refuge from the avenger; that the manslayer die not, until he stand before the congregation in judgment" (Num. 35 : 12). Thus the Lord became the Trustee of the manslayer as well as of the consecrated Levites, and gave him his place among them. But in His loving provision for the manslayer, no provision is made for the murderer, "the murderer shall surely be put to death. The revenger of blood himself shall stay the murderer; when he meeteth him he shall slay him" (Num. 35 : 18, 19). But if any man had shed blood and taken life unintentionally and however innocently, there was no safety for him anywhere but on the Lord's ground, in the city of refuge. Oh, how few of us can say with Paul, "I take you to record this day that I am pure from the blood of all men, for I have not shunned to declare unto you the whole counsel of God" (Acts 20 : 26, 27). Which of us has not unintentionally helped on the destruction of immortal souls? "When I say unto the wicked thou shalt surely die; and thou givest him not warning, nor speakest to warn the wicked from his wicked way, to save his life; the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand" (Ezek. 3 : 18). Oh, how many of us have shrunk back from being faithful, and if God dealt with us according to our works, the blood of those souls would be REQUIRED AT OUR HANDS.

Again, when earnest seekers after God have looked to our lives for a manifestation of Christ, which would convince them of the truth of Christianity, how many have been thrown back into scepticism, indifference, or superstition, by seeing in us envy, unkindness, want of candor, discontent, unbelief in God's promises. Manslayers many of us are, though we may not be intentional murderers of precious immortal souls. Satan tries hard to keep us blind to this thing, and to make us believe that the salvation of souls is not our business; but when the light of God shines upon us so clearly that we cannot but see how fearful is our guilt, then Satan turns round and sets God's holy law, "the avenger of blood," upon our track, that he may drive us to despair. What is at once our safety and also the means of correcting our passive unintentional injury of others? Just this: to take refuge in God, to know ourselves hid with Christ in God, and let others find us there (Col. 3 : 3).

It was a distinct stipulation that the slayer who had fled to the city of refuge should abide there "unto the death of the high-priest, which was anointed with the holy oil" (Num. 35 : 25). No business, however pressing, might call him away; no family matter, although it were the death of the nearest and dearest, nothing could be an excuse for finding him for him. He must know no life, no possession, no relative outside; all his interest must be within the city of his refuge, until the death of the high-priest, then, and only then, might he return to the land of his possession.

Joshua and Moses appointed these cities; the law could not make full provision of grace; Joshua, Jesus must do that—but we find from Deut. 4 : 41–43, that the manslayer was provided for on the other side of Jordan before any part of Canaan was possessed. "The first city chosen was Kedesh, in Galilee, in Mount Naphtali." The meaning of Kedesh is "holiness," or as we often say "sanctification." Hundreds of believers who feel the pursuit of the revenger of blood are struggling in vain to attain this city of refuge. They know that they ought to be holy, that God calls them to be so. He says, "Be ye holy; for I am holy" (1. Pet. 1 : 16), without holiness no man can see the Lord (Heb. 12 : 14); but oh, how many fail to see that "this is the will of God, even your sanctification" (1 Thess. 4 : 3); and therefore pray, and struggle, and strive to enter in, believing all the time that they have to overcome God by their earnestness and their prayers, and persuade Him to be willing to make them holy. Why, He created us for this (Isa. 43 : 21) and redeemed us for this (Eph. 1 : 4; Tit. 2 : 14). How can it not be His will to make us holy, when He gave His own Son to die for this very purpose?

"Then, why does He not make me holy? I hear some one say. Dear friend, have you left all as the slayer did when he fled to the city of his refuge? Is the world left behind? Are your plans for life, your earthly hopes, your self-made provisions, your darling hopes for children, business, everything—are they left behind, and are you abandoning yourself, just as you are, and unreservedly to God, that He may make you holy in His way? Then, as surely as you take Him in exchange for all this, which you deliver over to Him, so surely does He Himself, dwelling in you, become your sanctification; you dwell in Him, He in you. Claim Him, praise Him for it, and abide in this dwelling place, i.e., reckon that your God does really tell the truth.

Shechem in Mount Ephraim was the next city appointed. This means back, shoulder, or strength. "The Lord Jehovah is my strength and my song, He also is become my salvation" (Isa. 12 : 2). While we rely on our own strength in any way whatsoever, we are without the city of our refuge, the revenger of blood can reach us there. We may have been largely blessed in evangelizing work, but if our refuge is in our success, then the enemy can come and tempt us most severely, almost to despair, in any time when we are not successful. If the government is on His shoulder (Isa. 9 : 6), and the Lord Himself is then let success come, He has accomplished all; let failure come, we know the responsibility is with Him, and He will never let a soul suffer from our want of power while we rely upon Him. Equally if we know Him as our strength physically, it does not matter to us whether we feel weak or not; whatever He calls us to do, we can do, and we do not need to take iron and quinine, and travel hundreds of miles to get mountain air in order to be strong for our labor. He Himself is our Source of Strength, our Shechem.

The next city chosen was Hebron (fellowship). "God is faithful by whom ye were called unto the fellowship of His Son Jesus Christ our Lord" (1 Cor. 1 : 9); "that which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you that ye also may have fellowship with us; and truly our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ." "If we walk in the light as He is in the light, we have fellowship, one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin" (1 John 1 : 3, 7). It is almost inconceivable that the infinite God should call partnership, community of being and of possession with Himself, yet so it is. Our God not only gives to us, but is willing to take in exchange; not only throws Himself into all which concerns us, but calls out our hearts in that which concerns Him! He calls us to an interchange of affection, of thought. But this exists only as we walk in the light. "If we say that we have fellowship with Him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth." Whether the darkness is that of actual and wilful sin, or whether that of doubt, which is the sin of unbelief, darkness always separates from God; the revenger of blood can overtake us whenever there is darkness upon our souls; but in fellowship with God we are within the walls of the city of our refuge, safe from harm. These three cities were all in Canaan, Kedesh in Galilee, Hebron in Judah, and Shechem midway between.

"And on the other side Jordan by Jericho eastward, they assigned Bezer in the wilderness upon the plain out of the tribe of Reuben, and Ramoth in Gilead out of the tribe of Gad, and Golan in Bashan out of the tribe of Manasseh." Bezer means "fortress" as well as "the ore of gold or silver." David calls God his fortress, and Paul calls on the Ephesians and Timothy to be "strong in the Lord" (Eph. 6 : 10; 11 Tim. 2 : 1). Surrounded on all sides by God, we are impregnable, found in Him by the tempter, we cannot be overcome. When the enemy of souls finds us hedged and walled round by God, his attempts are useless. He tries to awaken pride, envy, discontent, but finds no entrance, for encompassed by God there is no weak part where he can get in. When Satan discovers us in ourselves, occupied with self, considering self, we are not in the fortress, and the avenger of blood can reach us.

The next city was Ramoth in Gilead. Ramoth means "height or ELEVATION."

Thank God He has made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus (Eph. 2 : 6), and thank God our citizenship is in heaven (Phil. 3 : 20). Thus, it is most unbecoming, indeed it is just impossible, if we take our right place, to set our affections on things on the earth. If it really makes any matter to us how our houses are furnished, and what people think of us, and whether they appreciate us, and whether we get our rights, it is most clear that we are sitting not in heavenly places, but in the same earthly places where unsaved people sit. Ramoth was in Gilead, which means "witness or testimony." And when, not only in our standing given us by God in Christ, but also in our experience, we are accepting and living out the sitting in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, there is a testimony for God which unbelievers cannot fail to recognize; they see that God, our High Place, is indeed a city of refuge for us.

The name of the sixth and last city was Golan, which means as well as "exile." When God is our joy, and we know what it is to rejoice in the Lord, not in His gifts, but in Himself, and that, independently of all circumstances, we find how truly God our joy is a city of refuge for us. The joy of the Lord is our strength (Neh. 8 : 10), and as partakers of His joy we can joy in tribulations also. He gives us part with Him, and when His joy is in us, then our joy is full (John 15 : 8). None have such a hard time of it as those who are occupied in providing their own pleasure, they are doomed to disappointment, but the Lord is a Refuge for us, even in the joy of His service. He is one great city of refuge, combining in Himself holiness, strength, fellowship, our fortress, high place, and joy.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Anglo-French Difficulty Arising Out of the bombardment of Tamatave, in Madagascar, had not been settled at the close of last week. France had made no apology to England for the indignity to the English Consul, and the severance of communications between the man-of-war and the island. There are, however, indications that the difficulty will be eventually arranged, as a more conciliatory attitude has been assumed by the French Government. Referring to the subject in the Chamber of Deputies, M. Challemel-Lacour said he believed there had been at least an exaggeration in the accounts of the occurrences in Madagascar. He was certain that if Admiral Pierre had adopted any measures they had been necessary, and that Admiral Pierre had complied with orders to avoid offending England. He declared that unexplained events could not impair the present good relations between France and England. If a grave error had been committed or passion manifested, the French Government would not hesitate to fulfil the obligations imposed by a sense of justice and the interests of the country. It is also stated that the steps taken in hauling down the consular flags was not intended as any insult to the several countries represented, but simply as a notice that the power of the Malagasy sovereignty at Tamatave was at an end, and that the Consuls before they could again exercise their functions must be reaccredited to the French Government. This is no more than any other country would have done under the circumstances. It appears that the original dispatch was written by Andriwisa, the Malagasy Secretary, and was purposely colored, in the hope of producing a rupture between France and England.

The Opposition to the Second Suez Canal scheme is still maintained in England. Mr. Gladstone apparently apprehends a government defeat in Parliament, and has sent Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson to Paris to try to obtain better terms for England from M. de Lesseps. The concessions he will ask M. Lesseps to grant are that the number of British directors of the Suez Canal Company be increased from three to five, that the number of British members on the Committee on Finances be increased to three, and that the company have an office in London. Even if these should be granted, it is not likely to disarm the opposition of the Conservatives, who contend that Mr. Gladstone's blunder is one of principle in conceding the monopoly to France.

The International Rifle Competition was an object of keen interest on both sides the Atlantic last week. The American team of twelve, picked marksmen, won high praise for precision in their shooting at Wimbledon, England. At the shorter distances of two, six and eight hundred yards, the Americans easily proved their superiority to their English competitors, but when the shooting commenced at nine hundred yards there was a heavy downpour of rain, and in the discomfort of the ground and the murky atmosphere the American score fell. The British made up their lost ground, and when the shooting at one thousand yards was over they led on the total score by forty-five points. The Americans were very cordially welcomed in Great Britain, and were warmly cheered as they received from the Duchess of Teck certain silver trophies won by individual members of the team. A hope was expressed that the competition would be renewed next year.

The Attitude of France Toward Tonquin was defined by M. Challemel-Lacour, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, last week. He informed the Chambers that there had been no declaration of war on either side nor any blockade of Annamese ports, but if any Power supplied Annam with ammunition a blockade would be promptly declared. In conclusion, the Foreign Minister said: "Although there is not open war, yet all the acts and language of Tuduc, and likewise of China and her ambassadors, have been such that we must consider ourselves at war with Annam. If we are unable to restore order in Tonquin without attacking Annam, we shall not hesitate to ask the necessary powers of Parliament. But we have not yet arrived at that point. We are determined to avenge the insult to our arms and the outrages committed on the bodies of our soldiers."

The Trial of the Jews in Hungary who are charged with murdering a Christian girl to obtain blood for the Passover cakes was continued last week. As it proceeds, the animus of the prosecutors becomes more apparent, and proves that the charge is a wicked plot having no basis of truth. The witnesses for the defence have been brutally tortured, and the witnesses for the prosecution gave their evidence under threats of ill-treatment and financial ruin. Several of them have admitted that they gave their evidence to save their lives and property. The falsity of the charge was proven on Wednesday, when the boy witness, Moritz Scharf, was compelled to look through the keyhole in the door of the synagogue through which he alleges that he saw the murder committed. It was shown that he could by so doing only see one person in the interior at a time, and that he could in no way have witnessed the actions of the group of people whom he alleges he saw murdering the girl. The surroundings of the trial show that a very bitter feeling against the Jews exists in Hungary.

Mr. Bradlaugh, the Atheist Member of Parliament, is again before the public. He has applied to the Court of Chancery for an injunction to restrain the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Commons from ejecting him in the attempt he contemplates making to take his seat. The House instructed the Sergeant-at-Arms to resist the suit, and ordered the Attorney-General, Sir Henry James, to appear for him. As Sir Henry James voted for the affirmation bill and is in favor of Mr. Bradlaugh being allowed to take the seat to which he has been elected, his position in the Court of Chancery will be an embarrassing one.

The Influence of Mr. Parnell in Ireland and the antagonism of the Irish to English rule continue unimpaired. A clear evidence of the fact is furnished by an election of a Member of Parliament for Wexford. That constituency rejected by an overwhelming majority the O'Connor Don, a candidate of Irish birth, a Roman Catholic and a Liberal, and elected a man far less eminent who had no recommendation but that he was the candidate of Mr. Parnell and a hater of England. The event is ominous, because it proves that the concessions made by the English Government have failed in their pacificatory intention. At the next election, if the present state of feeling continues, Mr. Parnell will have from seventy to eighty supporters in the House of Commons, and with this force can produce a legislative deadlock. The two great political parties in the House are generally almost equal in numbers, and the Irish brigade will be able to defeat any administration that may be in power.

The Ravages of the Cholera in Egypt Continue unchecked. It is now doing its fatal work with terrible force in Cairo, and several deaths from the disease have occurred in Alexandria. Business is entirely suspended, and a panic prevails. The Egyptians do not understand the principle of the cordon established around infected cities by Colonel Baker, and the rich break through it by bribery, and the poor by treachery and violence, and carry the infection to other districts. The true facts are, it appears, unreported. A newspaper correspondent states that twelve deaths occurred in one quarter of the city of Cairo in a single half hour on July 18th. The same correspondent describes the carelessness of the Egyptian Government, and urges that from motives of common humanity England ought, until the crisis is past, to exercise the functions of government. As a specimen of the negligence of the authorities, he states that while a man stricken with cholera was on his way on July 19th in a cart to the hospital, the driver stopped opposite a café and gave the invalid a drink from the water-bottle used by customers of the place. A few minutes afterward the sick man died opposite the largest café in Cairo. The only precaution taken in this case was to sprinkle a little chloride of lime on the corpse. The cart then pursued its way. The simplest sanitary arrangements are neglected. The funeral system is most obnoxious. The corpses, encased in very slight coffins, are carried through the crowded streets on men's shoulders. The clothes of persons dying in the hospitals are often stripped off and taken for wearing purposes by relatives. Until proper precautions are adopted and enforced, there will be no hope of checking the spread of the plague. On Saturday 662 deaths were reported, of which 381 occurred in Cairo.

An Attempt to Heal the Breaches in the Liberal party in England has been made by Mr. Chamberlain, the leader of the Radical wing. His speech at the celebration in Birmingham, in honor of Mr. Bright, caused serious dissension in the party, owing to his advocacy of equal electoral districts, a scheme which is stubbornly resisted by the more conservative members of the party. At a recent meeting of the Cobden Club in London, Mr. Chamberlain attempted to conciliate his colleagues by advocating unity and concession. He deprecated a peace-at-any-price policy, and insisted upon the wisdom of not interfering with cases like the American war. He said that the Radicals in England would make the greatest sacrifices to secure the unity of the Liberal party. They were willing to yield liberty of action for the present, but not liberty of opinion. The Radicals were the pioneers, and the unity of the party was undesirable at the price of their silence. Notwithstanding this waving of the olive branch, it is evident that the difference between the two wings of the party is serious, and the party is only kept from disintegration by the authority and prestige of Mr. Gladstone.

The Marquis of Lansdowne, the New Governor-General of Canada, expects to sail on October 11th for the Dominion. Lord Lorne will remain until his arrival, and will formally transfer to him the reins of government. An English journal describing the Marquis of Lansdowne says: "He has filled several offices with credit to himself and advantage to the country. He is industrious, clear-headed, and possessed of talents which give high promise of a large-minded and effective display of administrative capacity in a wider sphere than any he has hitherto occupied. His experience in actual daily contact with affairs has been supplemented by a tolerably long career in Parliament, where the qualities of courtesy and patience are severely tried. Lord Lansdowne has also shown that he is endowed with an independence of character which does not run into excess or drive him to irreconcilable antagonism."

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), for July, may be obtained at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price six cents, postage paid.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

The Sinking of the New Steamer "DAPHNE," at her Launching in the Clyde on July 3.

THE SINKING OF THE DAPHNE.

The Moment of the Launch—A Brief but Unavailing Struggle—The Probable Number on Board—The Cause of the Accident—Narratives of Eye-Witnesses: The Man with the Launching-Flag; A Graphic Description; Opposite the Appalling Scene—Touching Incident—Floating the Vessel.

THE shocking calamity in Scotland, briefly described by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 5th, has not diminished in horror as further details have become known. This week we give on the first page a picture of the terrible scene, with narratives of eye-witnesses.

A small steamer named the Daphne, 500 tons, built for the Glasgow and Londonderry Steam-packet Company, was being launched from the shipbuilding-yard of Messrs. Stephen and Sons, Linthouse, in which there is room for eleven ships and 3000 men are employed. It was intended for passenger traffic between Scotland and Ireland. At half-past eleven o'clock, on the morning of Tuesday, July 3d, the vessel moved off, when all impediments were cleared away; but when the vessel reached the water she showed a tendency to turn over. When quite clear of the ways, those on shore and on board two tugs, which were in attendance, observed the steamer heel right over, and commence to settle down in the water.

A BRIEF BUT UNAVAILING STRUGGLE.

As the Daphne fell over upon her side a great many of the men who were on the upper deck could be seen clinging to each other, and grasping at the rails, chains, or any of the deck-fittings that could afford a hold. There were but a few cries for help, owing to the suddenness of the disaster. In a few minutes the vessel had gone clean out of sight in the middle of the river, and nothing could be seen but a few men struggling in the water. Ropes were thrown to the drowning men, and the tugs and one or two boats that were in attendance did all they could to save the lives of those who were swimming around, but for those in the interior of the vessel nothing could be done.

Several of the eye-witnesses of the disaster state that one or two men, who were swimming about, and evidently making for the bank, were caught by their drowning comrades and dragged down. As soon as the workmen who were standing close to the end of the ways saw that the ship was really going down, spars and blocks of wood lying about were thrown into the river, and ropes were also thrown out to those who were struggling on the vessel. The tugs in attendance ventured as near as they could; but the danger of striking the men struggling in the water was so great that humanity forbade a too close approach. Two rowing-boats were brought into requisition, and by their means about a dozen men who clung to spars and pieces of wood were picked up. A few men were seen to scramble on to the keel of the vessel as she heeled over; but they quickly disappeared beneath the fast-flowing tide. It was not long, however, before the bodies of some of the dead rose to the surface, and they were reverently taken on board. On the day of the disaster about fifty corpses were thus recovered. The melancholy task of searching for the bodies was then intrusted to divers, who came to the conclusion on the following Thursday that no more would be found in the bed of the river, and that the remainder must be sought in the hold of the ship. That many were there was proved by the divers, who affirmed that when looking through the port-holes, they saw some of the corpses in the cabins.

The men engaged below deck at the time of the disaster were chiefly workmen employed in finishing the vessel. Very few of these were saved. The reason there was such a large number of workmen on board was that the owners were anxious that the vessel should go on the Irish passage during the Glasgow fair holidays in the autumn. There was also, it is said, a considerable amount of material on the deck, consisting of deck planks and iron plates, which had been removed for the purpose of allowing the boilers and engines to be put on board. The names of those who were at work on the vessel were known, but it is thought that there must have been some visitors present at the time who also lost their lives, but of whom no record was taken. It is usual at launches for strangers to be admitted to the yard, many of whom go on board the new vessel; and it is believed that in this instance several persons who were not in the employment of Messrs. Stephen met with an untimely death.

MANY OF THE VICTIMS UNMARRIED.

A notable circumstance in connection with the identification of the bodies was the absence of any vehement expression of grief on the part of the relatives. The comparatively small number of married men among those who were brought ashore may account to some extent for the lack of the heartrending scenes that usually are associated with such terrible catastrophes. The faces of the dead recovered looked as if they were asleep, and most of them had their eyes closed. A few had a look as if taken by surprise. One poor fellow had one hand raised above his brow and the other across his breast, and so stiff were his limbs that the body had to be removed in that position. Another man, the foreman joiner, was found by a diver with his rule in his right hand. When a body was found with a white apron bound round the waist, it was known to be that of a joiner, and identification was assisted.

THE CAUSE OF THE CATASTROPHE

is not certainly known, but it would seem as if the chains by which the velocity of the ship was checked on the way had not acted equally on both sides. On the port side the anchor fixed in the ground was dragged for a distance of about sixty yards, while on the starboard side the anchor was moved not more than six or seven yards. There had, apparently, been an undue strain on the port side, and that, possibly increased by the current in the river, is believed to have caused the ship to cant or turn over. The work of searching for the dead was continued till far into the night, and resumed at each ebb-tide.

NARRATIVES OF EYE-WITNESSES.

John Russell, a painter, said: "I had been working in the ship for about three hours. I was standing about midships on the port side when the ship left the ways. She went down all right, but immediately on getting clear of the ways she went right over, just as if she were top-heavy and had too little ballast. There were a lot of men standing about me at the time. When she went down I caught hold of the rail on the port side, and when I saw that she was going to heel right over, I turned, and went up the deck to the starboard side. I got over the rail, and jumped into the water. I am a good swimmer, and I swam toward the Govan side of the river. Getting near the shore I was almost run down by the tug Hotspur, which was crossing, but those on board saw me, and took me out of the water. They threw me a life-buoy, which I caught hold of. Another man, a rivetter, was in the water beside me at the time, and as he was much exhausted, and seemed to be sinking, I gave him the preference of the rope. We were then both pulled on board the Hotspur, and saved. The deck of the steamer was crowded with men, and there were a great many engineers and joiners working below. It is impossible that they can have been saved."

THE MAN WITH THE LAUNCHING FLAG.

Henry O'Farrell, a rivetter, said: "I was on board the vessel holding the launching flag. I heard the signal given to knock away the supports, and immediately the vessel moved off I noticed that she was going very smartly; but paid no particular attention to this until in taking the water the vessel heeled over to the port side. I threw the launching flag away, and thinking that perhaps the current had caused the vessel to capsize, I ran to the wheel along with the pilot. We worked hard at the wheel, so as to counteract what we thought was the effect of the current. We turned it round several times, but it did not do any good. The vessel was every moment going deeper down in the water. Getting alarmed for my safety, I jumped off the stern into the water. I managed to keep my head above water, and shortly afterward I was pulled on board one of the tugs which was assisting at the launch. I cannot say how many persons were on board; at the time of the accident there were a good many, the deck being quite crowded."

A GRAPHIC DESCRIPTION.

Mr. North, a shipbuilder, who was looking at the launch from the side of the river, described it in the following graphic terms: "When the supports were knocked down the vessel went at a great rate. After she took the water she went very deep by the stern, and then the check-chain caught her and pulled her up. I then saw that the ship was heeling over to the port side. She stood back a little, and again began to heel over. A second or so after the ports touched the water, and it began to pour in, and then the ship capsized right over, keel uppermost. The whole incident did not occupy more than three minutes from first to last. The sight was so shocking, so unprecedented, and unlooked-for, that I could hardly realize it. Just a moment or two before we had seen the vessel crowded with workmen start on her way, and now she had disappeared from view. When the men began to see their dangerous position some clambered on to the starboard side, and when she heeled right over a number managed to get on to the keel; but the crisis came so suddenly that many must have been jammed and entangled by the material lying about the vessel shifting as she lurched over. As she settled in the water the air bubbled up, and so continued for some minutes."

OPPOSITE THE APPALLING SCENE.

The accident was witnessed by hundreds of men employed in Barclay, Curles, & Co.'s shipbuilding yard, opposite the scene. One of them has furnished the following relation of what took place: "I was standing toward the yard. There was a considerable crowd of people along the embankment, chiefly boys and girls, and a number of persons also in Stephens's yard. They were, like myself, waiting to see the vessel launched. All was in readiness when the ship moved away, and some of the people cheered. She slid down the ways very evenly, and went into the water. No sooner had she got her own length into the stream than she canted and tumbled right over. In a moment or two she was clean out of sight, and she lay at the bottom. When she fell over, her whole crew of men and boys—there were a good many boys on board—tumbled along with her into the water. I saw them in a mass on the surface of the river, and I saw some taken down in the suction caused by the submersion. I noticed, too, that the wood and other stuff slid off the vessel as she was falling, and came down on some of the drowning men. It must have struck them heavily, because there was blood on some of those who got out safe.

"When the heap of the men were all struggling I heard some shrieks, and observed several sink under. Those who did not go down clung to pieces of wood and other débris which floated off from the deck when the accident happened. Two men were saved by hanging on to the smith's bellows. When the crowd were in the river I saw six poor fellows catching hold of each other. They held on for a few moments, and then separated, but I could not tell whether they were all saved or not. Then I saw three or four of them trying to climb up by the side of the vessel as she was going down; but they were obliged to give up the struggle. I think that everybody who witnessed the fearful sight from the shores was in a way paralyzed for the time, and did not know well what to do."

A TOUCHING INCIDENT.

The body of a young man named Telfer was among the first to be recovered. Mr. D. C. Donaldson, a temperance lecturer, saw the body measure, and He will cause to come down for you the rain, the former rain and the latter rain in the month when first it is needed." The former rain is explained in St. Peter's speech at Pentecost to be the outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2 : 17) : "This is that which was spoken of by Joel, It shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of My Spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams ; and on My servants and handmaidens I will pour out of My Spirit."

This promise of God, though fulfilled in part at the first Pentecost, is far from exhausted. "The last days" include the whole New Testament age, down to and including the return of the Lord in person.

Just as the three periods of natural rain in Palestine are connected by intermediate showers, so our last dispensation, which is that of the Holy Spirit, extends from the first outpouring of the Holy Spirit on Pentecost, which was the earnest and forerunning pledge, on through all the intermediate ages, interlinked by revivals from time to time, down to the close, at the Lord's Coming. Then there will be an outpouring which shall exceed all the preceding droppings of the rain from on high. Not merely on particular persons and scattered churches, but on ALL flesh. The word all marks that the prophecy has not yet been, in its fullest sense, accomplished. Prophecy and miracle-working will again be of the gifts of the Spirit. The first advent of Jesus, as "the Lord our Righteousness," was attended with the bestowal of the Spirit on His people "in due (or righteous) measure." After that period of "the former rain" there has succeeded "the copious winter rains" of the ages, past and present, including our own age. We are when there shall be the full outpouring of the Spirit, on Israel first, and then on the world at large "in the last days." The gift shall be universal in a sense not yet realized.

Now is the time of the regeneration of individuals ; then nations shall be spiritually born in one day, and Israel, the foremost of them (Isa. 66 : 8), "at once." She shall hereafter look for this revival. Hos. 6 : 2, 3 : "After two days will He revive us ; in the third day He will raise us up, and we shall live in His sight. Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord ; His going forth is prepared as the morning ; and He shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth." It will be the time of regeneration of the nations. The Jews have been the seedsmen of the elect church, which is being gathered out from Jews and Gentiles ; so shall they be the harvestmen of the coming world-wide church at Messiah's return. The Spirit shall be the mighty Worker of this regeneration of the world-nations, as He was and is the Regenerator of every member of the church of the first-born, from Pentecost till now.

MEANS OF OBTAINING IT.

II. What are the means of obtaining the promised blessing ? (1) God promises (Zech. 12 : 10), "I will pour upon the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem the spirit of grace and supplications, and they shall look upon Me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn." Our part is to plead God's promises in prayer. Israel, while unbelieving, will not pray for herself. We believers must pray for her.

THE POWER OF PRAYER.

As prayer is the first grand means of hastening the time of the latter rain, so the second means is (2) labor for the conversion of sinners. So St. Peter teaches us, "Repent and be converted, that the times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord, and that He may send Jesus Christ ;" so Acts 3 : 19, is in the Greek. There the times of refreshing by the Holy Spirit, and the coming of Jesus Christ from heaven in "the times of the restitution of all things," are represented as depending on the conversion of the elect and the completion of their full number.

PATIENT, LONG-SUFFFRING EXPECTATION of the Lord's coming (3) is a third means of obtaining the promise—James 5 : 7 : "Be patient unto the coming of the Lord ; behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain." We have received the early rain. What a precious earnest of assurance that we shall receive also the latter rain, and the consequent harvest of blessedness for ourselves, for Israel, and for the world-nations, if we faint not !

SIGNS OF THE COMING RAIN.

III. This leads me to the signs of the coming latter rain. It is "when the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him." Then "the Redeemer shall come to Zion, to turn away ungodliness from Jacob." (Isa. 59 : 20 ; Rom. 11 : 26). Then Jehovah will fulfil His covenant with Messiah and Messiah's seed : "My Spirit that is upon Thee, shall not depart out of the mouth of Thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, henceforth and forever." The first sign I would mention is the need which the world and Israel have at this present crisis that the Spirit of God should be poured down. The "three unclean spirits" are notoriously manifested now (as foretold Rev. 16 : 13–14) ; infidelity out of the mouth of the "dragon ;" lawlessness and open defiance of all, authority out of the mouth of the "beast ;" and lying spiritualism out of the mouth of the false prophet. Socialism, anarchy, nihilism, and assassination, whether by gun, dagger, or dynamite, are threatening the very basis of society. No God, no devil, no king, no magistrate, no law, no capitalist—such are the beatitudes of the kingdom which is at hand.

THE "BEAST" AND THE "HARLOT."

The Beast—i.e., the Godless world-power, is more and more casting off "the harlot" that has ridden her (Rev. 17). The harlot is the whole of apostate Christendom, with Rome at her front. That the harlot is not restricted to Rome is proved by the very same words (Rev. 18 : 24), being used of her as Christ used of the whole Old Testament Church (Matt. 23 : 35) : "That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from righteous Abel to Zacharias." 'In her was found the blood of prophets, saints, and all that were slain upon the earth." In Protestant Berlin the Kreutz Zeitung moralizes on the annual Busstag, or national Fast-day, "The churches were the very last place of public resort ; the beer gardens drove a roaring trade. If we look at the moral condition of our country, must we not be horrified in our inmost soul ? What frightful barbarization, coarseness, bestiality ! Not a few are taking their places at the head of their brothers, the animals !

'HOW GREAT IS THE FALLING AWAY from the living God and from His Church ! How many live without prayer, God's Word and sacrament, and think they have made great progress in being able to live outside the shadow of His house ! Materialism and Paganism dominate among the educated, and still more among the uneducated." The elect church, the Bride, shall be withdrawn to her Lord, and for a brief season the lawless son of perdition shall sway the apostate world. The signs abroad show we are on the eve of it. Therefore, also, we are nearing the time of the outpouring of the Spirit first on Israel, then on the world-nations.

THE PRESENT SPIRITUAL VISITATION.

Another sign is—as the Spirit of Christ in Noah, and previously in Enoch, preached to men one last offer before the flood, so now we are in the midst of showers of the Spirit, pleading with sinners before our election dispensation shall close. Never since Pentecost and the Reformation era has there been a greater evangelistic movement than in our days, realizing the prophecy just before the fall of the harlot Babylon, and the beast, the last Antichrist, "I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach to every nation" (Rev. 14 : 6). And Christ saith, "When this Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached for a witness unto all nations, the end shall come" (Matt. 24 : 14).

THE "SET TIME" COME.

Another sign, the last I shall mention to quicken our prayers, is Ps. 102 : 13, where the "set time" for God's mercy on Zion is defined. "Thou shalt arise and have mercy upon Zion ; for the time to favor her, yea, the set time is come. For thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof. He will regard the prayer of the destitute." Now this is the first time since Jerusalem's overthrow when there has been a learned and laborious research into her ruined stones, such as has issued in the most confirming to the letter the Word of God ; the Moabite stone, the Levitical stone of Gezer, the partition stone between the Israelite and the Gentile courts of the Temple, the Siloam stone, and others.

All these are to assure us this is especially the time to pray for the outpouring of the Spirit of Israel and the world, "Ask ye of the Lord rain in the time of the latter rain" (Zech. 10 : 1). The consummation shall be when the Jews themselves shall be stirred by the Spirit to pray.

EFFECTS OF THE RAIN.

IV. The effects of the outpouring of the latter rain upon Israel. The veil shall be taken away, which is now upon their heart, whenever Moses is read (II. Cor. 3 : 15, 16) ; the Spirit of the Lord will give them liberty from their bondage to the dead letter. Then, as the consequence, "Jehovah will destroy the veil that is spread over all nations" (Isa. 25 : 7). A new period of revelation shall begin, which has been silent so long as Israel, God's chosen mediator of revelation, and of establishing His kingdom on earth, has been in the background. Society will be pervaded by the Spirit of Christ ; so that art, music, and science, instead of drawing off the soul from God, shall be the handmaids of spiritual worship. Instead of the harlot church, and the beast world-power, energized by the god of this world, there will be the Bride, the transfigured church with Christ reigning in the heavenlies over Israel, and over the nations freed from the presence of Satan, who shall be chained a thousand years. The prophecy (Ezek. 37 : 9, 10, 14, 16, 17, 19) shall be fulfilled of Judah's union with the ten lost tribes, when "Jehovah shall put His Spirit in them, and they shall live." The living waters shall then issue from under the temple at Jerusalem : "And everything shall live whither the river cometh" (47 : 1–9). So the conversion of the nations, which, in vain, men expect to effect by preaching now, shall be effected by the Holy Spirit being poured out on a world-wide scale. "The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (Isa. 11 : 9). "When the Lord shall send the rod of His strength out of Zion, His people shall be willing in the day of His power" (Psa. 110 : 3). "The receiving of Israel shall be life from the dead" to the Gentile world (Rom. 11 : 15). Surely these truths are well calculated to cheer and stimulate us on our heavenward way. The present world-course is soon to end ; the new and better age is fast approaching. "We," according to Christ's promise, "look for the new heavens and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

O scenes surpassing fable and yet true ! scenes of accomplished bliss ! Which, who can see,
Though but in distant prospect, and not feel his soul refreshed with foretaste of the joy ?
Haste then, and wheel away a shattered world, ye slow revolving seasons.
Come then, and, added to thy many crowns, receive yet one, the crown of all the earth :
Thou who alone art worthy ! It was Thine by ancient covenant, ere nature's birth :
And Thou hast made it Thine by purchase since, and overpaid its value with Thy blood.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Strike of the Telegraph Operators was maintained last week without material change in the situation. The only event of importance which occurred was in favor of the operators. The American Rapid Telegraph Company had a conference on July 25th with representatives of the operators, at which mutual concessions were made, and an arrangement concluded satisfactory to both parties. The exact terms were not made known, but it was generally understood that the company had agreed to pay an advance of ten per cent and to accept eight hours' service as a day's work. Three hundred operators commenced work on Thursday morning. The Western Union and the Baltimore and Ohio companies still refused to negotiate at the close of last week, and complaints of defective service came from all parts of the country. In some places suits are threatened against the Western Union Company for failure to deliver messages. If these are pressed, there is a probability of the company being mulcted in heavy damages, as their charter expressly stipulates under penalties that continuous service shall be rendered by the company in return for the privileges they enjoy. Beside this, it is reported that the company is losing heavily by the falling off of business consequent on the public knowledge that it is uncertain when messages will be delivered. It was stated on Thursday that General Hazen had offered to help the Western Union by lending them some government operators, but the report was probably false. It is possible that General Hazen may sympathize with the monopoly, but he would scarcely be so rash as to incur the odium which would attach to him throughout the whole country if he lent them government assistance. In the present excited state of public feeling such an offer would arouse a storm of indignation which a more popular man than General Hazen might well fear to meet. The operators and linemen are conducting themselves with commendable moderation. The companies naturally feared that their wires would be cut, but the Telegraphers' Brotherhood guaranteed the safety of the companies' property, and pledged their assistance in the event of damage being done, in the detection of the offenders.

The Ohio State Convention Summoned to Arrange a non partisan temperance campaign assembled at Columbus on July 24th. It was attended by 500 delegates. The object of the convention was to form an organization in which all can vote their respective party State tickets and concentrate on the amendment. Mr. Campbell, of Topeka, Kan., attended, and gave an explanation of the plan which succeeded in Kansas, and it was decided to adopt that system in Ohio; a campaign fund was commenced, and a canvasser was assigned for each county. Reports were heard from local organizations, churches, conferences, and Sunday-schools, pledging their co-operation, and a resolution was adopted to co-operate with the Women's National Christian Temperance Union. It was decided to form an Executive Committee of one from each of the twenty-one congressional districts, and a State Central Committee consisting of one from each of the eighty-eight counties, who will have auxiliaries to co-operate with them in townships, villages, and school districts. Some leading men of the Republican and Democratic parties are on these committees.

The Virginia Democratic Convention, which assembled at Lynchburg, on July 25th, has elected to fight the campaign on the tariff issue. The Republicans are pledged to protection, while the Democrats incorporated in their platform the following resolution: "We favor a tariff for revenue limited to the necessities of a government economically administered, and so adjusted in its application as to prevent unequal burdens, encourage productive interests at home, and afford just compensation to labor, but not to create or foster monopolies." The convention pledged itself to the education of the colored children, accepted as final the settlement of the debt question arranged by Senator Mahone and his party lately, and demanded "the unconditional and immediate abolition of the Internal Revenue system." Congressman Barbour was made campaign manager, and it is expected that the contest will be a severe one.

The Prospect of Success for the Temperance party in Iowa this fall is considered hopeful by those engaged in the work. A correspondent in that State writes us that he believes a majority of nearly fifty thousand votes will be secured for the party pledged to carry through the Prohibition Amendment. He bases his estimate on the fact that although the party lacked the support of the press and influential politicians, 30,000 majority was polled when the amendment was carried; there is good reason for hoping that this year when both those forces co-operate the majority will be largely increased. That, of course, depends on the continued support of those who voted for prohibition before. The country is interested in the struggle in Iowa, and every temperance man in the State should feel that it is his imperative duty to register and vote without fail.

Captain Webb, the Noted Swimmer, has Lost his life in an attempt to swim the whirlpool at Niagara Falls. Captain Webb's extraordinary feats in swimming are well known all over the world, but when it was announced that he intended to swim the Rapids at Niagara scarcely any one believed that he would be rash enough to make the attempt. On Tuesday, July 24th, he hired a boatman to take him as far as he dared on the river. The boatman rowed him to a point in the river opposite the old Maid of the Mist landing, and there Captain Webb, divesting himself of his clothing, plunged into the river. He shot the big rapids successfully, and when entering the neck of the whirlpool below was observed to glance triumphantly at each shore. He was rushed to the American side, where the waves are forty feet high. He was then observed to throw up his arm as if making a signal of distress, and was not seen alive again. On Saturday his dead body was found about six miles from the whirlpool. It was wounded in many places, one severe wound on the top of the head penetrating the brain. Until a post-mortem examination is had it cannot be ascertained whether the daring swimmer lost his life by the crushing weight of water, or whether he dived and struck his head upon a rock. Captain Webb was an Englishman thirty-five years of age. He held several medals presented to him for saving the lives of drowning persons. In 1875 he accomplished the unprecedented feat of swimming from England to France at the Straits of Dover.

The Death of the Hon. Montgomery Blair on July 26th removes an historical figure from public life. Judge Blair was seventy years of age. He was Postmaster-General in President Lincoln's Cabinet, having previously held the office of United States District Attorney for Missouri, which he resigned to become a judge of the Court of Common Pleas. He was a member of the Democratic party until the repeal of the Missouri compromise, when he joined the Republicans, and President Buchanan removed him from office. Mr. Lincoln made him Postmaster-General in 1861, and he held the office until 1864. During his term of office he introduced many improvements in the service. Among them were the free delivery in cities, and the money-order system. Judge Blair left the Cabinet on account of dissensions caused by his conservatism, and again became a Democratic leader. It was Judge Blair who wrote the famous memorial to Congress, denouncing the counting in of Mr. Hayes in 1876.

The Distressing Calamity near Baltimore, which occurred on July 24th, has carried desolation into many homes. An excursion party numbering more than a thousand persons left Baltimore for Tivoli, a distance of about thirteen miles. They were conveyed thither in a barge, and at night the barge made two trips back to Baltimore, carrying each time some of the excursionists. She arrived at Tivoli about nine o'clock for her third and last complement. There was a rush for places, and the little pier was crowded with eager people struggling to get on board. The managers of the excursion, fearing that some accident would take place, begged the people to keep back, as there would be room for all, but no heed was paid to them. The crushing was continued, and at last the pier could support the strain no longer and the end farthest from the shore fell into the water, carrying with it its living load. The scene was terrible. By the light of a few lanterns people could be seen struggling with each other and clutching at the debris of the pier or anything that would keep them afloat. Several heroic young men belonging to the party threw off their outer clothing and jumped into the water, and by their means many were rescued; but in spite of their efforts at least sixty-five persons were drowned. Many of these were women and children; in several cases an entire family has been wiped out.

The General Synod of the Reformed Church has taken a decided action on the temperance question. At its recent session the following resolution was adopted: "Resolved, That the distress growing out of intemperance is so great, that it is the judgment of this Synod that the sanctity and prosperity of the Church as well as society demand a hearty co-operation of all Christians in such wise action, which will eventually give prohibition and suppression of intoxicating drinks as a beverage." This is of very great importance, when we take into consideration that the Reformed Church of America wields a powerful influence among the foreign born nationality (especially among the Dutch), who are very numerous in many sections of the country.

We Gratefully Acknowledge the Receipt of $2.80 from Mr. John Shindler in aid of the Blue Ribbon Gospel Army, of which Rev. M. Baxter is President. Also from a subscriber in Tennessee of $5 for the same cause, and $5 for foreign missions.

A Good Investment has been Made by a young man in Tennessee. Three years ago, a young married man bought four lots in one of the cities of that State, on one, two, and three years' time. When the first note became due, he had a cash offer for two of the lots, which would meet the entire amount paid for the four. It was accepted, the original purchaser thus becoming the owner of two desirable lots without paying a cent. Property continued to increase in value, and about four months ago one of the two remaining lots was sold for $1600, which was immediately used in erecting a neat brick residence on the fourth lot. The purchaser thus secured a home now worth over $3000 by a wise investment, and has not paid for it a dollar, except the profits on the original purchase. It is seldom that such opportunities for investment occur, but when they do they are quickly seized. It is strange that men should seize such chances with avidity, and yet should so generally neglect the opportunity offered them in the Gospel of an everlasting possession (II Cor. 5 : 1).

A Cupola Papered with Bank Bills was found on a mansion recently removed from a street in Grand Rapids, Mich., to another location. The house was formerly the property of a gentleman who attempted to establish a bank. The enterprise failed, owing to the proprietors being unable to meet the requirements of the law in coin deposits, and the bank passed into the hands of a receiver before it had actually commenced business. The leading projector suffered considerable loss, and his chagrin at his failure was intense. He had a large number of unsigned one, two and five dollar bills on hand, and with these he papered the walls of the cupola-room in his house, that he might never be without a reminder of his folly. Most men are glad to forget as soon as possible any blunder they have made, but this man probably knew enough of his own character to be aware that such a memento might be useful to him as a beacon for the future. Happy are they who so remember their sins, not with apprehension, but with detestation and a resolve in God's strength against their repetition (1 Peter 4 : 3).

A Bird's Nest on a Locomotive of the New York Central Railroad has attracted considerable attention from passengers and employés of the road. The Ithaca Journal states that a robin has built its nest on the main frame of engine No. 340 of the Central Railroad, between the left forward driving spring hanger and a cross brace. The engine runs daily between Rochester and De Witt. The bird during the building of the nest kept faithfully at work, as circumstances permitted, and, having completed the nest, she now occupies it, even when the engine is running. It is the strangest of places for a bird to select for her nest, but as she continues to occupy it, it may be supposed that it suits her. She has apparently satisfied herself that, though in the midst of vibration and turmoil, she is secure. It might be well if anxious and distressed Christians would study the lessons of the robin's life. With dangers and trials all around them God is able to keep them safely (Isa. 26 : 3).

An Infidel's Treasures were Described last week at the Fulton Street Prayer-meeting, by one who had seen them. Dr. G. D. Dowknott, of the Medical Mission, said : "An old man had been attending the Gospel meetings held in Roosevelt Street with blessed results. He came to us for medicine and medical advice. This was given. Something was then said to him about his soul, but he would not listen. He was an infidel, he said. But the missionary did not give him up. The poor man was induced to attend the Gospel services. His infidelity soon gave way, and he gives bright evidence of having experienced a change of heart. He recently brought to the mission an old hymn-book, and a little religious story-book, which he had kept for forty years hidden away among his few possessions. They were precious in the childhood days, when the heart never doubted, and in spite of his avowed infidelity he could not tear these up. Iconoclast as he deemed himself, these little keepsakes of the old-time faith of more than forty years ago he could not destroy. There was something sacred about them, ay, and perhaps, after all, something true."

A Curious Discovery of a Diamond Fraud was made by a photographer in Boston, recently. A diamond expert was offered a very large stone for eight thousand dollars. He applied to it all the tests used in the trade, and was satisfied that it was genuine. After he had purchased it, some circumstances occurred which led him to suspect that he had been cheated, notwithstanding the apparent genuineness of the diamond. He took the stone to a photographer, and asked him to send a ray of sunlight through it with his camera. Then it was discovered that there was an obstruction in the stone. A ray which passed through other diamonds clear and straight was stopped in the suspected stone. A powerful microscope was used upon it, and it was discovered that the obstruction was some cement which joined two small stones together, the two forming the magnificent gem the merchant had bought. The two stones were separated by chemicals, and were then worth about six hundred dollars each. There are many people who succeed in passing the tests of ministers and churches, who, when the clear light of God's throne falls upon them in the day of judgment, will be found fraudulent professors (1 Cor. 3 : 13).

A Number of Employes have been Discharged by a large manufacturing company in Connecticut because they are unable to read and write. Some of them have been in the employ of the company a long time, and it is stated they are able to perform efficiently the duties required of them, although they are ignorant of reading and writing. The company has been charged with harshness in discharging these people, and until all the circumstances were known there appeared to be grounds for the charge. It appears, however, that a year ago the company advertised that after the lapse of one year from date no person would be retained by the corporation who could not read and write, and those who were deficient in these branches were given an opportunity to learn by the establishment of night schools with competent instructors. It thus appears that the discharged employes might have continued in the service if they had availed themselves of the facilities provided for them, and therefore have only themselves to blame for losing their situations. In a far more important matter men will be similarly placed at the last great day (Heb. 2 : 3).

A Genuine Act of Christian Kindness was performed on July 19th in New York. There are living in the city a number of educated, refined people, whom scarcely any one knows. From a variety of causes they have fallen into extreme poverty, although in a time not so very long ago they had abundance of money. During the extreme heat of the past few weeks their poverty has been a trial, for although they bear their lot with Christian patience, it is impossible that, living in their crowded tenements, they should not sometimes long for a breath of pure sea-air such as they were accustomed to enjoy in their days of prosperity. Working among this little community is a Christian missionary, whose modesty prompts him to withhold his name, but who has done much for their spiritual good. Recently he mentioned the circumstances to one or two wealthy Christians, who generously placed at his disposal funds for their benefit. These were expended in taking a party of ninety to Coney Island on July 19th. There, by the kindness of a hotel proprietor, they enjoyed an excellent dinner and spent a pleasant day. Aged members of the party, at least one of whom is nearly ninety years of age, were gladdened and refreshed by the excursion. The cost was comparatively small, and we mention the matter in the hope that a similar good work may be done in other cities (Luke 14 : 13, 14).

"BEGINNING AT JERUSALEM."

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon

"And that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem."—LUKE 24 : 47.

Modern Teachers—The Cultured School—The Disciples Obedient—I. What they were to Preach—An Old-Fashioned Virtue—An Irreversible Blessing—II. Where it is to be Preached—The Iron Duke's Question—III. How to Preach it—In Christ's Name—On His Authority—IV. Where to Begin—At Jerusalem—Why—So Predicted—The Scene of the Passion—Danger of Despising Jews—A Difficult Place—A Lady's Invitation—At Home—Where much has been Done—Where Time Presses—Where there will be Opposition—Where the Biggest Sinners were.

THE servants of God were not left to originate a Gospel for themselves, as certain modern teachers appear to do, nor were they even left to map out their mode of procedure in the spreading of the glad tidings. They were told by their great Master what to preach, and where to preach it, and how to preach it, and even where to begin to preach it. There is ample room for the exercise of our thought in obeying Christ's commands ; but the worldly wise in these days call no one a thoughtful person who is content to be a docile follower of Jesus. They call themselves "thoughtful and cultured" simply because they set up their own thoughts in opposition to the thoughts of God. It were well if they would remember the old proverb—"Let another praise thee, and not thine own lips."

I. Ye that would faithfully serve Christ note carefully how He taught His disciples

WHAT THEY WERE TO PREACH.

We find different descriptions of the subject of our preaching, but on this occasion it is comprised in two things—repentance and remission of sins. I am glad to find in this verse that old-fashioned virtue called repentance. It used to be preached, but it has gone out of fashion now. Indeed, we are told that we always misunderstood the meaning of the word "repentance ;" and that it simply means a "change of mind," and nothing more. I wish that those who are so wise in their Greek knew a little more of that language, for they would not be so ready with their infallible statements. True, the word does signify a change of mind, but in its scriptural connection it indicates a change of mind of an unusual character. It is not such a fitful thing as men mean when they speak of changing their minds, as some people do fifty times a day ; but it is a change of mind of a deeper kind.

Gospel repentance is a change of mind of the most radical sort—such a change as never was wrought in any man except by the Spirit of God. We mean to teach repentance, the old-fashioned repentance, too ; and I do not know a better description of it than the child's verse :

"Repentance is to leave
The things we loved before,
And show that we in earnest grieve
By doing so no more."

Let every man understand that he will never have remission of sin while he is in love with sin ; and that if he abides in sin he cannot obtain the pardon of sin. There must be a hatred of sin, a loathing of it, and a turning from it, or it is not blotted out. We are to preach repentance as a duty. We are to preach the acceptableness of repentance. We are also to preach the motives of repentance—that men may not repent from mere fear of hell, but they must repent of sin itself. We are to preach repentance in its perpetuity. Repentance is not a grace which is only to be exercised by us for a week or so at the beginning of our Christian career ; it is to attend us all the way to heaven. Faith and repentance are to be inseparable companions throughout our pilgrimage to glory. We are to tell them of the source of repentance, namely, that the Lord Jesus Christ is exalted on high to give repentance and remission of sins.

Our second theme is to be remission of sins.

What a blessed subject is this! To preach the full pardon of sin—that it is blotted out once for all; the free pardon of sin—that God forgives voluntarily of His own grace; free forgiveness for the very chief of sinners for all their sins, however black they may be; is not this a grand subject? Now, this is what we are to preach—free, full, irreversible pardon for all that repent of sin, and lay hold on Christ by faith. O servants of the Lord, be not ashamed to declare it, for this is your message!

II. Next to this, we are told

WHERE IT IS TO BE PREACHED.

The text says that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name among all nations. Here, then, we have the divine warrant for missions. They are no speculations or enthusiastic dreams; they are matters of divine command. I dare say you have heard of what the Duke of Wellington said to a missionary in India who was questioning whether it was of any use to preach the Gospel to the Hindoos. "What are your marching orders?" said this man of discipline and obedience. "What are your marching orders?" that is the deciding question. Now the marching orders are, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." What a wonder it is that the church did not see this long before.

III. But this is not all. We are actually told

HOW TO PREACH IT.

Repentance and remission are to be preached in Christ's name. What does this mean? Ought we not to learn from this that we are to tell the Gospel to others, because Christ orders us to do so? In Christ's name we must do it. Silence is sin when salvation is the theme. If these should hold their peace, the stones would cry out against them. My brethren, you must proclaim the Gospel according to your ability; it is not a thing which you may do or may not do at your own discretion; but you must do it if you have any respect for your Saviour's name. If you dare pray in that name, if you dare hope in that name, if you hear the music of joy in that name, then in the name of Jesus Christ preach the Gospel in every land.

But it means more than that. Not only preach it under His orders, but preach it on His authority. The true servant of Christ has his Master to back him up. The Lord Jesus will seal by threatening or by grace the word of His faithful messengers. If we threaten the ungodly, the threatening shall be fulfilled. If we announce God's promise to the penitent, that promise shall be surely kept. The Lord Jesus will not let the words of His own ambassadors fall to the ground. "Lo, I am with you alway," says He, "even to the end of the world. Go ye therefore and teach all nations." You have Christ with you; teach the nations by His authority.

But does it not mean, also, that the repentance and the remission which are so bound together come to men by virtue of His name? O sinner, there would be no acceptance of your repentance if it were not for that dear name! That name has a fulness of saving efficacy, and if you will but rest in it, you shall find salvation, and find it now.

Be sure, then, that you preach in Christ's name. If you preach in your own name it is poor work. A man says to me, "I cannot tell a dead sinner to live. I cannot tell a blind sinner to see. I cannot invite an insensible sinner; it is absurd; for the sinner is altogether without strength." No, dear sir, I do not suppose you can do so while you speak according to carnal reason. Does the good man say that God has not sent him to bid the dead arise? Then let him not do it. Pray let him not try to do what God never sent him to do. Let him go home and go to bed; he will probably do as much good asleep as awake. But as for me, I am sent to preach in Jesus' name, "Believe and live," and therefore I am not slow to do so. I am sent on purpose to say, "Ye dry bones, live," and I dare do no otherwise. No faithful minister who knows what faith means looks to the sinner for power to believe, or looks to himself for power; but he looks to the Master that sent him for power; and in the name of Christ he says to the withered hand, "Be stretched out," and he says to the dead, "Come forth!" and he does not speak in vain.

IV. Now, I shall ask your attention to the principal topic of the present discourse, and that is, that He told His disciples

WHERE TO BEGIN.

I have heard of a Puritan who had in his sermon forty-five main divisions, and about ten subdivisions under every head. He might be said largely to divide the word of truth, even if he did not rightly divide it. Now, I have nine subheads to-night, and yet I hope I shall not detain you beyond the usual time. I cannot make fewer of them and give the full meaning of this sentence, "Beginning at Jerusalem." The apostles were not to pick and choose where they should start, but they were to begin at Jerusalem. Why?

First, because it was written in the Scriptures that they were to begin at Jerusalem; "Thus it is written, and thus it behoves, that repentance and remission of sin should be preached in His name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem." It was so written; I will give you two or three proofs. Read in the second chapter of Isaiah, at the third verse: "Out of Zion shall come forth the law, and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem." Isaiah's word would have fallen to the ground if the preaching had not begun at Jerusalem; but now, to the very letter, this prediction of the evangelical prophet is kept. In Joel, that famous Joel who prophesied the descent of the Spirit and the speaking of the servants and the handmaidens, we read in the second chapter, at the thirty-second verse, "In Mount Zion and in Jerusalem shall be deliverance." Obadiah in his twenty-first verse says, "Saviours shall come up on mount Zion." Who were these saviours but those who instrumentally became so by proclaiming the Saviour Jesus Christ. And Zechariah, who is full of visions, but not visionary, says in his fourteenth chapter at the eighth verse, "Living waters shall flow out of Jerusalem," and then he describes the course of those waters till they flowed even unto the Dead Sea, and made its waters sweet. Because the Bible said so, therefore they must begin at Jerusalem, and I call your attention to this, for our Lord Jesus was particular that every jot and tittle of the Old Testament should be fulfilled.

Secondly, I suppose that our Lord bade His disciples begin to preach the Gospel at Jerusalem, because it was at Jerusalem that the facts which make up the Gospel had occurred. It was there that Jesus Christ died, that He was buried, that He rose again, and that He ascended into heaven. All these things happened at Jerusalem, or not far from it. Therefore the witness-bearing of the apostles must be upon the spot where if they lie they can be confuted, and where persons can come forward and say, "It was not so; you are deceivers." If our Lord had said, "Do not say anything at Jerusalem. Go away to Rome and begin preaching there," it would not have looked quite so straightforward as it now does when He says, "Preach this before the scribes and the priests." Hence it was that, coming to the very people who had seen these things, the preaching of Peter had unusual force about it; in addition to the power of the Holy Spirit there was also this—that He was telling them of a crime which they had newly committed, and could not deny; and when they saw their error they turned to God with penitent hearts. I like this thought—that they were to begin at Jerusalem, because there the events of the Gospel occurred. This is dear friend; if you have been newly converted, do not be ashamed to tell those who know you. A religion which will not stand the test of the fireside is not worth much! "Oh," says one, "I have never told my husband. I get out on a Thursday night, but he does not know where I am going, and I steal in here. I have never even told my children that I am a believer. I do not like to let it be known. I am afraid that all my family would oppose me." Oh, yes; you are going to heaven, round by the back lanes. Going to sneak into glory as a rat crawls into a room through a hole in the floor! Do not attempt it. Never be ashamed of Christ. Come straight out and say to your friends, "You know what I was; but now I have become a disciple of Jesus Christ." Begin at Jerusalem; it was your Lord's command. If yours is a true, genuine, thorough conversion I do not say that you are to go up and down the street crying out that you are converted; but on due occasions you must not hide your convictions. Conceal not what the Lord has done for you, but hold up your candle in your own house.

The third reason why the Lord Jesus told them to begin at Jerusalem may have been that He knew that there would come a time when some of His disciples would despise the Jews, and therefore He said, When you preach My Gospel, begin with them. Some seem to think that there ought to be no mission to the Jews, that there is no hope of converting them, that they are of no use when they are converted, and so on. I have even heard some who call themselves Christians speak slightingly of the Jewish people. What! and your Lord and Master a Jew! There is no race on earth so exalted as they are. They are the seed of Abraham, God's friend. We have nobles and dukes in England, but how far could they trace their pedigree? Why, up to a nobody. But the poorest Jew on earth is descended lineally from Jacob, and Isaac, and Abraham. Instead of treating them with anything like disrespect, the Saviour says, "Begin at Jerusalem." Just as we say, "Ladies first," so it is "the Jew first." They take and are to be first waited on at the Gospel feast.

The fourth reason for beginning at Jerusalem is a practical lesson for you. Begin where you are tempted not to begin. Naturally, these disciples would have said to one another when they met, "We cannot do much here in Jerusalem. The first night that we met together the doors were shut for fear of the Jews. It is of no use for us to go out into the street; these people are all in such an excited frame of mind that they will not receive us; we had better go up to Damascus, or take a long journey and then commence preaching; and when this excitement is cooled down, and they have forgotten about the crucifixion, we will come and introduce Christ gradually, and say as little as we can about putting Him to death." That would have been the rule of policy—that rule which often governs men who ought to be led by faith. But our Lord had said, "Beginning at Jerusalem," and so Peter must stand up in the midst of that motley throng, and he must tell them, "This Jesus whom ye have with wicked hands crucified and slain is now risen from the dead." Instead of tearing Peter to pieces they come crowding up, crying, "We believe in Jesus; let us be baptized into His sacred name." The same day there were added to the church three thousand souls, and a day or two afterward five thousand were converted by the same kind of preaching.

We ought always to try to do good where we think that it will not succeed. If we have a very strong aversion to a certain form of Christian work, instead of taking that aversion as a token that we are not called to it, we may regard it as a sign that we ought at least to try it. The devil knows you, dear friend, better than you know yourself. You see, he has been longer in the world than you have, and he knows a great deal more about human nature than you do; and so he comes to you, and he reckons you up pretty accurately, and says, "This brother would be very useful in a certain sphere of labor, and I must keep him from it." So he tells the brother that he is not called to it, and that it is not the sort of thing for him, and so on; and then he says to himself, "I have turned aside one foe from harming my cause." Yonder is a good sister. Oh, how much she might do for Christ, but Satan guides her into a work in which she will never shine; while the holy work which she could do right well is dreaded by her.

A LADY'S INVITATION.

I heard a beautiful story last Wednesday, when I was sitting to see inquirers, and I cannot help mentioning it here, for it may be a suggestion to some Christian who is present. A brother, who will be received into the church, was converted in the following way. He came up to London, and worked in a certain parish in the West-end. He was at work on a sewer, and a lady from one of the best houses in the West-end came to the men that were making the sewer, and said, "You men, come into my servants' hall and eat your dinners. I will give you either tea or coffee with your meal, and then you will not have to go into the public-house." Some of them went in, but others did not. So the next day the lady came out, and said, "Now, I know that you think my place too fine for you. You do not like to come; so I have come out to fetch you in. While this sewer is being done I should like you to eat your dinners in my house." She got them all in; and when they had done their dinners and drank their tea or coffee she began to talk to them about Jesus Christ. The work was a month or so about, and it was every day the same. Our friend does not know the lady's name, but he knows the name of Jesus through her teaching. Friends, we lose hosts of opportunities; I am sure we do. Many ways of doing good have never occurred to our minds, but they ought to occur to us; and when they do occur we should use them. Let us crucify the flesh about this. Let us overcome natural timidity. Let us in some way or other begin at Jerusalem, which is just where we thought that we never could begin.

Now, fifthly. We are getting on, you see. "Beginning at Jerusalem," must surely mean

BEGIN AT HOME.

Jerusalem was the capital city of their own country. You know the old proverb, "The cobbler's wife goes barefoot." I am afraid that this proverb is verified by some Christians. They do a deal of good five miles off home, but none at home. I knew a man who used to go out with preachers every night in the week, and try to preach himself, poor soul that he was; but his children were so neglected that they were the most wicked children in the street, and they grew up in all manner of vice. The father was prancing about and looking after other people, and did not care for his own family. Now, if you are going to serve Christ to the very ends of the earth, take care that you begin at home. Dear parents, need I urge you to look to your own children? Look well to your children: begin at Jerusalem.

Begin with your servants. Do not let a servant live in your house in ignorance of the Gospel. Do not have family prayer merely as a matter of form, but let it be a reality. Do not have one person working for you to whom you have never spoken about his or her soul.

Begin with your brothers. Oh, the influence of sisters over brothers! I have a friend—a dear friend, too—who has long been a man of God, but in his young days he was a very loose fellow, and often he was all the night away from home. His sister used to write letters to him, and frequently while half tipsy he has read them under the street lamp. One letter which he read cut him to the quick. His sister's grief about him was too much for him, and he was compelled to seek and find the Saviour. Well has the sister been rewarded for all her love to him. Oh, dear friends, begin at Jerusalem! Begin with your brothers and sisters.

Then, sixthly, begin where much has been already done. Begin at Jerusalem. It is hard work, dear friends, to preach to certain people; they have been preached to so long, like the people at Jerusalem. They all know about the Gospel, it is hard to tell them anything fresh, and yet they have felt nothing, but remain wedded to their sins. The Jerusalem people had been taught for centuries in vain; and yet Christ's disciples were to speak to them first. We must not pass we must labor for the conversion of those who have enjoyed privileges but have neglected them, those who have had impressions and have crushed them out, those who seem now as if they had sealed their own death-warrants and would never be saved. Do not hesitate to go to them. The Lord has done much already; it may be that He has laid the fire, and you are to strike the match and set it all alight.

Seventhly, begin where the Gospel day is short. If you ask me where I get that thought, it is from the fact that within a very short time Jerusalem was to be destroyed. The Romans were to come there to slay men, women, and children, and break down the walls and leave not one stone upon another. And Christ's disciples knew this; wherefore their Lord said, "Begin at Jerusalem." Now, then, if you have any choice as to the person you shall speak to, select an old man. He is near his journey's end, and if he is unsaved there is but a little bit of candle left by the light of which he may come to Christ. Choose the old man, and do not let him remain ignorant of the Gospel. Fish him up at once, for with him it is now or never, since he is on the borders of the grave. Or when any of you notice a girl upon whose cheek you see that hectic flush which marks consumption—if you notice during service the deep "churchyard" cough—say to yourself, "I will not let you go without speaking to you, for you may soon be dead." Begin at Jerusalem; begin where the day of grace is short.

Eighthly, begin, dear friend, where you may expect opposition. That is a singular thing to advise, but I recommend it because the Saviour advised it. A man comes into the Tabernacle to-night, and as he goes away he says, "Yes, I was pleased and satisfied." In that man's case I have failed. But another man keeps biting his tongue, for he cannot endure the preaching. He is very angry; something in the doctrine does not suit him, and he cries, "As long as I live I will never come here again." That man is hopeful. He begins to think. The hook has taken hold of him. Give us time, and we will have that fish. It is no ill omen when a man gets angry with the Gospel. It is bad enough, but it is infinitely better than that horrible lethargy into which men fall when they do not think.

And, lastly, to come to the meaning which Mr. John Bunyan has put upon the text in his famous book called "The Jerusalem Sinner Saved," I have no doubt that the Saviour bade them begin at Jerusalem, because the biggest sinners lived there. There they lived who had crucified Him. The loving Jesus bids them preach repentance and remission to them. There he lived who had pierced the Saviour's side, and they that had plaited the crown of thorns, and put it on His head. There dwell those who had mocked Him, and spat upon Him; therefore the loving Jesus, who so freely forgives, says, "Go and preach the Gospel first to them." The greatest sinners are the objects of the greatest mercy. Preach first to them. Are there any such here? My dear friend, we must preach the Gospel first to you because you want it most.

We are to preach to you first because, when you have received Him, you will praise Him most. If you are saved you will encourage others to come, and you will cheer up those who have come already. We shall be glad to get fresh blood poured into the veins of the Church by who love much because they have had much forgiven. Therefore, we are to come to you first. Will you not come to Christ at once? Oh, that you would believe in Him! Oh, that you would believe in Him to-night! To you is the word of this salvation sent. You old sinners—you that have added sin to sin, and done all you can do with both hands wickedly—you that have cursed His name—you that have robbed others—you that have told lies—you that have blackened yourselves with every crime, come and welcome to Jesus. Come to Christ and live at once. Mercy's door is set wide open on purpose that the vilest of the vile may come; and they are called to come first.

Just as you are, come along with you. Tarry not to cleanse or mend, but now "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." This night if you believe in Jesus you shall go out of these doors rejoicing that the Lord has put away your sin. To believe is to trust—simply to trust in Christ. It seems a very simple thing, but that is why it is so hard. If it were a hard thing you would more readily attend to it; but being so easy you cannot believe that it is effectual. But it is so; faith does save. Christ wants nothing of you but that you accept what He freely presents to you. Put out an empty hand, a black hand, a trembling hand; accept what Jesus gives, and salvation is yours. Thus have I tried to expound "Beginning at Jerusalem." Oh, that my Lord would begin with you. Amen.

Mr. WILLIAM FORBES,

Gospel Temperance Evangelist.

AMONG the names of those who are striving to rescue the masses of the English people from the growing curse of intemperance and, whose success in that and other Christian efforts has been most marked, is that of William Forbes, whose portrait appears on page 492.

William Forbes was born in Stirling, Scotland, in the year 1831. He was always intelligent and fairly industrious, but during his school-days he did not display qualities marking him out for future eminence. At the conclusion of his educational course he embarked upon a commercial career, and for a considerable number of years was engaged in business in the city of Glasgow.

In 1861 he went to London. Soon after his arrival an opportunity was offered him of indulging his predilections for newspaper work, a taste he had always possessed, and the opportunity was eagerly grasped. Ever since that period William Forbes has been connected with the newspaper world.

EARLY WORK FOR CHRIST.

About fourteen years ago he was a seat-holder in a church in the north of London. A few young men connected with this cause began mission work in the locality. It was that mission which affected the whole of William Forbes's after-life, and led him into that path of effort for the good of others which he has since trodden with so much credit to himself and such incalculable benefit to his fellows. Mr. Forbes confesses, however, that he was not at that time a Christian. But the mission set on foot by his friends thrilled the religious instincts of his nature. He felt impelled, by what power he scarcely knew, to preach the Gospel. It was not long before the young preacher had found a place in which to address those who cared to hear. His first meetings were held in the billiard-room of an unoccupied public-house. He devoted himself with energy to his new work, and soon had gathered around him a congregation who recognized his ability and his earnestness, and listened with pleasure and profit to his discourses.

But for some time Mr. Forbes was groping in Preaching to Excursionists.

Startling Incident in a Theatre.

spiritual darkness. In studying and preparing the sermons he delivered periodically, he was enabled to see clearly the plan of salvation, through faith in Christ and Him crucified.

STARTLING INCIDENT IN A THEATRE.

Before his conversion, Mr. Forbes was one night in a provincial theatre. During the progress of the performance some gunpowder which was behind the scenes suddenly exploded. This caused alarm and confusion, followed by many persons rushing out of the theatre in panic until the manager came before the curtain and shouted out to the people that all danger was over. Happily no one was seriously injured, but the circumstance produced a deep impression on the mind of Mr. Forbes, revealing as it did the awful possibility that even in the midst of a search for pleasure the seeker might be summoned summarily before the bar of the Omniscient Judge, without opportunity for accepting salvation (the incident of the explosion is shown on this page.)

MISSION AND EVANGELISTIC WORK.

Mr. Forbes had done much good before his conversion by efforts in the Temperance Cause, and in connection with the Early Closing Movement, but he soon decided to devote himself to distinctively Christian work. The Lord was pleased to bless his labors. The billiard-room he had at first occupied being now too small for the increasing audiences, Mr. Forbes secured a stable, and fitted it up as a mission-room. His preaching was attended with happy results. Later on Mr. Forbes, with the assistance of friends, erected an iron church at Holloway, a suburb of London. He also originated, and carried on for seven and a half years, a daily prayer-meeting in the city.

EFFORTS AMONG THEATRICAL EMPLOYES.

The attention of Mr. Forbes having been directed to the want of spiritual and moral teaching among theatrical employés, he organized meetings at Exeter Hall and elsewhere to which those connected with the theatres were cordially invited to attend. The new mission was in every way successful. Mr. Forbes was supported and encouraged in his good work by many ladies and gentlemen of influence, who showed their sympathy by their presence at the meetings.

WEARING THE BLUE RIBBON.

In this manner he continued to work for the Master's glory until the end of 1881. Having visited Ipswich during the progress of Mr. Booth's campaign there, and spoken at one of the meetings, the distinguished American advocate pinned the blue ribbon upon his coat; and with the opening of the following year Mr. Forbes withdrew from nearly all other occupation, and devoted himself exclusively to Gospel Temperance work. Since that time he has held successful missions in nearly fifty cities and towns of the United Kingdom.

Gratifying success has greeted him everywhere, and in a tour in Cornwall upward of 5000 persons put on the ribbon.

SERVICE AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

Mr. Forbes was the first preacher who held an open-air service in the grounds of the Crystal Palace. The occasion was one of the annual Temperance fêtes. About eleven years ago, at one of the annual fêtes of the Foresters, he attempted a similar service in the same place. He was alone, and began singing a hymn, when an angry and excited crowd at once gathered around him, the men with women's hats on, and the women with men's hats, dancing and professing to join in the singing. As he was proceeding with his address, several men came to him and said, "We don't want any preaching here to-day; and if you don't give up, some of us have determined to throw you into the lake." As many of them were intoxicated, and seemingly desperate, he gave up the service, and distributed some thousands of tracts supplied by the Open Air Mission. (The scene referred to is illustrated on this page.)

TOM WILSON'S SHIPMATE.

(See Illustration.)

THE sun was sinking with an angry copper-colored glow around it, and the waves, except in the west where the sun's rays dyed the water, were dark, with tiny white crests. The wind was rising, and there was every indication of a rough night. The captain of the Mary Allen after surveying the scene went to his cabin to examine his chart. In a few minutes his voice was heard directing the mate to take in all canvas and prepare for the coming storm. At the wheel stood a tall, handsome lad, whose clear delicate complexion showed that his experience of the sea was but brief, but his firm, resolute face and the promptitude with which he obeyed orders proved that he understood his duties. That boy was Tom Wilson, "the only son of his mother, and she was a widow."

Tom was the son of a sailor, and his ambition from his earliest boyhood had been to follow the sea. He had not been disappointed in his expectation of life afloat. He was a strong, active, fearless lad, and was soon a favorite with his shipmates, who were ready to teach him all they knew. This was his second voyage out on the Mary Allen, and Tom could do his work as well as any man before the mast in spite of his juvenile countenance and in spite of the fact that not a drop of rum had passed his lips, nor a quid of tobacco been between his teeth.

Tom stood at the wheel attending to his duty, when he heard the sound of a scuffle not far from him. The skipper had turned in for an hour, and the men having come down from aloft were grouped together near the mast. Tom could hear that some dispute was going on, but he did not know what the subject was, and he gave little attention to it. But soon the men spread out, and then Tom could see that there was a fight between two of his shipmates. A man who had shipped at the last moment and was known as Wild Bill was fighting fiercely with Bob Wright, Tom's best friend on board. In a moment Tom's face showed his interest in what was going on. His fixed, earnest gaze was bent on the struggling men. Then he saw the glitter of a knife in Wild Bill's hand, and he gave a loud cry. The skipper heard and was on deck in an instant. He demanded the reason of the noise, and Tom told him what he had seen. Then Wild Bill was called aft and questioned. His confused answers excited the captain's suspicions, and a closer examination showed that the man was drunk. He had smuggled liquor on board among the clothes in his chest, and had been drinking heavily. He received the skipper's reprimand with a sulky air, and went back to his shipmates swearing under his breath.

The real fact of the case was that the man having treated the others had insisted on making Tom Wilson drink with the rest, and Bob Wright interfered. The lad did not drink, he said, and he should not be made to drink if he did not wish. Whereupon Wild Bill had asked if Bob was skipper, and in his drunken fury had added some foul language which had led to the fight. Bob was not hurt, thanks to Tom's shout, which had aroused the skipper and prevented mischief being done. Every one expected that the trouble would be renewed, for Wild Bill was a vindictive fellow, and his resentment against Tom and his friend was not likely to subside. But the wind was soon whistling through the shrouds, and the men had too much to do to think any more about it. When Tom was relieved, however, and went forward, he passed Wild Bill, who stood leaning sulkily against the mast, and heard him utter a threat that he would be even with him yet.

That night was one long to be remembered. Under a sky black as ink the ship was driven madly over waves that seemed mountains high—now raised to a fearful height, now sinking as if she would never float again, rolling heavily and pitching so violently that the men could scarcely keep their footing. Tom was solemnized, but was not afraid. His mother had taught him to trust in God, and his faith did not desert him in the storm. He was busily engaged with his mates, when passing rapidly along the deck he saw Wild Bill standing high above his head and swaying dangerously as the ship lurched. Remembering the man's condition, he watched him earnestly as he passed, and to his horror saw him miss his footing. In another moment he would have been in the water, but Tom sprang to his side and held him in his arms, shouting at the same moment for help. Wild Bill was a burly fellow, and Tom felt that he could not hold him unaided, but he clung to him until his arms seemed as if they would be pulled from their sockets. But help came, and Wild Bill was lifted on the deck.

"Tom gazed anxiously at the scuffle."

The next morning Wild Bill sought Tom out, and in rough but evidently sincere words thanked him for saving his life. So good an opportunity was not to be missed, and Tom said a few words to him about the liquor. "I know, I know," said Bill. "It'll be my death sooner or later. Never touch it, boy, it's poison; but it's too late for me to give it up." But Tom did not think so. He pleaded with him, and had the satisfaction of seeing the poor miserable slave make several struggles to free himself of his bonds. They ended ineffectually, however. But Tom had a plan in his head for Bill's rescue. When that voyage was over, he persuaded Bill to accompany him to his home, and there he told the story to his mother. The widow at first shrank from the man who would have made her boy drink, but, gradually, pity for the man overcame her repugnance, and she labored for his emancipation. Her prayers and pleadings conquered. Bill left the widow's home a total abstainer and a Christian, and Tom had no warmer or more devoted friend in after life than the man who had threatened him and plotted his ruin.

MRS. CHANTREY'S SECRET.

A SERIAL STORY.

The Secret Revealed.

It was not long before Mr. Warden found an opportunity of speaking to Sophy, though it was an agony to him to do it. A few words only were spoken before she knew what he meant to say, and she interrupted him passionately.

"Oh, if David was but here!" she cried, "I could keep right then. But I cannot bear it; indeed, I cannot bear it. The house is so dreary, and there is nothing for me to think of; and then I begin to go down, down into such a misery you do not know anything of. I think I should go mad without it; and after I have taken it, I feel mad with shame. Aunt Bolton has told me what she said to you; and I can hardly bear to look either of you in the face. What shall I do?"

"You must break yourself of the habit," he said pitifully; "God will help you, if you only keep Him in your thoughts. Promise me you will neither taste it, nor look at it again, and I will take the same solemn pledge with you now, before God."

"It would be of no use," she answered, in a hopeless tone, "the instant I see it, I long for it; and I cannot resist the longing. I've vowed on my knees not to take any for a day only; and the moment I have sat down to dinner, I could hardly bear to wait till Brown comes around. If I wake in the night—and I wake so often—I think of it the first thing. If I could get right away from it, perhaps there might be a chance; but how can I get away?"

"Have you ever thought of what it must lead to?" he asked, wondering at the power the terrible sin had already gained over her.

"Thought!" she cried, "I think of it constantly. David will hate me when he comes home, if I cannot conquer it before then. But what am I to do? I cannot write to him unless I take it. No; I cannot even pray to God, when I am so utterly miserable. It would be better for me to be some poor man's wife, and drudge for my husband and children, than to have nothing to do, and be so much alone. There must be some way of escaping from it; but I cannot find it."

This way of escape—how could he find it for her? It was a question that occupied his thoughts day and night. There was one way, but Mrs. Bolton firmly persisted in closing it, and no other seemed open to her. He could not make known this difficulty to his friend, David Chantrey, for it would be a death-blow to him literally. He would hasten home from Madeira, at the very worst season of the year, as it was now late in October. The risk for him would be too great. There was no other home open to Sophy; and it did not seem possible to make any change in the conditions of that home. She must still be lonely and miserable, and still be exposed to daily temptations. All he could do was so little, that he did it without hope in the results.

If possible, Ann Holland was yet more troubled than he was. By-and-by it became common town's-talk, and many a neighbor visited her with the purpose of gossiping about poor Mrs. Chantrey. But they found her averse to dwell upon the subject, as if gossip had suddenly grown distasteful to her. Many an hour when she was waiting for her drunken brother to come in from the Upton Arms, she pondered over what she could do to save the wife of her beloved Mr. Chantrey. She knew better than Mr. Warden, who had never been in close domestic contact with the sin, how terrible and repulsive was the degradation of it; and she was heart-sick for Sophy and her husband.

"There's one thing I've done," she said one day to Mrs. Bolton, speaking to her of her brother's drunkenness; "he's never seen me drink a drop of it since he came home drunk the first time. I hate the very sight of it, or to hear people talk of the good it's done them! Why, if it did me worlds of good, and made my poor Richard the miserable wretch he is, I couldn't touch it. And he knows it; he knows I do it for his sake, and maybe he'll turn some day. But if he doesn't turn, I couldn't touch what is ruining him."

"That's very well in your station, Ann," answered Mrs. Bolton, "but it is quite different with us. We owe a duty to society, which must be discharged."

"Very likely, ma'am," she replied meekly; "it's my feelings I was speaking of, not exactly my duty. I hate the name of it; and to think of the thousands and thousands of folks it ruins! When you've seen anybody belonging to you ruined by it you'll hate it, I know. But pray God that may never be!"

"Ann," said Mrs. Bolton, cautiously, "do you suppose any one belonging to me could ever drink more than is right?"

"It's the town's-talk," answered Ann Holland, bursting into tears; "everybody knows it. Oh, Mrs. Bolton, if you can do anything to help her, now is the time to do it. It will get too hard to be rooted up by-and-by. I know that by my poor brother. He'll never leave it off till he's on his death-bed, and can't get it. James Brown, your butler, ma'am, is always talking to him, and exciting him about what he's got charge of in your cellars; and they sit here talking about it for an hour at a time, till they go off to the Upton Arms. I hate the very sound of it."

"But I must have cellars, and I must have a butler," said Mrs. Bolton, somewhat angrily.

She was fond of Ann Holland, and liked the reverence she had always paid to her. But this ridiculous notion of Mr. Warden's seemed to have taken possession of the poor, uneducated woman's brain, and threatened to undermine her influence over her. She cut short her visit to her at this point, and returned home uncomfortable and disturbed, wishing she had never offered the shelter of her roof to her nephew's unhappy and weak-minded wife.

Presently, as the dreary winter wore away, Mr. Warden began to shun the sight of Sophy Chantrey. All his efforts to save her, or even to check her rapid downfall, had proved vain; and he turned from her sin with a resentment tinged with disgust. But Ann Holland could feel no resentment or disgust. If it had been in her power she would have watched over her and cared for her night and day with unwearied tenderness. As far as she could she sought to keep alive within her all kinds of softening and pleasant influences. She went often to see Charlie at school, sometimes persuading Sophy to go with her, though more often the unhappy mother shrank from meeting her little son's innocent greetings and caresses. The terrible fits of depression which followed every indulgence of her craving frequently unfitted her for any exertion. She clung to Ann Holland's faithful friendship; but it was not near enough or strong enough to keep her from yielding when she was tempted.

But Sophy Chantrey had not yet fallen to the lowest depths—perhaps never would fall. Her husband's return would save her. Ann Holland looked forward to it as the only hope, and it was now close at hand.

Soon Mr. Chantrey's term of exile was over, and the spring brought release to him. He was returning to England in stronger health and vigor than he had enjoyed for some years before his absence. It seemed to himself that he had completely regained the strength that had been his as a young man. He was a young man yet, he told himself—not six and thirty, with long years of happy work lying before him. The last eighteen months had been weary ones, though he could not count them as lost time, since they had restored him to health. The voyage home was a succession of almost perfectly happy days, as he dwelt beforehand upon the joy that awaited him. He had a packet of letters, those which had reached him from home during his absence; and he read them through once more in the long leisure hours of the voyage. Those from his friend Warden and his aunt which bore a recent date had certainly a rather unsatisfactory tone; but all of Sophy's had been brighter and more cheerful than he had anticipated. Every one of them longed for his return, that was evident. Even Warden, who did not know where his fate would take him to next, expressed an almost extravagant anxiety for his speedy presence in his own parish.

He loved his parish and his people with a peculiar pride and affection. It was twelve years since he had gone to Upton—a young man just in orders, and in the full glow of a fresh enthusiasm as to his duties. He believed no office to be equal to that of a minister of Christ. And though this glow had somewhat passed away, the enthusiasm had deepened rather than faded with the lapse of years. His long illness and exclusion from his office had imparted to it a graver tone. In former days, perhaps, he had been too much set upon the outer ceremonials of religion. He had been proud of his church and the overflowing congregation which assembled in it week after week testifying to his popularity. To pass along the streets of his little town, and receive everywhere the tokens of respect that greeted him, had been exceedingly pleasant. He had bent himself to win golden opinions, after quoting the words of Paul, "I am made all things to all men, that by all means I might save some." And he had succeeded in gaining the esteem of almost every class of his parishioners.

But during the long and lonely months of absence he had learned to love his people after a different fashion. There were some pleasant vices in his parish to which he had shut his eyes; some respectable delinquents with whom he had been on friendly terms, without using his privilege as a friend to point out their misdeeds. There was not a high tone of morality in his parish. Possibly he had been too anxious to please his people. He was going back to them with a deeper and stronger glow of enthusiasm concerning his duties and work among them; but with a graver sense of his own weakness, and a more humble knowledge of the Divine Father for whom he was an ambassador.

His vessel reached his native shore the day before its arrival could have been expected, and neither Sophy nor his friend Warden was there to welcome him. But this was an additional pleasure; he would take them all by surprise in the midst of their preparations for his return. Warden had warned him that there would be quite a public reception of him, with a great concourse of his parishioners, and every demonstration of rejoicing. It was in his nature to enjoy this; but still he would like a few quiet hours with Sophy first, and these he could secure by hastening home by the first train. He would reach Upton early in the evening.

It was an hour of intense happiness, and he felt it to his inmost soul. All the route was familiar to him after he had started from London; the streets and suburbs rushing past him swiftly, and the meadows, in the bright green and gold of spring, which followed them. He knew the populous villages, with their churches, where he was himself well known. Every station seemed almost like a home to him. As he drew nearer to Upton he leaned through the window to catch the first glimpse of his own church, and the blue smoke rising from his own house; and a minute or two afterward, with a gladness that was half a pain, he found himself once more on the platform at Upton station.

"I am back again," he said, shaking hands with the station-master with a hearty grasp that spoke something of his gladness. "Is all going on well among you?"

"Yes, Mr. Chantrey; yes, sir," he answered. "You're welcome home, sir. God bless you! You've been missed more than any of us thought of when you went away. You're needed here, sir, more than you think of."

"Nothing has gone very wrong, I hope," said the rector, smiling. He had faithfully done his best to provide a good substitute in Warden, but it was not in human nature not to feel pleased that no one could manage his parish as well as himself.

"No, no, sir," replied the station-master, "nothing but what you'll put right again at once by being at home yourself. No, there's nothing very wrong, I may say. Upton meant to give you a welcome home to-morrow, with arches of flowers and music. They'll be disappointed you arrived to-day, I know."

David Chantrey laughed, thinking of the welcome they had given him when he brought Sophy home as his young wife. His heart felt a new tenderness for her, and a throb of impatience to find her. He bade a hasty good-evening to the station-master, and walked off buoyantly toward the High Street, along which his path lay. The station-master and the ticket-clerk watched him, and shook their heads significantly; but he was quite unconscious of their scrutiny.

Never had the quiet little town seemed so lovely to him. The quaint irregular houses stood one half of them in shadow, and the rest in the level rays of the May sunset; the chestnut trees, with their young green leaves and their white blossoms lighting up each branch to the very summit of them; the hawthorn bushes here and there covered with snowy bloom; the children playing, and the swallows darting to and fro overhead; the distant shout of the cuckoo, and the deep low tone of the church clock just striking the hour—this was the threshold of home to him; the outer court, which was dearer to him and more completely his own than any other place in the wide world could ever be.

No one was quick to recognize him in his somewhat foreign aspect; the children at their play took no notice of him. All the tradespeople were busy getting their shops a little in order before the shutters were put up. He might perhaps pass through the street as far as Bolton Villa without being observed, and so be sure of a perfectly quiet evening. But as he thought so his heart gave a great bound, for there before him was Sophy herself hurrying along the uneven causeway, now lost behind some jutting building, and then seen once more, still hastening with quick, unsteady steps, as if bent on some pressing errand.

He did not try to overtake her, though he could have done so easily. He felt that their first meeting must not be in the street, for the tears that smarted under his eyelids and dimmed his sight, and the quicker throbbing of his pulses, warned him that such a meeting would be no common incident in their lives. She had been his wife for nine years, and she was far dearer to him now than she had been when he married her. Eighteen months of their life together had been lost—a great price to pay for his restored health. But now a long, happy union lay before them.

He had not followed her for more than a minute or two when she suddenly turned and entered Ann Holland's little shop. Well, he could not take her by surprise better in any other house in Upton. Perhaps it might even be better than at Bolton Villa, amid its cumbrous surroundings; he always thought of his aunt's house with a sort of shudder. If Sophy had fortunately fixed upon this quiet house for paying the good old maid a kindly visit, there was not another place except their own home where he would rather receive her first greeting—that is if the drunken old saddler did not happen to be in. He paused to inquire from the journeyman, still at work in the shop; learning that Richard Holland was not at home, he passed impatiently to the kitchen beyond. Ann Holland was just closing the door of her little parlor, and David Chantrey approached her, hardly able to control the agitation he felt.

LAST DAYS OF JOSHUA.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 12, Josh. 24 : 14-29. Golden Text, ver. 14. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Joshua's Sermon—Its Subject—The Solemn Appeal—His Ascription to God—Reminding the People of the Conditions of Inheritance—His Testimony—No Failure—Believing in Full—A Service of Consecration—Comprises a Putting Away—An Inconsistent Professor—A Natural Question — The People Pledged — A Better Burial Place.

JOSHUA in his old age ceased to be a warrior, but the Lord made him a land surveyor of the inheritance which He had given to His people, and called him to divide the land by lot, and although many of their enemies remained in it, the tribes of Israel entered upon their inheritance. Now Joshua, who was old and stricken in age, became a preacher, thus bringing forth "fruit in old age" (Psa. 92 : 14). The theme of his discourse when he gathered all Israel, their elders, their heads, their judges, and their officers as his audience, was the faithfulness of God, and their responsibility to obey and to trust Him. He appealed to them as witnesses of what the Lord had done for them, and that their God was He who had fought for them. No credit did Joshua take to himself, no particle of pride seemed to be in him, because he had been made the instrument of God in effecting the greater work of subduing the enemies of Israel, and taking possession of the land of Canaan, for Joshua saw not himself but God.

He reminded them how he had divided the land to them by lot, but that God Himself would expel the inhabitants who yet remained in their inheritance. But, therefore, i.e., in order to this, they must keep and do what was written in the law of Moses, they must keep free from idolatry, they must cleave to the Lord their God. How exactly this is a type of our position! Called to inherit all the fulness of God (Eph. 3 : 19), yet mighty foes dispute our inheritance. Our only power against them is to count on the immutable promise of our God who fighteth for us, in the strong confidence that God is now and at all times already on our side. He has not to be brought round to help us by strivings, strugglings, and efforts of our own, after the manner of the heathen, whose only idea is to force their false gods to help them, by some mighty earnestness on their own part, their real reliance being on those efforts.

Joshua's personal testimony, after a life one hundred and ten years long, is most precious, "And behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth; and ye know in all your hearts and in all your souls, that of all the good things which the Lord your God spake concerning you; all are come to pass unto you, and not one thing hath failed thereof." Little of the Word of God was then written, but how precious is the witness of this old believer, that God could not and would not alter the thing that was gone out of His mouth! And now that He who "spoke in times past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by His Son" (Heb. 1 : 12), how much more are we bound, in these days of open Bible, to believe to the full, and put fully to the proof, the Word of the living God! And yet practically, in the Church as well as in the world, the Word of God is not generally regarded as of one tenth the value with which the ideas of men concerning it are regarded. For instance, Paul writes, "Be ye filled with the Spirit" (Eph. 5 : 18), but the majority of Christians instead of going face to face with God, and claiming and securing the being filled with the Holy Ghost, go and search in this and that commentary, or seek the opinion of this or that Christian, and argue as to what it is to be filled with the Spirit. They debate the point, and will tell you with whose opinion they coincide, while all the time they are minus the experience, and are really setting aside the Word of God, to exalt men above it.

Again, our beloved Lord said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth on Me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do, because I go unto My Father" (John 14 : 12). Anybody reading the Bible for the first time, without any of the subtle arguments of men, would expect nothing less than that every one who believes should heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, cast out devils, as well as win souls to Christ, and lead them into the fulness of the Spirit, these latter being the greater works. But instead of this being the case with most readers of the Word of God, they make an excuse for their own unbelief in the opinion of some writers or some preachers, that this cannot mean what it says, that the age of miracles is past (although the Bible never says so), and that if God uses us to do the greater works, the spiritual works, we need not trouble about the lesser, the works which Jesus did on earth. Now, whence comes such a conclusion? Surely from unbelief. The works which Jesus did are not being done by His disciples, and either something has failed of that which Christ has spoken, or else we are guilty of unbelief.

Joshua argued that as all good things were come upon the Lord's people according to His word of promise, so would all evil things of which He had warned them surely come upon them if they transgressed against the Lord. He then held what would be called in our days meeting. He gathered all the tribes of Israel to Shechem, and called for their elders, heads, judges, and officers, "and they presented themselves before God." Then He delivered to them a direct message from God, reminding them how He had taken their fathers from the other side of the flood, where they had served other gods, how He had brought out Abraham, and given him posterity, how through Moses He had brought His people out of Egypt, delivered them from the Amorites, from Balak, King of Moab, and refused to hear the prayer of Balaam against them, and, after delivering the Canaanites into their hand He continued, "And I have given you a land for which ye did not labor, and cities which ye built not, and ye dwell in them; of the vineyards and oliveyards which ye planted not do ye eat." What a type of the glorious rest of faith! On the ground of God's faithfulness He appealed to His people to make a solemn consecration, "Now, therefore, fear the Lord, and serve Him in sincerity and in truth." But this involved sacrifice, "Put away the gods which your fathers served . . . and serve ye the Lord."

There is no real consecration without a distinct putting away. Consecration is from and to, from the world, from sin, from the power of friends and relations who would hinder us, above all from self, to God. Joshua was most distinct in his dealing with the people for God, he said, "And if it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose you this day whom ye will serve; whether the gods which your fathers served . . . or the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell; but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." A true preacher of holiness must take the lead in consecration. We have known a man in the habit of conducting holiness meetings, while giving way to extravagance at the expense of another, all whose means were consecrated to the Lord, and in addition running up bills which were constantly brought up as a scandal in the work of God. What is the consequence? All this man says about holiness falls powerless to the ground, it is "sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal."

Joshua began with himself and his household, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." A holiness preacher must himself take the lead, and be in a position to say to all whom he teaches, "Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ" (1 Cor. 11 : 1). The people were thoroughly stirred, and answered, "God forbid that we should forsake the Lord, to serve other gods; for the Lord our God, He it is that brought us up and our fathers out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage, and which did those great signs in our sight, and preserved us in all the way wherein we went, and among all the people through whom we passed; and the Lord drove out from before us all the people, even the Amorites which dwelled in the land; therefore will we also serve the Lord; for He is our God."

THE CHOICE WAS MADE,

but the people did not know their own weakness and inability to keep their promise. Joshua said unto the people, "Ye cannot serve the Lord your God: for He is an holy God; He is a jealous God." Oh, how true this is! Of ourselves we cannot serve the Lord our God, and the law of God is continually bringing up before us our obligations and the impossibility of fulfilling them. "You ought, but you can't," this is the cry of our great adversary, taking advantage of the obligations of the law, and our powerlessness to fulfil them. What then? Does God demand of us that which He knows we can never do? Thank God, He has made a blessed, perfect provision for us. Jesus is our Refuge, He is "the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom. 10 : 4), and that not only for us, but in us also. It was His meat to do the will of Him that sent Him, and to finish His work (John 4 : 34), and that which He is in Himself He is also as dwelling within us. It is the meat of Jesus in my heart to do the will of God. He says, "Thy law is within my heart" (Ps. 40 : 8); and bless Him, because He dwells within, the law instead of being written on tables of stone is put in our minds and written in our hearts (Heb. 8 : 10). "Must" and "cannot" belong to the law, but when the law is within instead of without, the must is turned to may, and the cannot to can, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me" (Phil. 4 : 13).

The question would naturally arise in the hearts of the people, "If Joshua tells us we cannot serve the Lord, how, then, can he, for he has chosen that he and his house will serve the Lord?" Example is stronger than precept: that which was safe for him was safe for them, too, and in spite of his warning them that God would not forgive their transgressions and their sins, and that if they forsook the Lord, and served other gods, then He would turn and do them hurt after He had done them good, they came to the decision,

"NAY; BUT WE WILL SERVE THE LORD."

False gods had done nothing for their fathers, and nothing for them, and had not been able to deliver the Canaanites out of their hand, so that they had no encouragement to prefer their service to that of Him who had so watched over them. Then Joshua said to them, "Ye are witnesses against yourselves that ye have chosen you the Lord, to serve Him. And they said, We are witnesses." And thus this national consecration meeting reached its climax.

The name Shechem, where the people made this consecration, means "strength, literally shoulder." If in our weakness, unable in ourselves, we make the choice to serve the Lord in His strength, letting the government be upon His shoulder, then our weakness is the very occasion for the putting forth of His power, and we find that His strength is really made perfect in weakness. But Joshua could not leave the work imperfect; he said, "Now, therefore . . . put away the strange gods which are among you, and incline your heart unto the Lord God of Israel." While anything takes the place of God in our heart and life, consecration is not real and perfect. While the things of the world are an object to us, while we mind the things of the flesh, these things are more or less idols, and our God cannot accept a divided heart. The people pledged themselves, and then Joshua "made a covenant with the people that day, and set them a statute and an ordinance in Shechem. And Joshua wrote these words in the book of the law of God."

What a blessed occupation for Joshua in his last days to bring the people to a consecration of heart and life to God, and then to write a portion of the Bible which should be blessed to all future generations! However the infirmities of age had come upon him, one thing is clear, his intellect was strong, his faith yet stronger, and he had both sight and the use of his hands to write the law of God, indeed, both he and Moses seem to have had remarkable activity just before their death. "Then Joshua took a great stone, and set it up there under an oak, that was by the sanctuary of the Lord. And Joshua said unto all the people, Behold, this stone shall be a witness unto us; for it hath heard all the words of the Lord which He spake unto us; it shall be therefore a witness unto you, lest ye deny your God." Praise God, we have a better witness, the presence of Jesus within us, if we have received Him to dwell in our hearts by faith.

Then Joshua let the people depart, and soon after died at the age of a hundred and ten, and "they buried him in the border of his inheritance in Timnath-serah," which means "abundant portion." We have a better burial place. Buried with Christ by baptism into death, baptized or buried into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, buried to self in God. Oh, how abundant in our portion! We read that the effect of this solemn consecration lasted "all the days of the elders, which overlived Joshua, and which had known all the works of the Lord, that He had done for Israel." Joshua had served his own generation, before he fell on sleep, and was gathered to his fathers (Acts 13 : 36) as David after him. The Lord lead us so to live, and if the Lord tarries, so to die, and so to be a blessing to others as this honored man of God. Amen.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The European Journals have been Occupied during the week with the tension existing in the relations of England and France. It is evident that during several months the friendly feeling previously existing between the two countries has been growing less cordial, and the Madagascar affair and the negotiations as to a second Suez canal have simply brought the latent unpleasantness to a crisis. The two governments appear to have patched up an agreement, but the respective peoples and the press of the two countries are irritated against each other. Several French journals remark on the possibility of a war with England. The Figaro appears with a prominent editorial headed "War with England." The Evénement declares that the colonial policy of France is impossible without forcible repression of English extensions. Other journals are more moderate in tone, but insist that France shall not abate one jot of her just rights in her colonies and in Egypt and other places. Once before, in recent times, a similar state of affairs existed. It was immediately after Orsini's attempt on the life of the Emperor Napoleon III., and the officers of the French army then were unwise enough to threaten England with war as they are doing now. The crisis then passed harmlessly away, as we may reasonably hope it will in this case.

An Italian Town was Destroyed by an Earthquake on Saturday last. A cable message published here on Monday describes a violent earthquake which shook the island of Ischia, near Naples, and wholly destroyed Casamicciola, its principal town, and did severe damage to the neighboring towns of Forio and Lacceameno. The shocks began about half-past nine o'clock in the evening. At that hour the majority of the upper classes at Casamicciola were at the theatre. There a terrible scene was enacted. The lamps were overturned, clouds of dust were thrown up, and then the walls of the building opened and fell. How many persons lost their lives there cannot be estimated. The town is a noted health resort, much favored by the Italians, who go there for the baths. It is feared that many distinguished visitors must have perished. The ground opened in many places, swallowing up houses and their inmates before there was time to escape. The hotel Piccola Sentinella sank in the earth with all who were there. Nearly all the houses in the town collapsed, and at the date of the cable dispatch there were living people buried in the ruins whom it was impossible to extricate; many others, it is feared, are entombed in the cellars. When the first shock was felt, the people in the streets made a rush for the sea, seizing boats, rafts, and anything that would float. Steamers laden with the injured people arrived at Naples on Sunday, and assistance was promptly sent from Naples to Ischia. The number of lives lost is estimated at three thousand.

Cholera Still Rages in Egypt. A Sanitary commission composed of twelve physicians has been sent there from England, and efforts are now being made to check the progress of the plague by isolation. The inhabitants of the most infected portion of Bulak, a noted resort for travellers, which is about a mile from Cairo, have been sent to Turah, a place ten miles up the Nile, and their houses have been burned. Corpses in large numbers were found in many houses. The officials of the Department of State Domains have been removed to Helouan, a few miles farther up the Nile, where they are encamped. A great quantity of tar is burned in Cairo every night. Two soldiers of a British regiment stationed at Suez have died from the cholera. The regiment had previously been at Cairo. A British lieutenant and one soldier died from the disease at Cairo on July 24th. Three days later the deaths of twenty-five soldiers were reported. A cholera expert who has visited Egypt states that the plague has been improperly treated. Instead of a cordon being established around infected places, the people should have been driven out of them and a cordon established to prevent their return. That course is now being adopted. Uneasiness is still felt lest the disease should be carried to Europe. The authorities in Liverpool applied for powers to deal with a cargo of rags which arrived in that port from Egypt, it being well known that infection is carried more surely by rags than by any other means. It was subsequently found that the rags were consigned to New York, and a cable message warning the authorities here was dispatched.

The Trial of the Jews in Hungary Charged with the murder of a Christian girl is approaching its conclusion. On Friday it was reported by cable that the evidence was all in, and the counsel engaged in the case were making their speeches. The most violent language was used on both sides. The President of the Court repeatedly interfered, requesting the speakers not to preach religious hatred. The prosecution maintained that in carrying out the Jewish ritual murder was common and frequent. The counsel for the defence derided the charge that the ritual sanctioned the shedding of blood by Jews—a charge which, he claimed, was made for the purpose of spreading lies and exciting the Christians against the Jews. He vehemently attacked all engaged in the prelimentary examination conducted by the magistrates. The charge is undoubtedly false, and has been made in the hope of exciting public feeling against the Jews.

Cetewayo, whom the British Government recently restored to his throne as King of Zululand, has been killed with his wives and his chiefs. Immediately on his return from England an insurrection broke out against Cetewayo. He had lost prestige by his defeat by the British, and his country having been divided up among the chiefs, he found it difficult to re-establish his authority. He raised a small army, and endeavored to quell the insurrection, but his enemies combined against him, and thoroughly routed his troops, and killed him and his family and officers.

The Count de Chambord, the Last of the Bourbon claimants to the French throne, whose serious illness was reported two weeks ago, has partially recovered, though his complete restoration is pronounced impossible. The illustrious patient, on July 22d, called in Dr. Vulpian, who on his return to Paris described the case to a correspondent of the New York Herald. Dr. Vulpian said: "The count usually took a great deal of exercise; lately he took none, because of his lame leg. The consequence was a derangement of the digestive organs, a disordered liver and a weakened stomach. In this condition he caught cold or made an imprudent meal. There was no cancer." Dr. Vulpian believes that the tumor seen by other doctors was a portion of the intestine dilated with gas. The only treatment is an enforcement of judicious and regular refreshment and nutrition. His life was in great danger from the exhaustion due to painful vomiting, diarrhœa, insomnia and absolute incapacity to take nourishment for many days. As to the cause, it could only be approximate.

The Agricultural Returns Sent in to the Register-General of Ireland for 1882, according to a synopsis sent by the London correspondent of the New York Times, show a melancholy falling off. Eighty thousand acres have relapsed into bog. The area under crops has decreased by 114,039 acres. The decrease of land under flax cultivation is 34,000 acres. The returns of potatoes show 1,500,000 tons less than in 1881. The Irish papers comment on these terrible figures as telling the tale of the result of British policy. The cultivated land lapsing into a wilderness, the skeleton rafters, desolated houses, with the hearth-fires quenched forever, resulting from the heart-breaking exodus of the peasantry, tell the same constant refrain of decay and decline in the national life. It is, however, evident to every one who has watched the course of Irish affairs during the past seven years that this deplorable result is not due to British policy alone. Political and agrarian agitation are factors in the problem, and in many districts landowners were little likely, while their lives were in constant danger, to do anything for the improvement of their estates.

The Assisted Emigration from Ireland is stated in an official report to have been 5327 in three months. The expenses of sending these people out amounted to $175,000, of which $130,000 was received from government. The committee making the report, says it "hopes that State-aided emigration will be continued some years, so as to thoroughly relieve the congested districts." It says the majority of the holdings vacated by emigrants have been consolidated with those of the neighboring tenants. Reports from Ireland, however, indicate that emigration is accepted reluctantly by the people, and that Mr. Parnell and his colleagues of the League are opposed to that method of solving the Irish problem. Mr. Parnell has now thirty-five votes in Parliament under his control, and it is believed that at the next election he will have eighty votes.

Sickness in the Steerage of Emigrant Vessels crossing the Atlantic and sailing for Australia and other colonies has attracted the attention of the British public. On July 26th a deputation of the British Medical Association and several members of Parliament called upon Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, President of the Board of Trade, and asked him to appoint a committee to consider the inadequate medical and sanitary management of Atlantic steamers. They commented strongly upon the want of proper precautions on emigrant vessels, from which a large annual sacrifice of life resulted. They suggested that ship-owners be compelled to increase the pay of ship surgeons, and that the American Government be requested to contribute a small sum toward the expenses of vaccinating passengers on board of vessels. Mr. Chamberlain replied that he intended to introduce in Parliament in 1884 a bill dealing with the subjects mentioned and amending the Shipping Act.

The Hostility of the French Republic to Religion has often been the subject of remark. Its tendencies in reference to God and godliness are by no means altered from what they were, though to some extent at present held in check. This is evidenced by the fact that the Prefect of the Seine, by an order dated June 23d, abolishes the Hospital Chaplaincies from July 1st. The Archbishop of Paris, in a letter he has just issued, says, "This measure has been taken at the instance of the Paris Municipality, a body which makes a parade of its hostility to religion." He justly complains that while enormous sums are voted for the embellishment of theatres and fêtes, the modest sums which insure consolation to the aged and afflicted should be thus withheld.

The United Presbyterian Synod of Great Britain has at its meetings in Edinburgh spoken out on the question of temperance. Principal Cairns moved, and Dr. Wallace seconded, a motion to the effect that a legislative measure embodying the principles of local option is urgently demanded, and should be passed for Scotland without unnecessary delay. Dr. Reid asserted that a non-abstaining minister was not fully equipped for the work of the ministry. The number of ministers occupying charges in their Church was 589, of these 295 were abstainers. Much may be hoped for in the way of further advance in the adoption and spread of temperance principles in Scotland from the position taken in reference to it at this year's synod.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman for July contains a report of the proceedings and addresses delivered at the recent Prophetic Conference at Wimbledon, England; also an article by Mrs. Fielder on "The Redeemed Companies of Rev. 7: 4-8;" "Watchman, What of the Night?" by Dr. Meymott, and a summary of passing events from a prophetic standpoint. Price six cents, annual subscription seventy cents. Back numbers of this periodical for this year may be had from the office of The Christian Herald at the same price, which includes postage.

David Nasmith, whose portrait appears on the first page, was one of those energetic, indefatigable Christian laborers who seem to have imbibed the spirit of the Apostle Paul. The world owes much to such men who have literally worn themselves out in seeking to rescue it from sin and misery by the Gospel of Christ.

David Nasmith was born in Glasgow, on March 21st, 1799, and died in November, 1838, at the early age of thirty-nine. His parents were of good social standing, and eminent for piety, and it was owing to their example and prayerfulness that, early in life, his sympathy and judgment were secured for the religion which they professed.

When David was seven years old he was sent to the far-famed City Grammar School, where he spent four years to very little purpose, not becoming master even of the rudiments of the Latin tongue.

APPRENTICED TO AN UNGODLY MANUFACTURER.

At the age of about thirteen the youth was bound apprentice to a manufacturer, a man of sterling Christian character, but whom adverse circumstances overtook and compelled to relinquish business, in consequence of which David was transferred to his late employer's brother-in-law, with whom he remained for three years. This was a period of imminent peril to the boy's moral and religious principles, for the establishment was a large one, and his daily associates were, most of them, both godless and profane. "When I look back," he once said, "to the many sins which I then committed, unknown to man, they make me tremble! When tempted, I often prayed to God for deliverance, but sin remained as a sweet morsel under my tongue."

AN IMPORTANT SOCIETY FORMED.

He continued, however, to regularly attend, as he had done since he was six years old, a Sabbath-school, and the fact that he never relinquished the practice, gave rise to an event of the utmost importance to his spiritual well-being. In June, 1813, when he had attained the age of fourteen, two of his school companions proposed to form a society for the distribution of Bibles among the poor. For this purpose a meeting of their fellow-scholars was called, and "The Glasgow Youths' Bible Association" was formed, and David was chosen secretary. "From the office I held," he said in after life, "and the interest I took in the institution, I became acquainted with a number of pious young men, whose walk and conversation were very consistent, and made me often reflect upon the contents of that Book we were giving to others."

CONVERSION AND SERVICE.

"While reading it, I was led to see myself as a guilty sinner, and unable to do anything to satisfy Divine justice, or improve the condition of my desperately wicked heart. By continuing to search the Scriptures, I found One, even Jesus, who could deliver not only from punishment, but also from the power of sin. From that period until now (about 1837), my desires have been to preach this precious Saviour to my fellow-sinners."

His attention was directed chiefly to Africa, but the Missionary Society could not, at the time of his application, accept his proffered services. He, therefore, entered a secular calling, devoting himself with indefatigable zeal and energy to the work of Sunday-school tuition, in which God owned his efforts, and made them very successful. About this time also, the sphere of his operations began to enlarge. He took a very active share in the establishment of adult schools in Glasgow, in connection with the Sabbath Evening School Youths' Union, and in his journal the following fact is recited:

A BOY HORSEWHIPPED.

A youth attending one of the schools was brought to believe in Christ, and began to pray aloud in his father's house. His father, being a very wicked man, became quite enraged when he heard of his boy praying, and that he had commenced to be religious. He, therefore, first of all endeavored, but unsuccessfully, to turn away his thoughts from the subject of religion, and, in his anger, took a heavy whip and administered a brutal castigation. The boy, not daring to continue his practice in his father's house, resorted to an adjoining field, where he poured out his soul in prayer more fervently than ever.

The man, hearing of this new haunt, took his whip one night, and followed his boy. (The episode is illustrated in the panel at the left-hand corner of the upper section of the frontispiece.) When he came within reach of the sound of the boy's voice, he thought, before he whipped, that he would listen to hear what he was saying. The boy, at this moment, was earnestly praying on behalf of his wicked father. It was the turning-point in his life; he gave himself to Christ, and it was not long before both were received into the fellowship of a Baptist Church. When, according to custom, the man was publicly called upon to give an account of how he was led to accept Christ as his Saviour, he shrank back, exclaiming: "No, no; let my son do so first; for he is my spiritual father!"

LABORS AMONG PRISONERS.

The engagements already specified did not suffice to exhaust the energy of David Nasmith, for he acted as secretary to the Bridewell Association, and labored most diligently for the moral and religious improvement of the prisoners. His compassion likewise extended to the Glasgow prison. In June, 1818, he visited two young men named Baird and Blair, under sentence of death for highway robbery, remaining with them all night. The following is the entry relative to the circumstance which he made in his journal:

A NIGHT IN A CONDEMNED CELL.

"The night was spent in prayer and religious conversation. Truly it was a solemn season. (The picture at the right hand of the upper section of the frontispiece shows Nasmith talking to the condemned men.)

In the month of October, 1819, we again find him in the condemned cell, endeavoring to lead two prisoners, Guthrie and Forbes, to Christ, before the hour of their execution should fix their eternal doom. "On entering their dungeon," he writes, "Guthrie told me he was beginning to think of what I had said to him about the peril of his soul, when I last spoke to him. He began to look back to his former ways, and his sins filled him with fear. Before we parted, he seemed convinced of his need of Christ," and there is reason to hope that before he was hanged, he had sought and found forgiveness for the sins of his life, in the blood of Christ.

CITY MISSION SECRETARY.

In the autumn of 1821, an event occurred which determined the whole of Mr. Nasmith's future career. The conductors of the various religious and benevolent societies in Glasgow, with a view to concentration, economy, and efficiency, had procured a large and commodious edifice, which was divided into rooms and offices, suitable to their respective objects. The completion of the plan required the services of an active secretary, who should be common to them all, and on November 21st, David Nasmith was elected to fill the position, at a salary of $300 per annum.

David was now, for the first time in his life, in his true element. The chosen servant of humanity and religion, his pleasure became his business. He possessed, to an unusual degree, capacity for the efficient discharge of his new duties. There were three-and-twenty associations or societies, each of which had its own independent committee.

From this period onward, we find Mr. David Nasmith spending much of his strength in promoting the formation of Young Men's Societies in the United Kingdom, France, and America; but his primary object, and the main pursuit of his life, was the establishment of City Missions. With these his name is indissolubly associated. On the opening day of the year 1826, he formed the Glasgow City Mission, which from the moment of its public inauguration became a favorite with the Christian public.

He seems, about the year 1828, to have been impressed with the idea that his work was done in Glasgow, and he sought another and wider sphere of operation, from the conviction that he should thereby more effectually promote the Divine glory. Accordingly, in March, 1828, he surrendered his office into the hands of the Committee of Management, and his resignation was reluctantly accepted.

VISITS AMERICA.

Mr. Nasmith now proceeded to Dublin, where he became the means of inaugurating a City Mission, similar to that with which he had been identified in Glasgow. He then visited London for the first time, returning to Glasgow again on July 21st, and to Dublin, on September 3d, to promote the interests of the Mission which had been formed there. He travelled over nearly the whole of Ireland, disseminating his philanthropic ideas with much success; he was impelled by a strong desire to cross the Atlantic, for a similar purpose, and on July 27th, 1829, set sail from Greenock, for New York, and after a passage of thirty-eight days, reached his destination.

Mr. Nasmith travelled extensively both in the Northern and Southern States, and in Canada, in furtherance of his aim, and was everywhere well received, assisting and advising in the formation of many new societies.

Returning from America, and revisiting Dublin and Glasgow, David Nasmith resolved to attempt a long-meditated project of forming a mission society in Paris. On June 30th, 1832, he reached Boulogne, and the method of searching the passengers and himself highly entertained him. The passage from the ship to the shore was guarded by the military, and the path confined by ropes and chains, till he reached a small room, where he was examined, and, his passport being found correct, he was allowed to proceed; but, as he lingered inside the railway for a fellow-traveller, three soldiers invited him into a small room, he knew not for what purpose, but thought it might be to rest till his friend came up.

ARRESTED AND SEARCHED.

He entered; they shut the door, and surrounded him, addressing him in French, of which he understood not a word. They therefore gave him the interpretation, by commencing a strict search of his person. Seeing his pocket-book, they seized it, and began to examine his letters. Those that were sealed they retained, and took copies of his printed papers. The testimonials to his character, the published Outlines of his Proceedings, the constitution of Maternal, Young Men's, Tract, and other religious Societies, filled them with astonishment. There seemed little doubt that he was a conspirator! After a time, however, they found out their error, and the voyager was allowed to retire to his inn. Four days afterward he arrived in Paris. (The left-hand panel in the lower portion of our front picture depicts Mr. Nasmith's arrest.)

PARIS AND HAVRE.

There Mr. Nasmith met with some very interesting people, from various parts of the world, and among them men of genius, learning, and piety. He industriously availed himself of all methods to advance the cause of God and the Gospel of His Son. Before he left Paris, he saw the City Mission at work with three agents, so long contemned. The Lord graciously revealed Himself, and now the attorney and his wife are serving Christ with joyful hearts."

More Important than Dinner.—The Rev. Mr. Carstairs said: "This week is the anniversary of the conversion of one young man whom I met in Govan. Mr. Howie and I were posted at the door, stopping as many as we could, to get them into the inquiry-room. Among many others, I stopped this man in the passage by asking, 'Are you going away?' 'Yes,' he said, 'I have been in town all day, and have not had any dinner yet.' 'There are more important things than dinner; are you a Christian?' 'I can't say that I am.' In some way or other I felt the case to be so important that I was justified in deserting my post and going into the room with him myself. I feared that he would slip away from me if I took a seat near the door, and therefore went as far from it as possible. We sat down in a corner, and I took him from text to text. It was a very simple, sweet case, and the light streamed in upon him until it shone from his face, so that the bystanders did not require to be told that he was a changed man. He got so engrossed with our conversation that he forgot he was hungry, and would have sat there all night, if I had not reminded him he was hungry. I said, 'Well, friend, there is no need to detain you from your dinner longer, but I will give you a text that you will remember till you die.' He was amused at my positive assertion, and waited smilingly till I read Matt. 5 : 6, 'Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness; for they shall be filled.' 'You are right,' he answered, 'I will remember that one.'"

THE REDEEMED COMPANIES.

Rev. 7 : 4-8.

By Mrs. Fielder.

Misunderstood Scripture—The Titles of the Typical Assembly—A Second Group of Redeemed—The 144,000 with Christ on Mount Zion—The Lord's "Sanctified Ones"—Over Whom Christ Rejoices—An Incentive to Believers—The Crowning Glory of the Church.

THE all-sufficiency of Scripture to meet the exigencies of our being, and to guide us safely into everlasting habitations, is blessedly manifest to every redeemed soul that swells the mighty chorus of the witnesses, who testify that "Prophecy came not in old time by the will of men, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." (II Pet. 1 : 21.) With this luminous fact before us, is it not passing strange that individuals of devout tendencies should restrict their acquaintance with Holy Writ to a few salient passages? and extracting from these theories of their own, which superficial observers readily indorse—private judgment and interpretation has accumulated a fund of baseless argument, the circulation of which, among religious professors—acting like an epidemic, has enervated the general constitution.

MISUNDERSTOOD SCRIPTURE.

Some have stated that all God's people will be caught away from the earth before the three and a half years, Great Tribulation. But, if so, where will the martyrs come from? who are to be beheaded for refusing to worship the Beast and his image.

The noble army of martyrs, now in glory, must blush with sorrow at the cowardice and degeneracy of their descendants, and marvel why the children read not every clause in their great Father's will;—then armed with invincible might (Matt. 28 : 18-20), and anointed by the Holy Ghost, set their faces like flint, before "the great fight of afflictions," that treading in the footprints of Jesus, which are slippery with His own blood, they may win step by step, every inch of sacred ground, till each brave warrior stands complete in all the will of God; and is confessed by the King of kings, His son, and Heir of all things. (Rev. 21 : 7.)

Leaving other portions for future consideration, that are equally misconstrued and distorted, we proceed to expound Rev. 7 : 4-8, by taking the names of the tribes in their order, and heading this beautiful subject with ten words from the Saviour's lips, recorded in John 6 : 37, "All that the Father giveth Me, shall come to Me."

THE TITLES OF THE TYPICAL ASSEMBLY.

The titles borne by this typical assembly resolve the prophecy. Judah, signifying Praised, commences the roll; "he is a Jew which is one inwardly and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter, whose praise is not of men, but of God" (Rom. 2 : 29). "The man whom the King delighteth to honor" (Esther 6 : 6-11; Deut. 14 : 2). Reuben, i.e., First-born, "from above" (John 3 : 3; II Kings 5 : 14; Matt. 18 : 3). Gad, i.e., Good-fortune, "born out of due time" (I Cor. 15 : 8); "the remnant" (Isa. 10 : 22; Micah 5 : 3). Aser, i.e., Happy, "they who rejoice in the Lord alway" (Ps. 35 : 28; Phil. 4 : 4). Nepthalim, i.e., Wrestlers, "prevail in prayer" (Gen. 32 : 24-28; Judah 5 : 18; Acts 9 : 12). Manasses, i.e., Forgetting Sorrow (Hosea 2 : 15, 16) "brought out of a horrible pit; a new song in his mouth" (Ps. 40 : 2, 3). Simeon, i.e., Hearing with Acceptance, "heard in a time accepted, in the day of salvation" (II Cor. 6 : 2). Levi, i.e., Joined, "adhesion to the Lord" (Ex. 32 : 26). Issachar, i.e., Wages, "who the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world hath bought, purchased, redeemed" (Isa. 53 : 11). Zabulon, i.e., Habitation, "here, have no continuing city, but seek one to come" (Heb. 13 : 14). Joseph, i.e., Adding, "a fruitful bough by a well (of salvation) whose branches run over the wall") Gen. 49 : 22; and Eph. 2 : 14). Benjamin, i.e., Son of My Right Hand, "Son of God's right hand (Isa. 41 : 10), begotten in the Christos who is God's righteousness, His salvation" (Isa. 51 : 5). These are "written in heaven," and constitute the saved of the tribes of the Israel of God, "the circumcision, which worship God in spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus and have no confidence in the flesh (Phil. 3 : 3)."

A SECOND GROUP OF REDEEMED.

Revelation 7 : 9-14, portrays a second group of the redeemed who have no covenant claim to salvation, are condemned by the law and excluded by the ancient testimony; the whosoever whom Jesus has invited in the concluding words of John 6 : 37, and "him that cometh unto Me I will in no wise cast out;" also John 3 : 16 and 10 : 29.

In these also is manifested the righteousness of God by faith of Jesus Christ, unto all and upon all them that believe. (Rom. 3 : 21, 22 and 10 : 29.)

I am informed that in a work of Bishop Kennicott's, recently published, the view which I have held and taught, with reference to the seventh chapter of the Apocalypse is fully maintained; and I thank God for this proof that His children are beginning to see eye to eye. "Ye are complete in Him, which is the head of all principality and power." (Col. 2 : 10.)

THE 144,000 WITH CHRIST ON MOUNT ZION.

Revelation 14 : 1-5 shows the spiritual attainments of His saints, and their union with Christ in the heavenlies indicated by His presence in the midst of a hundred and forty and four thousand—who are redeemed from the contamination of earthliness (verse 3), saved from their sins. (Matt. 1 : 21.)

Of Mount Zion, i.e., the parched place, thus saith the Lord, "for Zion's sake will I not hold My peace." (Isa. 62 : 1.) In answer to the prayers of those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, the Lamb in Tri-unity, fills them with joy, "comes unto them, and makes His abode with them (John 14 : 23) who have His Father's name written in their foreheads; the tribes of the saints, who are sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise (Eph. 1 : 13 and Rev. 7 : 3) "The promise of the Father, and endued with power from on high." (Luke 24 : 49).

THE LORD'S SANCTIFIED ONES.

The same of whom the Lord said: "I have commanded My sanctified ones, I have also called My mighty ones, even them that rejoice in My highness" (Isa. 13 : 3). "The people of the saints of the Most High" (Dan. 7 : 27). "Virgins" i.e., separate unto holiness, "these are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth, bought from among men (made whiter than snow, through the blood of the everlasting covenant), the first-fruits unto God and the Lamb" (14 : 4). For the fruit of the Spirit shines throughout their lives, rendering them attractive and transparent; even "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance, against such there is no law." (Gal. 5 : 22-23.)

Again, we behold this sanctified throng (17 : 14) whose Leader is the Lamb, and "they that are with Him, are called, and chosen, and faithful." Finally they overcome Antichrist (19 : 11-20). "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." (Matt. 5 : 8.) In these the Lord sees of the travail of His soul, and is abundantly satisfied.

OVER WHOM CHRIST REJOICES.

Only the pure and undefiled can the Christos "joy over with singing" (Zeph. 3 : 17), whose works redound to His praise, "the first-born from above," and the last become first (Matt. 20 : 16), glory in God alway, prevail in prayer, are so penetrated with the Saviour's love and compassion, that they forget sorrow, see Jesus only, and hear His voice (in His Word), follow the Good Shepherd, who hath made them kings and priests unto God; having purchased them at highest cost (1 Pet. 1 : 18, 19); by faith they look for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. (Heb. 11 : 10.) "Partakers of the Divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world, through lust (II Pet. 1 : 4); and by virtue of the immortal union add to the Royal family daily, and labor to bring forth children in the King's likeness. Thus the sons of His right hand are bound up in the bundle of life with their Redeemer.

AN INCENTIVE TO BELIEVERS.

The constellation of sparkling graces set forth in the Tribal calendar (7 : 4-8) that, according to His own Word (John 14 : 21-23), shall bring the Holy One of Israel, the Lamb of God, to dwell in the midst of His saints, should prove a righteous incentive to believers generally, and stimulate every member of the blood-bought family to "walk in newness of life," and with the apostle (Phil. 3 : 12-14), "apprehend that for which also he is apprehended of Christ Jesus, that forgetting the things that are behind," i.e., the travail and pain of the old creation (Rom. 8 : 22), "and reaching forth unto those things which are before," i.e., spiritual emancipation, redemption of body and soul from the presence and power of sin (Rom. 8 : 23), he "may press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus"--even attain unto "holiness, without which shall no man see the Lord." (Heb. 12 : 14.)

THE CROWNING GLORY OF THE CHURCH.

"If the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit that dwelleth in you." (Rom. 8 : 11.)

"To be changed into the same image, from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord" (Rom. 8 : 18), and, with anointed eyes (Rom. 3 : 18), "see the King in His beauty" (Isa. 33 : 17), and hold unbroken fellowship with our Redeemer, is the crowning glory that awaits the Church in resurrection life.

Hear the Spirit's commentary upon (Rev. 7 : 4-8) and identification of the hundred and forty and four thousand: "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people, that ye should show forth the virtues of Him who hath called you out of darkness into His marvellous light." (1 Pet. 2 : 9.)

A "chosen generation!" Prophetic of the fulness of blessing, that descending upon the children of God in the last days (which are at hand) shall eclipse every former revelation and experience vouchsafed to men.

in every part of the United States and Canada.

READERS should understand that when an article published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD bears the name of the writer, that writer must be held individually responsible for the views therein advanced. The ministers whose sermons appear in this journal, and other contributors, must not be regarded as always endorsing views about which there is a wide divergence of opinion, even among Christians of eminent piety and learning.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The National Financial Statement for July has been issued by Mr. John M. Carsen, clerk of the Committee on Ways and Means, who thus analyzes its figures: The close of the first month of the new fiscal year shows a reduction in the public debt since July 1st of $8,000,000 in round numbers. This reduction, however, is not real, in the sense that obligations to the amount named have been discharged during the month, the debt columns showing no change worth noticing since the beginning of the month. The reduction is produced by the payment of about $3,000,000 for accrued interest and an increase of about $5,000,000 in the available cash balance, which is now $155,727,196. The total amount of the public debt exceeding the balance in the Treasury is $1,543,190,616. The accumulation of standard silver dollars in the treasury goes steadily forward. Of the 2,300,000 silver dollars coined in July, one half went into circulation and the remaining one half went into the treasury. The weight of the silver coin now in the treasury is 5084 tons. The receipts for the month, compared with those for July, 1882, show a falling off of over $4,250,000, this loss being mainly in internal revenue receipts. The operation of the new tax law, by which the tobacco tax has been reduced one half and certain other taxes abolished, will explain this loss. In customs receipts there was an increase over last July of nearly $1,000,000, which was due to the operation of the new tariff law.

The Louisville Exposition was Opened by the President on August 1st, amid much enthusiasm. The exposition has been long anticipated, and the completeness displayed in the arrangements on the opening day showed that the promoters and managers must have labored with energy and skill, though exhibitors were, as usual, in arrear, and three weeks will be needed to bring the show to perfection. The President received a warm welcome, and in the course of the speech with which he opened the exposition spoke words of congratulation which are heartily indorsed by the citizens of all sections of the country. He said: "I congratulate the promoters and managers of this exposition that even at the very threshold of its existence it gives abundant pledges of success. The zeal and enthusiasm which they have displayed in their labors of preparation, and the frequent tidings of encouragement and cheer by which those labors have been lightened and made glad; the splendid triumphs of American genius, activity, and skill which are arranged within these walls; the presence of the eager multitude who throng these hospitable streets, all are tokens that the enterprise here inaugurated will be crowned with brilliant, far-reaching, enduring results. It will promote the arts of peace and help to bring about the works of peace, proclaiming harmony and good-will and brotherly kindness throughout all the land, unto all the inhabitants thereof. I now declare that the Southern Exposition is open, and may God speed the fulfilment of all its lofty and ennobling purposes." Among the most interesting of the exhibits is a farm, containing tobacco plants, cotton, wheat, hemp, sugar-cane, corn, and other Southern products, covering four acres, all growing and flourishing under careful cultivation.

The Pennsylvania Democratic Convention assembled at Harrisburg on August 1st. The proceedings were harmonious, and there was no attempt at dictation made from any quarter. The platform adopted is a forcible document, in which issue is joined with the Republicans on the most prominent topics of the political arena, especially on the scheme advocated by the Republican convention of Pennsylvania for distributing surplus revenue. The resolutions chiefly deal with local politics. On national questions the platform says: "The Democracy believe in such taxation of the people as is requisite for the necessities of the Government, economically administered, and that import duties should be so adjusted in their application as to prevent unequal burdens, encourage productive industries at home, and afford just compensation to labor, but not to create or foster monopolies." They further emphatically denounce the proposition of the Republican party that the people should be taxed to raise a surplus fund for the Federal Government to distribute among the States. They contend that the people should only be taxed so much as is absolutely indispensable for the frugal conduct of their affairs; not one cent for surplus, and for unnecessary taxation. The existing surplus in the treasury should be faithfully applied to the payment of the public debt. The money not needed for the expenses of the Government should remain in the pockets of the people. To this end they favor the entire abolition of the present system of internal taxation as a measure of relief demanded by the people from an unnecessary and unequal burden. They also demand that the Government should redeem all its express and implied obligations as to the coinage.

Five Suits against the Western Union Telegraph Company were commenced in Philadelphia last week. The plaintiffs claim one hundred dollars damages in each case for refusing to send messages under the printed rules of the company. Mr. Cyrus Field in a published interview said that the company were "beginning to forget that there had been a strike at all." That is very likely, because the company has always shown a disposition to forget the convenience of the public and its obligations. What it never forgets is its dividends, its absorption of rivals, and its habit of watering its stock. Operators who have been compelled by the necessity of providing for large families to remain at their posts, complain that they have to work night and day, and are even then unable to overtake the arrears of business. The men on strike are receiving assistance from the Knights of Labor and other trade organizations, but as there are twelve thousand operators and linemen out of employ, it is evident that but little can be done to support them, and there must consequently be widespread suffering. The United States Senate Committee on Education and Labor commenced an investigation of the strike on Monday last in New York.

The Mayor of New York has, in Selecting a Comptroller for the city, made an appointment eminently unsatisfactory to the crowd of hungry Irish politicians who appear to look on the offices of New York as their property. Republicans and Democrats are alike dissatisfied. The frauds in the Comptroller's office, amounting to nearly $200,000, which have been under investigation during the past few months, prove that the office needs reorganizing, and experience satisfied the Mayor that politicians are not adapted to that kind of work. He has therefore appointed Mr. Seth Hastings Grant, who has acted as his private secretary. Mr. Grant is fifty-five years of age. He is the son of Asahel Grant, M.D., who spent many years as a missionary among the Nestorian tribes of Persia. Mr. Grant has held several important business offices, among which was that of superintendent of the Produce Exchange. He is a member of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church and is chairman of its Board of Deacons. He has been Recording Secretary, Corresponding Secretary, and Vice-President of the American Bible Society. The salary of Comptroller is $10,000 per annum. As secretary to the Mayor, Mr. Grant received $5000. He is a Democrat in politics.

A Five Days' Camp-meeting of the National Temperance Society was held last week at Ocean Grove, N. J. It was largely attended. Among the speakers were Mrs. J. Ellen Foster, of Iowa, and ex-Governor John P. St. John, of Kansas. It was stated in the course of the meetings that the Society, which has been in existence eighteen years, has during that time distributed five hundred million temperance books and tracts, and it has now 250 writers on its staff.

Interesting Services have been Held at Ocean Grove, N. J., in connection with the reunion of the United States Sanitary and Christian Commissions, to which the army chaplains were also invited. The enrollment was seventy-five, and over five thousand persons attended. Mr. George H. Stuart presided. Dr. Taylor, of the American Bible Society, in the course of his address said that in response to an appeal from the South, with the approval of our Government, 300,000 Testaments were donated for the use of the Confederate Army. The next reunion is appointed to be held in 1886.

The Golden Wedding of Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Sr., was celebrated on Wednesday, July 18th. The venerable clergyman, who is known and highly esteemed throughout the country, has quite recovered from his recent sickness, and is now in as good health as can be expected at the advanced age of eighty-four. He and Mrs. Tyng were married in 1833 by Bishop White, while Dr. Tyng was rector of St. Paul's, Philadelphia. Mrs. Tyng was the daughter of Thomas Mitchell, Esq., of that city.

The Services Commenced by Mr. Moody in the Windsor Theatre, Boston, have been continued by Mr. E. W. Bliss with marked success. Every evening an audience has assembled filling the theatre, which holds fifteen hundred people, and a large number of conversions have taken place. The interest and solemnity of the services have steadily increased. Mr. N. N. Rich has charge of the choir and has rendered effective service. Mr. Moody has been preaching at his home in Northfield, Mass.

We have Received from an Anonymous Subscriber in Boston, Mass., the sum of fifteen dollars for the fund for supplying THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to colored ministers. As our friend has not sent his name and address, we are unable to supply him with a list of the names of the preachers who will benefit by his kindness. The testimony of those who through this fund have derived help in their work shows that it is the most valuable kind of help they can have.

Mr. Moody's Efforts to Relieve the Philadelphia Young Men's Christian Association of its heavy debt have been successful. It amounted to $400,000. Through the labor of Mr. Moody, Mr. Wannemaker and others, one half the amount has been funded at low interest, and the other half has been raised. Friends in New York, through Mr. Moody, pledged $70,000, and the remaining $130,000 was secured in Philadelphia. The building has been placed in the hands of a Board of Trustees, who are to hold it for the benefit of the Association. Important changes have been made in the constitution. A new Board of Directors and new officers will be elected, and the work of the Association reorganized.

The Prevalence of Leprosy in Wisconsin has caused some alarm in some districts of that State. A prominent physician of Milwaukee calls the attention of the public to the danger. He says: "As has been well known for some time, there exists among the Norwegian population of the State a large number of cases of leprosy. In searching the records of the State Board of Health I cannot find that any effort has as yet been made to stop its spread or limit its introduction. That the disease is spreading among us, and that, too, with comparative rapidity, cannot for a moment be doubted, and it would seem that the time has come for legislation and national action to prevent its further introduction and further spread." Other medical men report with concern that leprosy has gained a foothold in the north-western portion of the State, where the Norwegian element preponderates, and say that its eradication will require much effort. As far as has been ascertained, the loathsome disease has confined its ravages among the Norwegian inhabitants, but its rapid spread has been viewed with much alarm. It is evident that there is need for prompt and energetic measures to be used to prevent the contagion spreading, and there is no doubt they will be inaugurated without loss of time. In such a case legislators are quick to act, though they are not concerned to check the spread of moral leprosy, but permit the places where it is disseminated to flourish under the protection of the law. If they realized the evil of those places, every theatre, gambling-house, and grog-shop would be destroyed as the houses of lepers were destroyed under the law of Moses (Lev. 14 : 35-45).

An Attempt to Save Life in Passaic City, N. J., last week has unhappily resulted in the death of two brave men. It appears that a new cesspool had been built at the back of a house in that city, but it was found that the communication between the new structure and the old one was defective. On August 1st, a Hollander employed in the house, believing he could cure the defect, went down into the vault, which was nearly empty. He was almost immediately overcome by the foul gases, and fell unconscious on the bottom. There was great excitement, and a large crowd assembled. After a while George W. Conkling, a well-known citizen, declared that he would go into the vault to save the Hollander. He took down with him a rope, which he managed to tie around the inanimate form of the Hollander, who was hauled up promptly. Mr. Conkling, however, was seen to fall over, apparently lifeless. A painter named Charles Krymer, who was working near by, volunteered to get Mr. Conkling out, but he almost immediately became unconscious when lowered into the death-hole. Peter Oechslein next determined to go down to rescue his friends, and he, too, succumbed to the overpowering fumes and fell prostrate. After an hour or more of hard work the cesspool was dug away, and the three men were dragged out, but Mr. Conkling and Mr. Krymer were dead. Oechslein was black in the face and terribly bloated, but after much difficulty was resuscitated. The Hollander was also brought to life again after some labor. There seems at first sight nothing glorious in dying of suffocation in a cesspool, yet the motive that prompted those men to face death in order to rescue their friend was heroic. It is by such an act that we may be helped to realize the meaning of Christ's life and death (Rom. 5 : 7.)

A Twin Sister's Curious Mistake Occurred in Michigan recently. Two little girls, twins, became separated while playing, and one of them began looking for the other. She went to her grandmother's to look, and on approaching a window which reflected her own likeness did not recognize herself, but exclaimed with delight, "Why, Ethel, I didn't know you were here!" The grandmother, who witnessed the incident, broke out in a hearty laugh, when the little girl discovered her mistake. This was a very remarkable instance of self-forgetfulness, implying a close resemblance between the two children. It is possible that after death Christians may in their purified spiritual nature be so changed into likeness to their Lord as to be so like each other. Here they are separated so widely that too often they forget that they are brethren at all, and in their conversation and business are keenly awake to the differences between themselves and others (1 Peter 3 : 8, 9).

A Subterranean Fire is Burning Under a street in Paterson, N. J. The street has been widened within the last few months by cutting away rocks in one place and by dumping various refuse to form an embankment on the side toward a chasm in another, and this embankment has a number of cracks in its face which emit smoke, heat, and noxious gases. The filling in was done to a large extent by dumping cinders, slag, and coal-screenings from the locomotive shops. The cinders and ashes were dumped while still hot, and have set fire to the coal screenings and are smouldering under the surface of the street. The fire has eaten its way to a part of the street where no hot ashes were ever dumped, and even there the smoke and smell issue. This is explained by the fact that trees were felled in some places to fill in the gaps in the rugged road. These trees have now caught fire from the subterranean cinder beds and are smouldering into charcoal. A house stands almost over the smoking ground, and as the smoke and gases go up into the cellar the inmates are alarmed for their safety. This is natural; it would be surprising if they remained careless under such circumstances. It is still more surprising that multitudes who know that the world and all that is in it must one day be burned up, feel no alarm and make no provision for their safety (II Peter 3 : 10, 11).

A City a Hundred Miles Long is the Subject of an enthusiastic editorial in a San Francisco journal. It states that Santa Barbara's mayor proposes the consolidation of the governments of the city and county of that name. As the consolidation can only be effected by making the municipal limits conterminous with those of the county, Santa Barbara, under this arrangement, would become, territorially, the largest city in the world, say a hundred miles long by sixty wide, and including a great quantity of farming land and stock ranches, besides several forests containing deer, bears, and other wild animals. The editor says, "It would be a big attraction to summer visitors to know that they could hunt this large game on the back streets. And then too the citizens would be able to boast that some of the householders in the city had front yards containing from 25,000 to 40,000 acres!" Whether there would be any substantial advantages to be gained by calling a county a city, will doubtless be considered before the change is made. Apparently the editor thinks the most prominent recommendation of the scheme is that the citizens could glory in living in the largest city in the world. That, however, is not an important consideration. The boast would not entitle them to increased respect, as it would be no guarantee of character. But it is possible to attain a citizenship which would give that guarantee; it is citizenship in the great city yet to be revealed, and that title is offered through Christ to all. (Rev. 21 : 22-27.)

A CURE FOR UNSAVORY MEATS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Can that which is unsavory be eaten without salt? or is there any taste in the white of an egg?"—JOB 6 : 6.

Job's Real Sorrows—The Dull and Dreary Life—I. A Want of Savor in Food a very Great Want — Unsavory Spiritual Food — Sermons without Christ in them—A Savor of Devotion—The Savor of the Holy Spirit—II. Unsavory Food not to be Eaten—The Unsavory in Conversation—The Salt of Morality—The Unsavory in Modern Teaching—III. Things needing Salt—Reproof—Eyes Knocked out in Removing Motes—The Salt of Brotherly Love—Silver-Coated Pills — Salt in Doctrine—In Affliction — In Persecution — In Thoughts of Death.

THIS is a question which Job asked of his friends, who turned out to be so unfriendly. Thus he battles with those "miserable comforters" who inflamed his wounds by pouring in verjuice and vinegar instead of oil and wine. The first of them had just opened fire upon him, and Job by this question was firing a return shot. He wanted the three stern watchers to understand that he did not complain without cause. If he had spoken bitterly, it was because he suffered grievously. He was in great bodily pain; he was enduring great mental depression; and at the same time he had been smitten with poverty and bereavement; he had, therefore, reason for his sorrow. He had no comforts left, and every arrow of grief was sticking in his flesh; if he did groan, he had something to groan for.

He had lost all care to breathe; the zest of life was gone; no joy remained to make existence worth the having. He was like one who finds and loathes the morsel which he swallows. That which was left to him was tasteless as the white of an egg; it yielded him no kind of comfort; in fact, it was disgusting to him. He was fed, he says, upon meat which yielded him no solace. "The things that my soul refused to touch are as my sorrowful meat." Therefore, he virtually asks his friends, "How can you expect me to eat such meat as this without sighs and tears? Can that which is unsavory be eaten without salt? Is there any taste in the white of an egg?" He means that everything about him had lost its flavor, and life had become dull and dreary to him, and therefore they must not wonder that he uttered words of complaint.

We may now forget the much-tortured patriarch Job, and apply this text to ourselves. "Can that which is unsavory be eaten without salt? or is there any taste in the white of an egg?" Three thoughts arise out of it.

I. The first point will be this, that a want of savor is in anything that is meant for food. I am not going to deliver a cookery lecture, and so I shall not enlarge upon the passage so far as it refers to the bread upon our table, or the food which we eat and drink. Everybody knows that all kinds of animal life delight in food that has a flavor in it; and even "dumb driven cattle" will turn away from dry, flavorless food, and will go a long way to find something that has a juice and a taste in it which suits the palate which God has created in them. It is exactly the same with regard to the food of our souls. It is a very great fault with a sermon when there is no savor in it. It is a killing fault to the people of God when a book contains a good deal of what may be true, but yet lacks holy savor—or what, in other words, we call "unction." But what kind of savor is that which we expect in a sermon?

I answer, first, it is

A SAVOR OF THE LORD

Jesus Christ. Years ago, before ministers grew so wise as to question the inspiration of Scripture, and renounce the doctrine of atonement, there used to be men in the country whose ministry was full of savor to the people of God. What was there about them? Were they great critics? I do not suppose that the good men ever read a work on criticism. Were they profoundly learned? Assuredly they were not. Profoundly learned brethren were preaching in churches and chapels where there were more spiders than people. Those who displayed their learning and rhetoric had empty places, but these men were followed by multitudes, and wherever they spoke the places were too strait for them. Those who did not know the reason said one to another, "What is there about these men? We do not see any peculiar talent." And there was not much. "We do not see any profound learning." And there was none to see. "We do not hear anything of advanced thought and liberal ideas." No, these good men were innocent of these modern diseases. What was it that made this preaching so attractive, so edifying? What drew the Lord's people so far? What evoked such enthusiasm? Why, it was that the preacher spoke of his Lord, and never wandered from the cross. Their dear Lord and Master was never long absent from their discoursing. If they preached doctrine, it was "the truth as it is in Jesus." If they preached experience, it was "to know Him and the fellowship of His sufferings." And if they went into practice, as they did, their idea of holiness was to be made like to Jesus and to follow Him without the camp, bearing His reproach. Therefore an essential to savory meat is that it shall have Christ in it. He has said, "My flesh is meat indeed, and My blood is drink indeed," and there is no meat and no drink that has such savor in it as this. Oh, that we might hear more of a crucified Christ in all our places of assembly!

The next necessity to secure savor is a devout spirit in the preacher—

A SAVOR OF DEVOTION.

I am trying to explain savor by not attempting a definition, but by noticing its accompaniments. Why, those men who have now gone to heaven, whom you used to hear, seemed to be praying while they preached; their sermons were devotions as well as discourses; their rhetoric was rapture, their oratory was emotion. It is an ill sign when the teacher of truth does not himself believe it; for thus he becomes a virtual spreader of error. David said, "I believed: therefore have I spoken." Do you not believe, brother? Then go home and be quiet till you do. At least, do not come into the pulpit until you know what your Lord would have you say. Woe to the man who lets the smoke of undried wood come from off his hearth and blow into poor seekers' eyes. We want live coals from off the altar, and the less doubt-smoke the better. Where a man has evidently been with God to learn the truth, and has been baptized into the everlasting spirit of that truth, and therefore speaks what he does know and testifies what he has seen in the fear of the living God, there is a savor about his witness, and the saints discern it gladly. This holy savor cannot be imitated or borrowed; it must come of personal assurance. It is a holy thing, and the composition thereof is known only to the great Giver of all spiritual gifts, the Lord Himself.

Another matter goes to make up sweet savor in a discourse, and that is,

A SAVOR OF EXPERIENCE.

You used to delight in those men because they had tasted and tested the doctrines which they preached. Such experience puts a kind of spice into the food which they present to you. It is so in all our communications one to another. We do not speak with certainty of edification unless we speak of what we have ourselves enjoyed. I never heard a man who spoke more to my soul than dear Mr. George Müller. The sermon that I heard from him was like an address to a Sunday-school, it was so simple and unadorned; but then there was the man behind it—that simple-hearted child of God, who has believed the promises, and has gone on doing wonders such as astonish all beholders. That man has no more doubt about God's answering his prayers than he has about twice two making four—why should he have? He acts out the truth which he has received—why should he not? Entertaining no modern questions and no ancient questions either, he triumphs by knowing the truth and living the truth, and rejoicing in the truth. Such a man is a pattern and example to us all, and there is a precious savor in what he utters, because he speaks experimentally of truths which he has carried out in his own life.

But these things are not the whole of it. There is a sacred something: it is not nameless, for I will name it by-and-by: it is a heavenly influence which comes into man, but which has no name among the things that belong to men. This sacred influence pervades the speaker, flavoring his matter, and governing his spirit, while at the same time it rests upon the hearer so that he finds his mind awake, his faculties attentive, his heart stirred. Under this mysterious influence the hearer's spirit is in a receptive condition, and as he hears the truth it sinks into his soul as snow-flakes drop into the sea. He finds himself warmed, and cheered, and comforted, and stirred up, as fainting men are wont to be when refreshed after a long fast. Now, what is this? Whence comes this savor? In a word, it cometh of the Holy Ghost. The Holy Spirit bears witness with the word upon the quickened heart and conscience of the people of God, and that word becomes life, light, and power to them.

All this we greatly need; and if we have it not, what shall we do? I have often trembled as I have come to preach here lest I should have to speak among you without the help of the Divine Spirit. It would be much better to be silent. I could almost wish that we had the liberty of our Quaker friends just to sit still until we feel that we are moved to speak; for sometimes we might do better to wait without a spoken word for the hour and a half rather than for one of us to talk without the guidance of the Spirit of God. Pray much, beloved, that there may be a great deal of dew about—that heavenly showers may fall on us and on all the churches of God.

THE UNSAVORY NOT TO BE EATEN.

II. Our second remark is this. I find a rendering given to the text, which, if it be not absolutely accurate, nevertheless states an important truth, namely, that that which is unsavory from want of salt must not be eaten. I shall only mention this second head as a note of caution. A word to the wise suffices.

There is a great deal in this world which is unsavory for want of salt; I mean

IN COMMON CONVERSATION.

Alas, it is easy to meet with people—and even people wearing the Christian name—whose conversation has not a particle of salt in it. Nothing that tends to edification is spoken by them. Their talk has an abundance of gayety, but no grace in it. They exhibit any amount of frivolity, but no godliness. In other conversation there is information weighty and solid upon common matters; but there is a lack of that spirit which God's people desire to live in, for the Lord Jesus is forgotten. Some one said to me the other day, "When we were young people, we knew many good old folk who used to meet together and talk about the Lord Jesus Christ by the hour together, and we used to sit and wonder whether we should ever join in such talk as that. But where do you hear it now?" So I said to him, "I hope that we can hear it in a great many places." "Ah," said he, "I do not meet with it. I find that the ordinary talk among professors has not much in it for the helping of souls onward toward heaven." I do not profess to form a judgment on this matter, but I will say this—that it is a great pity if holy converse be a scarce commodity; and it is well for you and for me to get away from that conversation which does not benefit us. If there is no salt in conversation, it will be unsavory to a true Christian spirit, and the less he has of it the better.

Again, there is some talk in the world—I hope not among professors—which has no salt in it even of common morality; and consequently it corrupts, and becomes impure and obnoxious. The wit which owes its pungency to sin is of the devil. The brilliance which comes of corruption is not for holy eyes. O child of God, never tolerate it in your company! If it be not in your power to stop evil communications, remove yourself out of their reach. It is not for us to associate with those whose lips are cankered with lascivious words. We have enough within these gunpowder hearts to make us afraid to go near the forge when the sparks are flying about. Let us keep ourselves from ever permitting corrupt communication to proceed out of our own lips: that would be horrible indeed. Let us avoid all company wherein the purity of a renewed heart would be in danger of taint.

Now, the same thing is true, not only of common conversation, but of a great deal of

MODERN TEACHING.

Have nothing to do with teaching that is tainted with heresy, brethren. If a man's discoursing has not salt enough in it to keep false doctrine out of it, it is not the kind of food for you. Clean provender is not so scarce that you need to eat carrion. Some like their meat rather high, and there are hearers who are inclined to a preacher who has a sniff of heresy about him; but, as for us, our taste conducts us where salt is found. Where grace is lacking we are not eager to be feeding. The banquets of truth need not be supplemented by the tables of error.

THINGS NEEDING SALT.

III. The third point is, that there are certain things in the world which need something else with them. "Can that which is unsavory be eaten without salt? or is there any taste in the white of an egg?" There are many things in this world which we cannot tolerate by themselves; they need seasoning with them. One of the first of these may read us a lesson of prudence; that is, reproof. It is a Christian duty to reprove a brother who is in a fault, and we should speak to him with all gentleness and quietness, that we may prevent his going farther into evil, and lead him back to the right way. But will you please remember, brothers and sisters, that the giving of reproofs is dainty work, and needs a delicate hand.

Some persons have a very quick eye for the faults of others, and they have a ready tongue to descant upon them when they perceive them; to all which they add a tendency to exaggerate the importance of the fault. Now, these brethren always reprove in a wrong way. Listen. One of them cries, "Come here, brother! Come here. Let me take that beam out of your eye." The aforesaid "beam" is really only a mote; and the brother who is addressed becomes indignant at such injustice, and will not have his eye touched at all. Why destroy your own influence by such unwisdom? If the mote can be removed, well and good; but if you will ruin the eye in the process, would it not be better to let it alone? We have known persons who, to spread truth, have killed love, which is truth's life. They wish to set a brother right in doctrine, and, in order that his sight may be clearer and call it "controversy."

It is one thing to be "valiant for the truth," and quite another thing to be bitter for your own opinion. Rebuke, however kindly you put it, and however prudently you administer it, will always be an unsavory thing: therefore, salt it well. Think over it. Pray over it. Mix kindness with it. Rub the salt of brotherly love into it. Speak with much deference to your erring friend, and use much tenderness, because you are not faultless yourself. Speak acknowledging all the excellences and virtues of your brother which may, after all, be greater than your own; and try, if you can, to wrap up what you have to say in gentle words of praise for something else wherein the friend excels.

Express the rebuke in one of your Master's sentences, if you can find one that will exactly fit. Give your patient the pill silver coated with gentleness; it will be received the more willingly and have none the less efficacy. If you speak unkindly, the reproved one may turn round upon you in anger, and if you ask him why he is wroth, he may answer, "Can that which is unsavory be eaten without salt? or is there any taste in the white of an egg?" Do not expect your neighbor to eat your eggs without salt. Do not expect him to receive your words of rebuke without the true kindliness of voice and spirit which will act as salt. Be not silent about sin, but be not harsh in your rebuke of it. Savor your admonitions with affection, and may the Lord make them acceptable to those who need them.

SALT IN DOCTRINE.

Now for other matters which many people do not like by themselves; I mean, the doctrines of the Gospel. The true doctrines of the Gospel never were popular, and never will be; but there is no need for any of us to make them more distasteful than they naturally are. The human heart especially revolts at the sovereignty of divine grace. It becomes us who preach this doctrine to take care that we do not add needless offensiveness to it. No one of the doctrines of grace is palatable to man naturally. He does not like the truth of total depravity. Over that he grows exceeding wroth. He calls it a libel upon the nobility of human nature. I have often read of human nature as a noble thing; but I am sorry to say that I have never seen it in that aspect. It is little wonder that this is unsavory to carnal pride. As to the doctrine of justification by faith alone, Mrs. Toogood stamps her foot at such teaching—is she to be none the better for all her good works? Mr. Good-Enough gnashes his teeth at the idea that human merits cannot save. He cannot endure to hear that we must be saved by faith in Jesus Christ, and that the most moral and excellent need Christ quite as much as the most depraved and abandoned.

Brothers and sisters, since we want people to receive these doctrines, what must we do? We must mix an abundance of salt with them. If the Gospel be distasteful we must add a flavoring to it. What shall it be? We cannot do better than

FLAVOR IT WITH HOLINESS!

Where there is a holy life men cannot easily doubt the principles out of which it springs. If it be so that men and women are kindly, generous, tender, affectionate, upright, truthful, Christ-like, because of the doctrines they hold, then the world begins to think that there must be truth in those doctrines. The evangelical school must always draw its strongest arguments first from the Gospel, and next from the lives of its believers; and if we cannot point to those who profess this faith as being famous for holiness, what will the world say? In former ages holy living has been our battle-axe and weapons of war. Look at the Puritanic age. To this day it is the stumbling-block of infidelity. In these times it is very common to laugh at the Puritans, and to say that their faith is outworn, and that we have got beyond their teaching; and yet the very same men who say this cannot read Carlyle's writings without marvelling at Oliver Cromwell, and the great men who trooped around him. Do they never say to themselves, Upon what meat did these men feed that they have grown so great? O fools and slow of heart! Will not history teach them? No, it will not if the Bible does not. If they hear not Christ and His apostles, neither will they believe even though another Unitarian ghost should pass before their eye. Surely evil days are near, unless the church shall again clasp the truth to her heart.

But I diverge. The point I had in hand was this—that in the case of the Puritans their doctrines were rendered respectable and forceful by their glorious lives; and it must be so now. Holy living must salt our doctrines. We must be like Christ that men may believe what we have to say about Christ.

Now, a third egg which cannot be eaten without salt is affliction.

AFFLICTIONS ARE VERY UNSAVORY

things. I think I hear one say, "I should not mind any affliction except the one which now oppresses me." Brother, you speak as other foolish brethren have done before you. This has been my language in my turn. Somebody sitting next to you would not mind your affliction at all; at least, he thinks so; it is his own cross which is so galling. The loads borne by people in yonder street have no great weight for you; but if you had to carry a sack of flour yourself, the sack would prove very heavy. We all know the weight of our own burden, but we underestimate that of others. People in trouble know where their own shoe pinches; yet other people's shoes pinch too, and other people's crosses are weighty.

Afflictions are unsavory meat. What is to be done with them, then? Why, let us salt them, if we can. Salt your affliction with patience, and it will make a royal dish. By grace, like the apostle, we shall "glory in tribulations also." Look at those who endure constant infirmities. Do you know any? I do. A dear sister has been blind many years, and yet I do not know a happier woman than she is. She has more visions of joy than the most of us, though her eyes are closed to the light of the sun. I know a brother in the ministry who has lost his sight almost entirely; but he preaches more sweetly than ever he did; he has become a seer in our Israel, enjoying a depth of insight into truth which few possess. Truly the lame take the prey! Some that are deaf hear the voice of their Master better than others. And so infirmities become things to glory in, since Christ's power the better rests upon us.

It is so when the Lord gives grace to the poor man and he becomes contented with his lot. Has he not far greater joy than the rich man who still craves for more? There now, brother, do not go on eating that egg without salt; no longer say to yourself, "Here is nothing but the white, with no taste in it. I cannot bear to eat such loathsome food." Put the salt in, brother; put the salt in, sister. Have you been forgetting that salt? Have you failed to ask of the Lord grace equal to your day?—grace to see that "all things work together for good to them that love God?" Be forgetful no longer, but throw in a pinch of salt; then the tasteless thing will go down comfortably enough, and you will bless the name of the Lord for it.

I will not detain you longer to speak about persecution, though that is another unsavory article, with which salt of consolation is much to be desired.

But, lastly, there is the thought of death. Is not in itself? The body dreads dissolution and corruption, and the mind starts back from the prospect of quitting the warm precincts of this house of clay, and going into what seems a cold, rarefied region, where the shivering spirit flits naked into mystery untried. Who likes to sit down and think of his last hour—the corpse, the coffin, and the shroud? The spade, and the mattock, and the falling clods make poor music for gay minds? Who cares for charnel houses? Oh, but dear friends, thoughts of death, when they are salted, are among the richest, daintiest things that ever come to the believer's table; for what is it to die? Is it not to end our pilgrimage, and come to the place where the many mansions be? Is it not to quit the storm-tossed seas for the Fair Havens where all is bliss forever? Death strips the soul of its garments, and by itself this seems a trying process; but season it well, and you will long for evening in order to undress, that you may rest with God. Salt it well, and you will almost grow impatient of your length of days, and look for your last hours as children do for their holidays, when they may go home.

"What salt," say you, "shall I mingle with my thoughts of death?" Why the thought that you cannot die; since because He lives you shall live also. Add to it the persuasion that though you be dead, yet shall you live. Thoughts of the resurrection and the swinging open of the pearly gates, and of your entrance there; thoughts of the vision of the Well-beloved's face; thoughts of the glory that shall be yours forever and ever at His own right hand—these are the things with which to savor your meditations among the tombs.

As for you that are not in Christ, you must eat this unsavory meat, and with it. I see you put it away from you. You say, "No, I do not mean to think of death." O man, but you will have to die, and it may be full soon. O woman, you will have to die; the seeds of death are in your bosom now. As surely as you live, you will have to die; and after death the judgment. This is the meat which will be laid in your dish, and there will be no leaving it. This is the white of the egg, and you must even down with it, whether you will or no. It has no taste which your palate can enjoy; it has no savor about it but that of fear.

Ah, when your conscience awakes, what will you do with the burning thought that, dying, you must go where hope can never come? That is unsavory meat for you. The Lord help you to salt it, even yet, by believing in Jesus, and so finding eternal salvation. Amen.

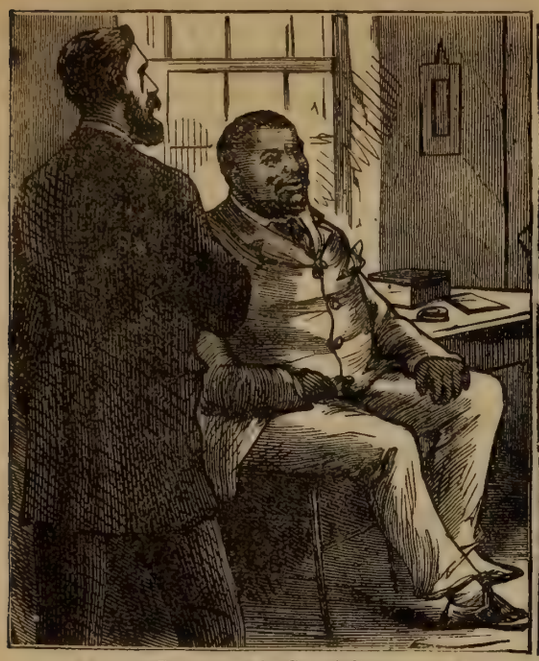
CETEWAYO,

The Late King of Zululand.

On the next page is a portrait of the sable monarch whose death has so quickly followed his restoration to his throne. Accompanying it are portraits of four of his wives and of the King in the dress he wore during his captivity, taken from photographs.

Shortly after his defeat and capture by the British in July, 1879, and while he was held a prisoner at the Cape of Good Hope, he was visited by Mr. William Noble, the founder in England of the Blue Ribbon army. Mr. Noble thus described on his return the interview he had with the much-dreaded chief: "From what I had heard I thought I was going to see a man specially made to terrify people, but I had occasion to modify that opinion. On entering the apartment where he was, I found him with his attendants. He never allows his wives to sit with him. To look at Cetewayo one would take him for a black 'Claimant,' at least as regards bulk. He received me in the most kindly manner, but did not make free at first. The interpreter introduced me, and the king rose and shook my hand. He did not at all look as if he were going to murder me.

"Having my concertina with me, I played a bugle-call. He had heard that before, on the battlefield. He clapped his hands and exclaimed, 'Ha, ha!' I played 'My Grandfather's Clock,' when he again clapped his hands. Having asked whether my friends and I might sing a hymn to him, he assented, took off his hat and told his attendants to uncover. We sung 'Jesus, lover of my soul,' which seemed to make a great impression upon him. He knows, however, but little of Jesus. When a lady showed him a picture of the Saviour, he simply inquired 'why that man's hands were upraised?' The same lady asked him whether he was not much better off where he was than at the Castle? His reply was: 'What is this apartment to me? One place is a good as another to a captive.'



Cetewayo in Captivity.

The late Cetewayo, King of the Zulus.

Four Wives of Cetewayo (from a Photograph).

"I told him we had an enemy in England which killed 60,000 of us every year, and added, 'We have an army fighting against it, but we have not won the victory yet.' He said: 'Who is the enemy?' I replied 'square-face, the square-face you drink.' Gin is called square-face out there."

Cetewayo, the fat, gross man clad in European dress, as Mr. Noble saw him, was, however, a very different looking man to Cetewayo ten years younger in his war-dress at the head of his troop of stalwart, half-naked warriors. The picture above, represents the Cetewayo of that time, nor did the savage, merciless look on his face belie his character. He was as ruthless as he looked. A correspondent of the New York Herald thus described him as he appeared in fighting trim: "He was taller than his father, and, though he was slender and graceful in figure, his face had an imperious and forbidding expression. His eyes were exceptionally large and brilliant; but his forehead, though broad for a Kaffir, was very receding, while the lower part of his face denoted a determined nature. He was very elaborately dressed."

Cetewayo was the eldest son of his father, Umpanda, the King of the Zulus, who live in South Africa near the English colony of Natal. When Cetewayo was thirty-two years old he became impatient for the succession. This led to quarrels and threats, and some of Cetewayo's younger brothers, fearing that he might make sure of the succession by making a clean sweep of his rivals, collected a body of their adherents and made off for Natal, with the intention of invoking English protection. Cetewayo at once gave chase, and in a bloody battle five of his brothers were slain. But Umpanda had two other sons left alive, and these he placed under the protection of the authorities at Natal. Soon after this Umpanda died and Cetewayo succeeded him.

Sir Bartle Frere, the English governor of Cape Colony, at length became alarmed at Cetewayo's power, and in 1878 found a pretext to make war upon him. A small English force was sent into Zululand, which was surrounded at Isandula by Cetewayo's troops and completely annihilated. Reinforcements were then sent from England, and the tide of Cetewayo's success was checked, but he still managed to harass his foes and cut off any straggling parties from the main body. The most notable of these feats was that in which he attacked a troop under Captain Carey, who was accompanied by the young prince Napoleon, son of Napoleon III. of France. Captain Carey and his men when attacked sprang to their horses and fled, but Prince Napoleon was suffering from an abscess in his leg and was unable to mount his horse without some one to hold it. Captain Carey, however, was too much concerned for his own safety to care for his comrade, and rode away, leaving the prince to be slaughtered by the savages. The coward's glib tongue saved him from punishment for his baseness, and he continued in the British army until his death a few months ago.

Cetewayo was eventually surrounded and captured, and was kept a prisoner at Capetown until August, 1882, when by his own desire he was taken to England to plead his cause in person. The result was that he was restored to his throne, but under pledges to England which crippled his power and ruined his prestige with his followers. Almost immediately on his return they rebelled against him, and in attempting to suppress the insurrection he was killed. His wives (for Cetewayo, after the manner of African kings, was a polygamist on an extensive scale) were also killed, as also were the chiefs who supported him. The news of his death was cabled here on July 25th last.

DR. BLANK'S BONDAGE.

A few years ago a physician of eminence, a practitioner whom we will call Dr. Blank, well known and highly esteemed in a great city on the Atlantic coast, suddenly disposed of his practice and went to Europe, accompanied by his wife, to whom he had been married not more than a year. He had a large circle of acquaintance, not only among his patients, among whom were some of the most influential citizens, including the mayor and the governor of the State, but also among scientific men, and especially among his brethren of the medical profession. His medical knowledge was profound; he diagnosed successfully cases which had puzzled many eminent physicians, and his brilliant operations had been the delight of the students who crowded the amphitheatre whenever it was known that his hand would hold the knife. Nevertheless at thirty-eight years of age he resigned his practice and disappeared from public life.

What was the cause? Why did Dr. Blank sacrifice his brilliant future? Not one among his friends could guess the reason. There were many conjectures, but not one was true. The real cause was known only to himself and his wife. Dr. Blank was a drunkard. He had concealed the fact from his patients, and even from his medical friends, whose quick eyes never detected any sign of his secret vice. His acquaintance with the pharmacopœia enabled him to tone himself up so that the marks of dissipation were not revealed, and it was only when he saw, or fancied he saw, in the face of a physician with whom he was called in consultation, a suspicion of the truth that he was seized with sudden alarm, sold his practice, and went off to Europe.

But his wife could have narrated a terrible story of distress, anxiety, and even personal danger. She knew that many a night when Dr. Blank's footman had been told to say to inquirers that he was not at home, the doctor was lying on the lounge in his study stupefied with brandy. The next day, in his customary neat attire, clean shaven face and dignified deportment, he was visiting his patients without a sign of what had occurred. In a few days he would again fall under the power of liquor, but always in secret. Taking a bottle or two of brandy into his study, he would lock himself in and drink himself into stupefaction. At such times it was dangerous to go near him, but his wife, anxious to conceal his degradation from the household, always sat by him until he recovered, though more than once in his drunken frenzy, mistaking her for some one else, he had struck at her with a surgical knife.

When they went to Europe, physicians were consulted and their prescriptions used without relief. It seemed as if this brilliant physician must go down to a drunkard's grave. One physician, however, two years after they left America, recommended a long sea-voyage, and Dr. and Mrs. Blank took passage on a steamer going to Egypt. On that steamer there was among the passengers a medical missionary. He was a young man who, having studied for a physician and having passed his examination with honors and received his diploma, had been converted and was then on his way to mission work in Africa. Dr. Blank admired the young missionary's brilliant acquirements and his knowledge of certain branches of study, in which he too was deeply interested. They had many conversations during the voyage, and at length Dr. Blank told him his story.

The young missionary was not surprised, for Dr. Blank was now less able to conceal his habits. Among strangers he had not so powerful a motive to do so as at home, and, moreover, he was losing fast the power to control himself. The young missionary had no prescription for drugs to give, but he was full of hope. He preached Jesus to the poor slave, and told him of Him who came to set free them that were bound. Neither Dr. Blank nor his wife had ever given a thought to personal religion. The former was what is called an agnostic, a man who declared he knew nothing of the soul and of a hereafter; Mrs. Blank a woman of the world, gentle, tender, devoted, beautiful, but content with the pleasures and joys of this life. Before the voyage ended the prayers and pleadings of the missionary were blessed of God to the conversion of the miserable enslaved physician and of his scarcely less miserable wife. The liquor was put away, and Dr. Blank never touched another drop. But the cure came too late to save his life. He landed in Algiers, and there in that beautiful climate he spent the few remaining months of his wrecked life. His delicate sensitive organism was fatally undermined by the dissipation of the past years, and he slowly sank into his grave. But those few months were the most happy of his life. His simple, childlike trust in Christ, who had delivered him from his bondage, was a marvel even to his wife. In reading the New Testament his vigorous intellect was charmed, and his faith and joy increased, and he died triumphantly.

Mrs. Blank quits the Dinner Table.

Mrs. Blank spent a year in retirement in Europe, and then returned to her home in America. She was a different woman from the miserable, shrinking, apprehensive creature that had left these shores a few short years before; different too from the gay, light-hearted girl who had stood at the altar with the brilliant physician. But the gravity of her demeanor was set down to her recent sorrow, and her friends declared that she was not less charming than in her youth. She must be aroused and induced to enter society, and invitations flowed in upon her. She declined them all until one came from an eminent clergyman, who had been an intimate friend of Dr. Blank. That she accepted, hoping there to find congenial friends and spiritual conversation. She entered the room looking very beautiful in her black velvet robe, tall, stately, and with queenly carriage. A large party awaited her arrival, eager to renew her acquaintance. Scientific men, fashionable ladies were there, most of whom she knew well, but she was disappointed in her expectation of religious intercourse.

The evening passed drearily for her, and at dinner a shock passed through her as she saw wines of rare vintage on the tables. That was the demon which had slain her beloved husband, and she recoiled in horror at the sight of it. Her face was deadly pale, but she said nothing. A little later, however, a distinguished Frenchman, a professor in a French university, who was seated near her, in the course of a discussion uttered a remark so atheistical, revealing in language flippant and contemptuous his scorn of religion, that she could bear it no longer. She rose from her seat, and not daring to trust herself to words, she turned and quitted the room. Her hostess followed her, fearing she was ill. But Mrs. Blank was not ill, though deeply agitated, and she lost no time in leaving the house. That was the last dinner-party she attended, and she has since found a more congenial occupation in works of Christian charity and in endeavoring to aid those who are in a bondage, the horrors of which she has witnessed, and the only way of deliverance from which, she knows.

A SERIAL STORY.

The Secret Told.

"I SAW my wife step in here," said Mr. Chantrey, holding out his hand to Ann Holland, and attempting to open the door before which she still stood. She could not speak for a moment, but she kept her post firmly in opposition to him.

"My wife is here?" he asked, in a sharp impetuous tone.

"Yes; oh yes!" cried Ann Holland; "but wait a moment, Mr. Chantrey. Oh, wait a little while. Don't go in and see her yet."

"Why not?" he asked again, a sudden terror taking hold of him.

"Sit down a minute or two, sir," she answered. "Mrs. Chantrey's ill, just ailing a little. She is not prepared to meet you just yet. You were not expected before to-morrow, and she's excited; she hardly knows what she's saying or doing. You'd better not speak to her or see her till she's recovered herself a little."

"Poor Sophy!" cried David Chantrey, with a tremor in his voice; "did she see me coming, then? Go back to her, Miss Holland; she will want you. Is there nothing I can do for her? It has been a hard time for her, poor girl!"

Ann Holland went back into the parlor, and he smiled as he heard her take the precaution of turning the key in the lock. He threw himself into the three-cornered chair, and sat listening to the murmur of voices on the other side of the door. It seemed a very peaceful home. The quaintness and antiqueness of the homely kitchen chimed in with his present feeling; he wanted no display or grandeur. This was no common every-day world he was in; there was a strange flavor about every circumstance. Impatient as he was to see Sophy, and hold her once more in his arms, he could not but feel a sense of comfort and tranquillity mingling with his more unquiet happiness. There was a fire burning cheerily on the hearth, though it was a May evening. Coming from a warmer climate, he felt chilly, and he bent over the fire, stretching over it his long thin hands, which told plainly their story of mere scholarly work and of health never very vigorous. Smiling all the time, with the glow of the flame on his face, with its expression of tranquil gladness, as of one who had long been buffeted about, but had reached home at last, he sat listening till the voices ceased. A profound silence followed, which lasted some time, before Ann Holland returned to him saying softly, "She is asleep."

Ann Holland sat down on the other side of the hearth, opposite her rector; but she could not lift up her eyes to his face. There was no one in the world whom she loved so well. His forbearance and kindness toward her unfortunate brother, who was the plague and shame of her life, had completely won for him an affection that would have astonished him if he could have known its devotion. This moment would have been one of unalloyed delight to her had there been no trouble lurking for him, of which he was altogether unaware. So rejoiced she was at his return that it seemed as if no event in her monotonous life hitherto had been so happy; yet she was terrified at the very thought of his coming wretchedness.

When Sophy had fled to her with the cry that her husband was come, and she dared not meet him as she was, she had seen in an instant that she must prevent it by some means or other. The hope that Mr. Chantrey's return would bring about a reformation in his wife had grown faint in her heart, for during the last few months the sin had taken deeper and deeper root; and now, the day only before she expected him, she had not had strength to resist the temptation to it. Sophy had been crying hysterically, and trembling at the thought of meeting him as she was; and she had made Ann promise to break to him gently the confession she would otherwise be compelled to make herself. Ann Holland sat opposite to him, with downcast eyes, and a face almost heartbroken by the shame and sorrow she foresaw for him.

"She is asleep," he said, repeating her words in a lowered voice, as if he was afraid of disturbing her.

"Yes," she answered.

"It is strange," he said, after a short pause; "strange she can sleep now. Has she been ill? Sophy always assured me she was quite well and strong. It is strange she can sleep when she knows I am here."

"She was very ill and low after you went, sir," she replied; "it was like as if her heart was broken, parting with you and Master Charlie both together. Dear, dear! it might have been better for her if you'd been poor folks, and she'd had to work hard for you both. She'd just nothing to do, and nobody to turn to for comfort, poor thing. Mrs. Bolton meant to be kind, and was kind in her way; but she fell into a low fever, and the doctors all ordered her as much wine and support as ever she could take."

"I never heard of it," said Mr. Chantrey; "they never told me."

"No; they were fearful of your coming back too soon," she went on; "and, thank God, you are looking quite yourself again, sir. All Upton will be as glad as glad can be, and the old church'll be crammed again. Mr. Warden's done all a man could do; but everybody said he wasn't you and we longed for you back again, but not too soon—no, no, not too soon."

"But my wife," he said; "has she been ill all the time?"

For a minute or two she could not find words to answer his question. She knew that it could not be long before he learned the truth, if not from her or his wife, then from Mrs. Bolton or his friend Mr. Warden. It was too much the common talk of the neighborhood for him to escape hearing of it, even if she could hope that Mrs. Chantrey would have strength of mind enough to cast off the sin at once. Now was the time to break it to him gently, with quiet and friendly hints rather than with hard words. But how was she to do it? How could she best soften the sorrow and disgrace?

"Is my wife ill yet?" he demanded again, in a more agitated voice.

"Not ill now," she answered, "but she's not quite herself yet. You'll help her, sir. You'll know how to treat her kindly and softly, and bring her round again. There's a deal in being mild and patient with folks. You know my poor brother, as fierce as a tiger, and that obstinate, tortures would not move him; but he's like a lamb with you, Mr. Chantrey. I think sometimes if he could live in the same house with you, if he'd been your brother, poor fellow! you'd save him; for he'll do anything for you, short of keeping away from drink. You'll bring Mrs. Chantrey round, I'm sure."

Mr. Chantrey smiled again, as the comparison between the drunken old saddler and his own fair, sweet young wife, flitted across his brain, Ann Holland, in her voluble flow of words, hit upon curious combinations. Still she had not removed his anxiety about his wife. Was Sophy suffering from the effects of the low, nervous fever yet?

"Yes; I'll take care of my wife," he said, glancing toward the parlor door; "it has been a sore trial, this long separation of ours. But it's over now; and she is dearer to me than ever she was."

"Ay! love will do almost everything," she answered, sadly, "and I know you will never get tired or worn out, if it's for years and years. A thing like this doesn't come right all at once; but if it comes right at last, we have cause to be thankful. Mr. Warden has not had full patience; and Mrs. Bolton lost hers too soon. Neither of them knows it as I know it. You can't storm it away; and it's no use raving at it. Only love and patience can do it; and not that always. But we are bound to bear with them, poor things! even to death. We cannot measure God's patience with our measure."

Ann Holland's voice trembled, and her eyes filled with tears, which glistened in the firelight. She could not bear to speak more plainly to her rector, whom she loved and reverenced so greatly. She could not think of him as being brought down on a level with herself, the sister of a known drunkard. It seemed a horrible thing to her; this sorrow hanging over him, of which he was so utterly unconscious. Mr. Chantrey had fastened his eyes upon her as if he would read her inmost thoughts. His voice trembled a little, too, when he spoke.

"What has this to do with my wife?" he asked, "for what reason have my aunt and Mr. Warden lost patience with her?"

"Oh, it's best for me to tell you, not them," she said, the tears streaming down her cheeks; "it will be very hard for you to hear, whoever says it. Everybody knows it; and it could never be kept from you. But you can save her, Mr. Chantrey, if anybody can. It's best for me to tell you at once. She was so ill, and low, and miserable; and the doctors kept on ordering her wine, and things like that; and it was the only thing that comforted her, and kept her up; and she got to depend upon it to save her from loneliness and wretchedness, and now she can't break herself of taking it—of taking too much."

"O my God!" cried Mr. Chantrey. It was a cry from the very depths of his spirit, as by a sudden flash he saw the full meaning of Ann Holland's faltered words. Sophy had fled from him, conscious that she was in no fit state to meet him after their long separation. She was sleeping now the heavy sleep of excess. Was it possible that this was true? Could it be anything but a feverish dream that he was sitting there, and Ann Holland was telling him such an utterly incredible story?

But Ann Holland's tearful face, with its expression of profound grief and pity, was too real for her story to be a dream. He, David Chantrey, the rector of Upton, whom all men looked up to and esteemed, had a wife, who was whispered about among them all as a victim to a vile and degrading sin. A strong shock of revulsion ran through his veins, which had been thrilling with an unquiet happiness all the day. There was an inexplicable, mysterious misery in it. If he had come home to find her dead, he could have borne to look upon her lying in her coffin, knowing that life could never be bright again for him; but he would have held up his head among his fellow-men. It would have been no shame or degradation either for him or her to have laid her in the tranquil churchyard, beside their little child, where he could have seen her grave through his vestry window, and gone from it to his pulpit, facing his congregation, sorrowful but not disgraced. He was just coming back to his people with higher aims, and greater resolves, determined to fight more strenuously against every form of evil among them; and this was the first gigantic sin which met him on his own threshold and his own hearth.

"She's so young," pleaded Ann Holland, frightened at the ashy hue that had spread over his face, "and she's been so lonesome. Then it was always easy to get it, when she felt low; for Mrs. Bolton's servants rule the house, and there's the best of everything in her cellars. James Brown says he could never refuse Mrs. Chantrey, she was so miserable, poor thing! But now you will take her home; and she'll have you, and Master Charlie. You'll save her, sir, sooner or later; never fear."

"Let me go and see her," he said, in a choking voice.

Ann Holland opened the door so carefully that the latch did not click or the hinges creak; and, shading the light with her hand, she stood beside him for a minute or two, as he looked down upon his sleeping wife. She did not dare to lift her eyes to his face; but she knew that all the light and glow of gladness had fled from it, and a gray look of terror had crept across it. He was a very different man from the one who had been seated on her hearth a short half-hour ago. He bade her leave him alone, and without a light, and she obeyed him, though reluctantly, and with an undefined fear of him in his wretchedness.

It seemed to Mr. Chantrey as if an age had passed over him. As persons who are drowning see in one brief moment all the course of their past lives, with its most trivial circumstances, so he seemed to have looked into his own future, stretching before him in gloom and darkness, and foreseen a thousand miserable results springing from this fatal source. She was his wife, dearer to him than any other object in the world; but after she had repented and reformed, as surely she would repent and reform, she could never be to him again what she had been. There was a faint gleam of moonlight stealing into the familiar room, and he could just distinguish her form lying on the white-covered sofa. With an overwhelming sense of wretchedness and bewilderment he fell upon his knees beside her, and burying his face in his hands, cried again, "O my God!"

How long he knelt there, Mr. Chantrey did not know. He felt cramped and stiff, for he did not stir from his first position; and he had uttered no other word of prayer. But at last Sophy moved and turned her head; and he lifted up his face at the sound. The moon was shining full into the room, and they could see one another, but not distinctly, as in daylight. She looked at him in dreamy silence for a few moments, and then she timidly stretched out her hand, and whispered, "David!"

"My wife!" he answered, laying his own cold hand upon hers.

For some few minutes neither of them spoke again. They gazed at one another as though some great gulf had opened between them, and neither of them could cross it. In the dim light they could only see the pallid outline of each other's face, as though they had met in some strange, sad world. But presently he leaned over her, and kissed her.

"Oh," she cried, with a sudden loudness that rang through the quiet room, "you know all! You know how wicked I am. But you don't know how lonely and wretched I have been. I tried to break myself of it. I did try to keep from it; but it was always there on the table when I sat down to my meals with Aunt Bolton; and I could always find comfort in it. Oh, help me! Don't cast me off; don't hate me. Help me."

"I will help you," he answered, earnestly; but he could say no more. The mere sound of the words she spoke unnerved him.

"And I have made you miserable just as you are coming home!" she went on. "I never meant to do that. But I was so restless, looking forward to to-morrow; and aunt's maid advised me to take a little, for fear I should be quite ill when you came. I should have been all right to-morrow; and I was so resolved never to touch it again, after you had come home. You are come back quite strong, are you? There is no more fear for you? Oh, I will conquer myself; I must conquer myself. If it had not always been in my sight, and the doctors had not ordered it, I should never have been so wicked. Do you forgive me? Do you think God will forgive me?"

"Can you give it up?" he asked.

"Oh, I must, I will give it up," she sobbed; "but if I do, and if you forgive me, it can never be the same again. You will not think the same of me—and people have seen me—they all talk about it—and I shall always be ashamed before them. I am a disgrace to you; Aunt Bolton has said so again and again. Then there's Charlie; I'm not fit to be his mother. That is quite true. However long I live, people in Upton will remember it, and gossip about it. If they had let me die it would have been better for us all. You could have loved me then."

"But I love you still," he answered, in a voice of tenderness and pity; "you are very dear to me. How can I ever cease to love you?"

Yet as he spoke a terrible thought flashed through his mind that his wife might some day become to him an object of unutterable disgust.

ISRAEL FORSAKING GOD.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 19, Judges 2 : 6-16. Golden Text, ver. 12. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Unfailing Result of Divine Guidance—Othniel's Achievement—A Type of Christ—The First Check—Weakness in Strength—The Reproof of the Angel—Tribute Taken from the Passions—Help Withdrawn—Teaching Neglected—The Deliverance—Their Vacillation—The Danger of Compromise.

AFTER the death of Joshua, the children of Israel continued at first to inquire of the Lord, and to be guided by Him. By His direction Judah went up against the Canaanites, and "the Lord delivered the land into his hand." There is never any lack of result to our work so long as we are really guided by God; the lack of blessing comes from our independence of Him. Caleb, Joshua's companion-spy, and companion-wanderer in the wilderness, outlived him. Caleb had asked for Hebron "fellowship" as his inheritance, and a precious inheritance it is. What is equal to real continuous fellowship with God? But there lay within his inheritance Kirjath Sepher "the city of the book." And Caleb said, "He that smiteth Kirjath Sepher and taketh it, I will give him Achsah, my daughter, to wife. And Othniel, the son of Kenas . . . [whose name signifies Son of God], took it, and he gave him Achsah, his daughter, to wife." Who possesses the book? who can open the seals of it? Surely "the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David, hath prevailed to open the book and to loose the seven seals thereof" (Rev. 5 : 5).

Othniel is a type of Jesus, who is the key to the revelation of God, and the Bridegroom of our souls. But when she came to him, moved him to ask of her father a field. He did not go without her, nor she without him. "Caleb said unto her, What wilt thou? And she said unto him, Give me a blessing; for thou hast given me a south land: give me also springs of water." The bride of Christ who comes to the Father in the presence of her Bridegroom, to ask from Him the "gift of God," the Holy Spirit, which alone can make the Word fruitful to herself or others, gets more than she asks, "Caleb gave her the upper springs and the nether springs."

The first check in the victorious career of Judah was when he drove out the inhabitants of the mountain; "but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valleys, because they had chariots of iron." How was this? Were the chariots of iron too strong for him, or too strong for God? "The Lord was with Judah," but it is very clear that Judah was not at that time relying on the Lord. The house of Joseph went up against Bethel, and the Lord was with them, and delivered the city into their hands. But Benjamin, Manasseh, Ephraim, Zebulon, Asher and Naphtali did not drive out the inhabitants of their towns.

ISRAEL WAS STRONG;

this was their point of weakness; they believed themselves masters, and so in disobedience to the Lord, "they put the Canaanites to tribute, and did not utterly drive them out." They counted on the promises of God while shirking their own responsibility to exterminate their enemies. Nothing is more fatal to our spiritual prosperity than a consciousness of strength in ourselves. King Uzziah "was marvellously helped till he was strong. But when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction" (II Chron. 26 : 15, 16). When Paul was in danger of being exalted above measure, the Lord spoke thus to him, "My grace is sufficient for thee, for My strength is made perfect in weakness," and Paul's glad reply was, "Most gladly will I therefore glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me . . . for when I am weak, then am I strong (II Cor. 12 : 9, 10). We are created, redeemed, sanctified to manifest not ourselves but Christ in our mortal flesh (II Cor. 4 : 11), to show forth not our virtues but those of Him who hath called us out of darkness into His marvellous light (1 Pet. 2 : 9). Our strength is in continually increasing dependence upon God, which makes us increasingly independent of men and things.

It was probably about this time that "an angel of the Lord came up from Gilgal to Bochim, and said, I made you to go up out of Egypt, and have brought you unto the land which I sware unto your fathers; and I said, I will never break My covenant with you." It was as much as to say, You see I have kept My promise, and the covenant can never be broken on My side. "I said, I will never break My covenant with you. And ye shall make no league with the inhabitants of this land; ye shall throw down their altars; but ye have not obeyed My voice: why have ye done this?" It was that which they had just done; why did they not then and there break their league with the inhabitants of the land, and rise in the name of God against them? Oh, how many there are who make a league with the inhabitants of their own hearts, and put to tribute those things which God has condemned! Our old man is crucified with Christ that that henceforth we should not serve sin (Rom. 6 : 6). Many are so overjoyed when the Lord has given them a victory over pride, ill-temper, etc., that instead of delivering over the whole being to God as something utterly hopeless and only to be put and kept in order by Him, they will take for granted that they themselves are strong enough to put down and keep down the enemies still existing and allowed within, until some grievous fall shows them their foolishness, and humbles them down before God.

The angel went on "Wherefore I also said, I will not drive them out from before you; but they shall be as thorns in your sides, and their gods shall be a snare unto you." These were fearful tidings; up till now the Lord had gone before them, and been with them, and every time they went up against the Canaanites they had the promise of God to rely upon, that He would send the hornets and drive out the inhabitants of the land before His people (Ex. 23 : 27, 28); but now they had broken their part of the covenant, and God did not hold Himself bound by His, they must know His "breach of promise or altering of My purpose" (Num. 14 : 34). This was just what Joshua had warned them about in his last charge, but alas! in vain. "And it came to pass, when the angel of the Lord spake these words unto all the children of Israel, that the people lifted up their voice, and wept. And they called the name of that place Bochim [i.e., weepers], and they sacrificed there unto the Lord." But the league with the inhabitants of the land remained unbroken; there was contrition, there was a measure of return to the Lord, but nothing to insure that they should not fall again as before.

The generation which had known Joshua, and which had passed through the Jordan, and marched around Jericho "were gathered unto their fathers, and there arose another generation after them, which nor yet the works which He had done for Israel." How was this? Evidently the custom of speaking of the wonderful works of God had died out. Although God had given direction that the words which He commanded them, "Thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up," He commanded that they should be a sign upon the hand, frontlets between the eyes, written upon the posts of the house and on their gates (Deut. 5 : 7-9). God also had ordained the Passover to commemorate their deliverance from Egypt, and memorial stones on the banks of Jordan to commemorate their passage of the Jordan; was it then possible that in one generation the worship of God had so far ceased that it could be said of that generation they "knew not the Lord?" Yes, it was even so: "the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord, and served Baalam: And they forsook the Lord God of their fathers, which brought them out of the land of Egypt, and followed other gods . . . and provoked the Lord to anger. And they forsook the Lord, and served Baal and Ashtaroth." God must vindicate His holiness, He could not let the sin of idolatry go unpunished, "the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and He delivered them into the hands of spoilers that spoiled them, and He sold them into the hands of their enemies round about so that they would not any longer stand before their enemies. Whithersoever they went out, the hand of the Lord was against them for evil, as the Lord had said, and as the Lord had sworn unto them."

It cannot but be so when we are acting in perverseness of spirit, and seeking first anything else than "the kingdom of God and His righteousness." Let such as feel that in all which they do, look to it whether they are really serving God or the world; which is really first with them, to honor God at the risk of losing caste in the world, or to hold on to wealth, position, honor, etc., in the world, whether God's kingdom gains by it or not. Let the Christian worker look to it whether he is really looking to self-effort, self-glory, self-plans, by which he may be prominent as a worker or whether he is willing to put himself out of sight and be an unseen, unnoticed, unknown instrument in the hands of God. If we are not working altogether according to His mind, His hand will be against us; either funds are short, or health is breaking down, or fellow-workers leave, and there is perpetual anxiety; things do not go smoothly; the Lord is calling us to put the whole matter into His hands.

Israel was "greatly distressed." While the inhabitants remained in the land, their idols remained too, the only hope was to extirpate them, and this the people had failed to do. Thus it was an up and down life, sinning and repenting and sinning again, like that of many a Christian. But oh, how tenderly the heart of God was toward them: "When the Lord raised them up judges, then the Lord was with the judge, and delivered them out of the hand of their enemies all the days of the judge; for it repented the Lord because of their groanings by reason of them that oppressed them and vexed them." But alas! they leaned upon the judge instead of leaning upon the Lord, they took God's deliverances second hand, and His commands second hand, and this kind of thing never lasts; we must deal alone with God, and know, like Elijah, what it is to stand before the Lord God of Israel, if we are to be invincible; He only is my Rock and my Salvation, He is my defence, I shall not be moved" (Ps. 62 : 6).

Any little improvement lasted only till the judge was dead; then "they returned and more than their fathers." This is most markedly the history of those who depart from the Lord; each generation exceeds the last in wickedness. The children of Israel began to intermarry with the heathen, and were fast becoming one with them, when He delivered them over into the hand of the King of Mesopotamia, but when they cried unto Him, He raised up Othniel, Caleb's son-in-law, to judge them, under whom they had rest forty years. But again and again they fell, and the Lord gave them over into the hands of Eglon, King of Moab, and later on Jabin, King of Canaan, but bless Him, when they cried unto Him, He raised up Ehud, Barak, Deborah, and delivered them. What a lesson we have of the danger of compromise, the Lord engrave it deeply on our hearts. Amen.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Decrease in the Number of Deaths from cholera in Egypt was reported last week. There were not so many seizures as in the preceding week, and, of those attacked, a larger proportion recovered. A cable report says: "The collapse of the native administration led to the organization of a sanitary board that was virtually under English control. An English officer was appointed to work with the Prefect of Cairo, and the latter was threatened with deposition if he were obstinate. The importation of more doctors and Mohammedan hospital attendants from India and the increasing number of English doctors encourage a belief that the epidemic may now be strangled. Fears prevail respecting Alexandria, which may yet be scourged."

The Murder of James Carey, the Dublin Town Councillor who planned and superintended the Phœnix Park murders and afterward turned informer, is reported from South Africa. It appears that Carey was warned that the Government would be unable to protect him in Ireland, where he wished to remain. It was finally decided that he should emigrate to Capetown, and his passage and that of his family thither on the Kenfauns Castle was paid by the Government. He travelled under the name of Power. Among his fellow-passengers was a man who gives the name of O'Donnell, with whom Carey often conversed during the voyage. On July 30th, when the steamer was near Port Elizabeth, O'Donnell shot Carey in the neck, and continued firing until he was dead. O'Donnell made no attempt to escape after the shooting, and was promptly seized and handed over to the civil authorities at Port Elizabeth, where he has been committed for trial on the charge of wilful murder. Conflicting accounts are given of O'Donnell, but all agree that he is an Irish-American. One account states that he had dogged his victim all the way from London; another account says that O'Donnell was proceeding to Cape town on business when he became aware that Carey was a fellow-passenger and shot him without orders from any society. The police knew that several men had been detailed by the Irish societies to take vengeance on Carey, but whether O'Donnell is one of those emissaries is at present unknown. Intense joy was manifested in Ireland when the news arrived, the people lighting bonfires and illuminating their houses.

Ireland is Threatened with General Bankruptcy. Mr. Hatton telegraphs to the New York Times a [illegible]orable account of the condition of the country. He says: "A memorial from distressed Irish landlords to the English Government asking for a loan from the state at three and a half per cent to enable them to pay off their mortgages was sent to the Government and was referred to the Dublin Executive. The authorities there have informally reported that unless Parliament comes to the help of the landlords a social crisis will be inevitable next spring. Mortgagees who have received no interest for several years are threatening to foreclose. The Irish papers continue to comment on the extraordinary decrease of land under cultivation in Ireland, which they attribute to British misgovernment. The English papers suggest that it is the result of terrorism and agrarian crime, that a large number of farms are vacant because it is more than a new tenant's life is worth to take them, and that Mr. Parnell and the Land League are the immediate cause of the present condition of things, and of the inevitable famine which will be the result. Capital is scared out of the country, and ruin, misery, and bankruptcy are general throughout all classes."

A Sheriff's Sale in a Royal Palace is an Uncommon event, but it was witnessed in England last week. The Queen's cousin, Princess Mary of Cambridge, who is married to the Duke of Teck, has hitherto lived in royal state in England. She receives from Government, in addition to her private fortune, a pension of $25,000 a year, and her husband holds several lucrative appointments. They have, however, been unable to pay their way, and their debts have accumulated until an execution from the sheriff was served upon them. The sale of their effects caused some excitement in London, as among the articles sold were the valuable gifts presented to the princess on her marriage. It was expected that the Queen would have paid the debt in order to avoid scandal, but she declined doing so.

War Between France and China is now considered inevitable. The London Times publishes a report from its correspondent at Hong Kong which confirms the apprehension. "The negotiations," he says, "between France and China in regard to Tonquin are at a standstill. The general opinion is that the aggressive policy assumed by M. Challemel-Lacour and the appointment of M. Tricou as French minister to China were unfortunate circumstances, and that a peaceful solution of the difficulty is impossible. The Chinese consider that the French are determined upon the annexation of Annam, and that they desire to quarrel with China. The French will be unable to operate until November. The unhealthy season is affecting the young men among the French troops and the hospitals are inadequate to accommodate the sick."

The Trial of the Ten Jews in Hungary charged with the murder of a Christian girl in the synagogue at Tisza Esslar, in order to procure her blood to mix in Passover bread, has been concluded. A verdict of not guilty was returned. The state was ordered to pay the costs of the trial. The lower classes of the people incited by vindictive agitators are indignant at the result of the trial, and anti-Semitic riots have broken out in several places and have been suppressed with difficulty.

Five Million Dollars for a Manuscript, is the price set by the owner, who is endeavoring to sell it to the trustees of the British Museum. A cablegram to the New York Sun states that a Mr. Shapira, of Jerusalem, a bookseller and dealer in antiquities, has just deposited in the British Museum fifteen slips of black sheepskin leather on which are written, in characters similar to those on the celebrated Moabite stone, portions of the Book of Deuteronomy differing materially from the received version. The date of the slips is the ninth century before Christ, or sixteen centuries older than any authentic manuscript of any part of the Old Testament. Mr. Shapira bought them from an Arab, and he asks for them $5,000,000 from the British Museum. If genuine, the interest and importance of the discovery cannot be overrated; and, so far as variations in the sacred text are concerned, there is promise of one of the greatest controversies that scholars have ever entered upon. Dr. Ginsburg, supposed to be the most eminent Hebrew scholar in Europe, is engaged in examining the manuscript to test its genuineness.

The McAll Mission in Paris is Extending its influence throughout the city. A Christian gentleman, who attended some of its meetings recently, thus writes of what he witnessed: "Not only in Paris itself, but in the chief provincial towns of France, extending even to Marseilles, Nice, Cannes, and Corsica, the name of McAll is familiar as a household word. Meetings of every description, Bible-classes for adults and children, mothers'-meetings, sewing-classes, every conceivable opportunity are in active operation under his wise guidance and prayerful direction. I have been present at some of his services, and whether among the more intelligent class in the Faubourg St. Honoré or the workman class in the Rue St. Antoine, no one can fail to observe the deep, intense, intelligent interest exhibited. The service is warm and hearty, the prayers touching and fervent, the singing sweet and moving, the preaching plain and persuasive. He welcomes ministers of Christ of all denominations, feeling that for the evangelization of this class you must come less with a system than with a message; that the occasion is one less for the forming of one school of thought than for the preaching of a truth common to as needful for all. I shall never forget the rapt and sustained attention with which Monod, under the auspices of Mr. McAll, was listened to by rough men and women in the Rue St. Antoine. A ball-room of a low type was engaged for the evening, and he was announced to deliver an 'address on the reasonableness of the belief in the existence of a God.' He quoted Pascal and Guizot and Thiers and Victor Hugo to an audience which filled every part of the ball-room, and who followed his most able discourse without weariness or interruption. Day by day; hour by hour; unweariedly, counting nothing dear to himself, and with a zeal which would put many of us at home to shame, does this, humble, singleminded servant of Christ labor to win souls to Him."

Suicides in Germany have been Unusually numerous of late. The mania for self-murder is manifested to a terrible extent in Berlin, and a very large number of those who fall victims to it belong to what are called the higher classes. Perhaps the facts cannot be satisfactorily explained; but it is impossible not to associate them to some extent with the decay of religious belief in Germany. There are certainly men who, when they suddenly throw off old restraints, are tempted to plunge into a kind of life that may easily lead to disaster. For many thousands of Germans, gambling seems to have an irresistible fascination; and gambling both at the Bourse and at the card-table is understood to have been the direct cause of some of the most recent instances of suicide in the German capital. Probably poverty also accounts for a considerable number of cases.

Twenty-one Missionaries Left the East London Institute on July 2d for their fields of labor. The Institute, of which the Rev. Grattan Guinness is the Principal, celebrated its tenth anniversary on the same day. The meeting was also one of farewell and dismissal to the twenty-one missionaries, who had been trained in the Institute, and who were departing—seven to labor in Europe, three to America, four to China, four to Africa, and two to Siberia. In his address Mr. Guinness characterized the present as a preeminently missionary age, and as such the sign of a rapidly approaching termination of the present dispensation. During the last ten years the Institute has sent out nearly 300 missionaries. Mr. Reginald Ratcliff said that during the fifteen years since the death of Livingstone greater strides had been made than during the preceding 1900.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman for July contains a report of the proceedings and addresses delivered at the recent Prophetic Conference at Wimbledon, England; also an article by Mrs. Fielder on "The Redeemed Companies of Rev. 7: 4-8;" "Watchman, What of the Night?" by Dr. Meymott, and a summary of passing events from a prophetic standpoint. Price six cents, annual subscription seventy cents. Back numbers of this periodical for this year may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the same price, which includes postage.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

The Rev. W. R. Nicholson, D.D., of Philadelphia, Presiding Bishop of the Reformed Episcopal Church.

BISHOP NICHOLSON,

Of the Reformed Episcopal Church.

A Remarkable Gathering—An Eloquent Speech—Birth and Early Life—Early Conversion—A Methodist Education—Pastorate in New Orleans—Enters the Protestant Episcopal Church—Pastorates at Cincinnati, Boston, and Newark—Scruples about the Service—Joins Reformed Church—Labors in Philadelphia—Elected to the Episcopate—Made Presiding Bishop.

NEARLY five years ago a remarkable group of men were sitting on the platform of the Church of the Holy Trinity, in New York. Episcopalians, Reformed Churchmen, Congregationalists, Baptists, Methodists, were sitting side by side. They were not disputing over the matters on which they differed in theological belief, not discussing the pro and con of the use of a liturgy, the right kind of ecclesiastical vestments that should be worn by clergymen, not the doctrine of Divine Sovereignty or Freewill, nor engaged in a tournament on any of the familiar arenas of theological controversy. They were occupied in conference on unfulfilled prophecy. It was and the scene was one never to be forgotten by those who witnessed it.

As the aged Dr. S. H. Tyng, Sr., was conducted to the front by his eminent son, and in patriarchal voice and language asked a blessing on the conference, and uttered to his young brethren around him words of approval and encouragement, and urged them to persevere in the study in which they were engaged, a deep solemnity fell on the vast audience that filled every part of the church. It was a trying time for any speaker to address the audience, but the speech that followed was heard with the attention it deserved. The clear enunciation of the speaker, his powerful but musical voice, his natural gestures, and his refined countenance and commanding figure, attracted observation, and when, toward the close of his address, the grandeur and glory of the time which might be near at hand filled his soul, a burst of impassioned eloquence electrified the audience, which sat rapt and spell-bound, hanging on the lips of the orator. To many there, the wonderful eloquence was a surprise, but not to those who knew that the speaker was Dr. Nicholson, of Philadelphia, Bishop of the Reformed Episcopal Church.

AN ELOQUENT SPEECH.

Speaking of that gathering of the Jews to Jerusalem which prophecy teaches will occur before the second stage of our Lord's Second Advent, he dwelt on the character of the race, and in a few brilliant words placed before the audience a glowing picture, poetic and rich in color, of the significance of their place in the world. He said: "The Jew is a Jew still. Even our own all-appropriating country, which denationalizes Germans, Irish, French, Spaniards, Finns, Swedes, has left untouched this wondrous people.

"Here they are, holding fast to that one tell-tale face, keeping up the sacred learning of their traditions, self-conscious in their isolation, irrepressible in their love of Jerusalem, sublime in their singular patriotism, evermore looking and longing for their Messiah, the same intense individuality as when, lord of the soil, he plucked his fruit from the trees of Judea.

"And, what is more, these world-wanderers of the centuries, these tribes of the weary foot, have not only survived, but have now risen again as an element of power among mankind. The Jew is the banker of the world; he is among the foremost, whether in science, or literature, or government. In witchery of song unsurpassed, he enchants the world with some of the sweetest music it ever heard. Surely, he is the standing miracle of the world's current history; the bush of Moses, ever burning, yet never consumed; an ocular demonstration of how God may energize the secret springs of a people's life, yet without disturbing individual freedom or social characteristics; an unanswering refutation of that godless philosophy which would turn the Almighty out of His own universe."

That specimen of Dr. Nicholson's power as a public speaker, brief as it is, will convey to the reader an idea of the peculiar force, the correctness of language, and the chaste style which distinguish his preaching; but to gain a complete knowledge of it, it is necessary to hear the words from his own lips, uttered in his melodious voice, and with the emphasis and pathos of the born orator. Many of our readers have probably had that advantage, for Dr. Nicholson's labors have been spent and appreciated in three branches of the Christian Church. The Methodists, accustomed as they are to the glow and fire of eloquence, have listened to his preaching with delight. The Episcopalians, who expect culture, learning, and a high standard of oratorical excellence in their preachers, admired and loved him while he ministered among them, and the Reformed Church, with their love of sound doctrine and their desire for instruction in the things that make for the peace and salvation of men, have honored him as they have honored themselves by raising him to the episcopate. To all three branches of the Church Universal, each holding the truth in its integrity, and each seeing in that truth a different aspect respectively adapted to the constitution of their minds, the portrait of Dr. Nicholson, which this week adorns the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be welcome.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

William Rufus Nicholson the South is proud to claim among her sons. He is now sixty-one years of age, having been born in Green County, Mississippi, on January 8th, 1822. His birthplace was a farm in that county, and there his early years were spent in calm, quiet retirement from the hot haste and hurry of the cities. His father, however, was something more than a farmer, and to his knowledge of the world and of the value of mental training is doubtless due the early proficiency his son attained. Mr. Nicholson, Senior, was a lawyer, and he afterward gave proof of so much legal ability that he became one of the circuit judges of the State.

The future Bishop's calling in life was not, as in the cases of some ministers, a matter of uncertainty in his youth. An event, the most momentous in the life of any man, dwarfing into insignificance all other events in life, settled that question while he was still a boy. In 1835 he attended a Methodist camp-meeting, and at one of the services the Holy Spirit touched his heart. He was but a lad—he was only thirteen years old—but he realized then his need of salvation and accepted the sacrifice of Christ as his one and only foundation of hope for eternity. It is the fashion to speak slightingly of these early conversions and especially of those that occur at camp-meetings, revivals, and seasons of religious excitement; but Dr. Nicholson is only one of thousands whose subsequent life is evidence of the genuine and abiding character of those conversions and of the value of such means of arousing attention to the soul.

The young convert, full of youthful ardor, consecrated his life, while it was still all before him, to the Master's service. He was received into the Methodist Episcopal College at La Grange, Northern Alabama, and there gave himself vigorously to the work of preparation for the ministry. There he received a training congenial to the spirit which inspired him. The policy of repression, of discouragement, the wet blanket with which young enthusiastic students often make acquaintance in college, was not employed at La Grange. His youthful ardor was unchecked there; rather it was stimulated by being made a licentiate, and when he graduated he at once commenced his ministry.

HIS FIRST CHARGE

was at New Orleans, and his first sermon as a regular minister was preached at the little church in Poydras Street, where he labored for nearly four years.

At the conclusion of his term at New Orleans the young minister seriously considered his position. Four years' experience in the pulpit, visiting among his people, mixing with his brethren in the ministry, had started a train of thought which must be followed out. There are men who, once placed on a track, follow that track, asking no questions, making no inquiry. Such men spend easy, pleasant, peaceful lives. They save themselves many struggles, many conflicts, and much pain. But this young Methodist minister's mind was not cast in that mould. The result of his self-examination and his study of the discipline and rules and church polity of the Methodist Episcopal Church was the conviction that he ought to leave it. With him the conviction was not likely to be a barren one. The dictate of conscience was promptly obeyed, and Mr. Nicholson severed his connection with the church, to the sincere regret of many friends who remained in the communion, but who, respecting the conscientious motives which had prompted the step, maintained their friendship and cordial feeling toward him unimpaired.

In leaving the Methodist Episcopal Church Mr. Nicholson had no intention of abandoning the ministry of the Gospel. The Christian soldier was not leaving his flag, he was simply quitting one division of the Lord's army to take service in another, in which he had reason to believe he could render more effective service. He applied for admission to the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and was accepted. In 1847 he was whose zeal in the cause of the Confederacy has rendered his name a notable one, and who was not zealous in word only, but proved his sincerity by taking up arms in the cause to which he and his friends were pledged.

Mr. Nicholson's first charge in the Protestant Episcopal Church was the Grace Church Mission in New Orleans, which he conducted until called to

ST. JOHN'S, IN CINCINNATI,

Ohio. Mr. Nicholson spent ten years in labor at St. John's, and they were ten years of continuous and increasing success. Under his ministry the church grew in numbers, in piety, and in influence. The building soon became too small for the congregations which were drawn to it, and ultimately it was found necessary to build a new church. This was done at a cost of $30,000, from the designs of Mr. Rodgers, the eminent architect, whom New Yorkers remember as the designer of the Astor House in this city. The new church was soon filled by a congregation to whom the young minister's preaching was abundantly blessed of God. Among the communicants whom Mr. Nicholson was pleased to welcome, was the family of Bishop McIlvaine (whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 11th, 1882).

In 1859 Mr. Nicholson received a call to

ST. PAUL'S, IN BOSTON,

Mass. After prayerful consideration he deemed it his duty to accept the invitation, as the circumstances were of a character to indicate that the Lord was directing his course thither. The parting with the many friends he had made during the ten years of his pastorate, was a painful one, and was the cause of many tears among his flock. But he was sent on his way with a hearty God-speed and earnest prayers that the same blessings which had attended his ministry in the South and West might accompany him in the North. Kenyon College expressed its admiration and respect for the departing minister by conferring upon him the title of Doctor of Divinity.

In Boston Dr. Nicholson succeeded the Rev. Alexander H. Vinton, D.D., and proved a worthy successor. During the thirteen years of his ministry there, the church grew and prospered; a steady, uninterrupted work of grace was maintained, and the agencies of the church as a missionary power in the city were multiplied. In 1872 Dr. Nicholson was invited to the Pastorate of Trinity Church, Newark, N. J., the oldest and most prominent church in the Diocese of New Jersey. He accepted the invitation, and labored there nearly three years.

The cause which determined Dr. Nicholson's with his fellow-patient's clear hope of salvation that he came to our meeting to get further light, and, praise the Lord, he got what he sought. He then brought his wife and children in, and they too found Jesus to be mighty to save. Now they are rejoicing in His unceasing love."

Prescription for a Bad Temper.—Mr. Dunn said: "A woman was in the anxious room among a lot of weeping people. I inquired, 'What is the matter with you, sister? Are you a Christian?' 'Yes.' 'Well, what is the matter?' 'I am troubled with my temper, and have come to get your advice about it.' 'Let the Lord keep it, is my advice.' We then laid it before the Lord in prayer. Next night she came to me with a smiling face. I asked, 'What about the temper? Did you scold your husband this morning? Did you strike the children?' 'No, no, praise the Lord; He kept it for me, and I am so happy.' Leave your tempers, your tastes, your soul in God's hand, and He will guide them all."

Changed Opinion of an Old Friend.—Major Colquhoun gave the following proof of the power and willingness of Christ to save, even to the uttermost: "To-day two workers were standing at the bedside of a dying man who had scorned God during his strong manhood, and had spent his health and strength in the service of the Evil One. Then the wages for which he was working were to be received by him in full measure. Disease laid its fell hand on his body, and he was thrown upon the charity of friends for shelter and food, which, to their credit be it said, they did not grudge. When the grim eyes of death looked into his face, he turned for refuge to the formerly despised Jesus, who even then did not fail him. For weeks he has been sinking slowly. This very forenoon he said calmly, 'I have no hope but Jesus, blessed Jesus!' and finished his confession of Christ's preciousness to him by exclaiming, 'Yes, Jesus only! Jesus only!'"

A Cheerful Fireside Story.—Mr. Jack said: "We have often the pleasure of finding out the fruit of open-air work in our house-to-house visitation. The other night a woman told me of her conversion as she sat by the kitchen fireside with the baby on her knees. She had heard a man preaching in the open air on conversion, and thought, 'If this is conversion, then I am not converted, and it is time I was.' Three months afterward she found peace in believing, and was very desirous to get a meeting held in her own house, for, as she said, 'What chance have the like of us to get to church with all these young bairns to attend to?' Her husband was much opposed to religion, so she waited till he was from home and had a large meeting and told him of it on his return, and he replied, 'Ye may be glad I wasn't at home or I would have rid the house of you all.' After much cogitation she fell upon a way of interesting him. She has weak eyes and can't read by lamp-light, so she asked him to read the Bible to her, and soon he got interested and anxious. Now he is one of the most consistent Christians I know."

A Chinese Temple-Keeper Saved.—Mr. Mc-Micking said at one of the meetings: "The Gospel is moving in China in a way we little dream of here. An old man in that country applied to the missionaries for baptism, and was refused. He applied again, and was again refused, and the reason given him was that he lived in a heathen temple and got his income from the lands in connection with it. 'What am I to do? I am an old man, sixty-eight years of age, and can't work.' 'Cast your care on the Lord,' was the missionary's reply. The priest left, much troubled in mind. At length he decided to throw himself upon God, and to leave the temple, and at once his way was made clear. His son-in-law went to him and said, 'If you want to leave the temple, come to my house. I will give you what I have. It is poor, but you are welcome to it.' He accepted the offer at once, and left the place of plenty, going into poverty for Christ's sake. This man is clever and learned. He now writes Christian tracts, and distributes them, preaching Jesus to many hundreds. Already he has handed in the names of eleven persons who, converted to Christ, are desirous of being baptized."

A Dreadful Leap Over a Bridge.—The Rev. Mr. Sloan said: "Some of you may have heard of the man, a farmer, who, when in lusty health, said, 'I will live as I like, and surely I shall have a few minutes before I die to say a short prayer to Jesus that He may "Take me as I am," and then He will call me to come up to His Father.' His end came more suddenly than he expected. As he drove home one night from the market, his horse ran off and leaped over the parapet of a bridge, which spanned a ravine, carrying his rider to a fearful death. The last words the farmer uttered were dreadful imprecations upon the horse, the bridge, and himself. It was an entirely different prayer from that he planned while he rioted in sin. May the Holy Spirit give to each one of us power to decide for the Lord Jesus now. A death-bed is not a place for repentance."

A Smile instead of Rudeness.—At Cowcad-dens, Mr. Mabon said: "A young woman who is a servant in one of the terraces in Partickhill was in our meeting a few Sabbaths ago. A worker had spoken to her in the seat, and as she went out I held out my hand, inviting her into the inquiry-room; but she repulsed me rudely. Last Sabbath I saw the girl back in her old place, but with her face changed in expression. I went up to her again, and was greeted with a cordial smile, and the words, 'I am sorry I spoke so rudely last time I was here, sir, but I know better now.' 'When did the change take place?' I asked. 'I don't know the exact time, sir,' she answered, 'but I have found rest in Jesus since I was here. I was so pleased then that I didn't know what to do.' She had not been in an evangelistic meeting before, and did not know the meaning of my invitation to enter the inquiry-room, but she understood the Saviour's call and obeyed Him."

A Talk with Two Thieves.—At a Recent evangelistic gathering in Glasgow Major Colquhoun said: "To-day I was visiting the prison, and saw in one cell two thieves. Handing one a leaflet, I asked, 'Can you read?' 'Yes.' 'Read that, then.' He began: 'There are two roads. The broad road leads to—' Stopping here, he looked at me with an innocent eye for a thief, and said, 'I can't read.' 'You read the first quite right—read the rest.' 'I can't,' was the obstinate reply. Turning to his companion, I said, 'You can read?' 'Yes.' 'Well, read it to this man, who says he can't.' 'The broad road leads to Misery—Death—Hell. The narrow road leads to Happiness—Life—Heaven.' 'You have read that well. Which of these roads are you travelling on?' 'The broad one.' 'Will you leave it and go on the narrow one?' 'I'll see.' 'When?' 'I can't say exactly.' So far I could get them to go, but no farther. Ask yourselves which of the two you are on, and if on the broad, change to the narrow at once. God has promised you help, and will give it."

A Soldier Dying for His Comrades.—Major Colquhoun said: "During the Zulu war our troops were beleaguered by the Boers, who are noted for being first-class marksmen. Our commanding officer deemed it necessary to send out a small troop to see what the Boers were doing. One of the men was a fearless, brave man, and he was selected to act as a scout. He rode about here and there, and perceived that his party were being cut off from the camp by the Boers. In a moment he saw that his own safety was certain provided he secured it at once, without warning his comrades, but then every man of the small band would be lost. If he warned them they might escape, but his life would be lost to save theirs. Spurring his horse to the top of a small hill, he gave them warning of the danger they were in, and they reached camp in safety. Many were the conjectures as to his fate, and a faint hope was entertained that he had been taken alive. Peace was declared, and inquiry was made if he was a prisoner, but he was not. With sorrowful hearts his comrades searched the hill where he was last seen, and found his body slightly covered with earth. Reverently they gathered his bones together, and gave them honorable burial. He died to save his comrades; he gave his life for theirs because it was his duty to do so, and they loved him. Christ, the Son of the living God, gave His life for us because He loved us, yet the crowd go past Him with scorn and contempt. Think of His great love to you; turn to Him now and get peace."

schools about 1971, making a total in school of 6255 out of a school population of nearly 40,000. The number of children that may be put in manual-labor schools is limited only by the provision made for their support. If Congress will increase the appropriation for that purpose, the Department will find no difficulty in securing the attendance of the children."

Prohibition has been Making Sure but Unostentatious progress in Georgia for some time past, but on Wednesday, August 8th, the Atlanta correspondent of the Times telegraphed news of a victory which marks a noticeable step in advance. From his statement it appears that several counties have applied to the Legislature of Georgia for the privilege of excluding liquor, until now out of 138 counties 50 are prohibition counties. Early in the present session a general local option bill was introduced into the lower House, under which any county which desired to do so could prohibit the sale of liquor by popular vote, without the tedious delay of petitioning the Legislature. This bill was met by the liquor men as a prohibition bill in disguise, and the whole strength of that interest was brought out. The Women's Christian Temperance Union also entered the lobby. The question was called up on August 7th for action. The lobbies were packed with interested spectators. Eighty-eight is the number of votes required to pass a bill of this character, and when the Speaker announced the vote as yeas 88, nays 49 there was a burst of enthusiastic applause in spite of the rules. The bill, which now goes to the Senate, provides that upon the petition of a certain number of citizens any county or district may vote upon the question, but another election cannot be held within twelve months. The effect of this bill, if it passes, will be to make Georgia a prohibition State within twelve months, excepting the five city counties.

The First Election in Utah Under the Edmunds law took place on August 6th. Little interest was taken in it. The Mormon ticket was elected in each district throughout the Territory, with the exception of Summit County, which is in doubt. The majority of the Gentiles refrained from voting. A large majority of the Mormons would, it was known, vote solid as directed by the Church, and this fact deprived the election of any element of a contest. Observers pronounce the law a complete failure. Polygamists were not placed on the ticket, it is true, nor did they vote; but they controlled nominations and succeeded in electing dummies to the Legislature who will vote as they are ordered, and incompetent persons are elected to other offices, who will, by refusing to qualify, allow the present officials to hold over.

The Iowa Campaign was Opened on the Republican side by an enthusiastic meeting at Clarinda, Page County, on August 11th. Governor Sherman and Senators Allison and Wilson were the chief speakers. To Senator Wilson was appropriately committed the discussion of the temperance issue, which is the one that mainly interests the Christian public in the Iowa political campaign. The Senator made an earnest appeal to the Democrats who sympathized with prohibition to bolt their ticket this year in order to secure the triumph of the cardinal principle of democracy, the right of the majority to rule. Senator Wilson closed his eloquent speech by quoting the demand of Lieutenant-Governor Manning as the campaign cry of this struggle: "Protected homes and firesides, a school-house on every hilltop, and no saloon in the valley," and by denouncing the efforts of the liquor interest as an attempt to license an institution the money for whose support had better be thrown into the sea; that alarms the father of every young man who visits it. License, he said, gives the saloon a lawful status, and it is used as a cover for violations of law. "That we have our vital principle of government challenged by the saloon," said he, "and not by something less harmful, is fortunate for men of all political parties, for it puts the case under the strongest possible light, and enables us all to see more correctly the path of duty which leads us to a common effort to maintain a correct governmental principle, rather than to divide our forces in inharmonious attempts to suppress a recognized evil."

An Enormous Fire Broke out on Sunday last in the Kimball House, Atlanta, Ga., the largest hotel in the South, and completely destroyed the building. Flames were first seen at five o'clock in the morning, and in spite of all the efforts of the Fire Department by seven o'clock the building was completely gutted, and property to the value of a million dollars destroyed. Happily no lives were lost, owing to the courage and promptitude of the night watchmen, who went through the building and aroused all the guests. But for their efforts a catastrophe as terrible as that at Milwaukee might have occurred.

Bible Work in Chicago is the Subject of an interesting report recently issued of a movement which has been in progress in that city during the past ten years. Its object is to train Christian ladies for missionary work, and subsequently to seek employment for them in home and foreign fields. They study the forms and the history of Bible doctrine, the history of the Church, and in giving practical help in common life, teach those whom they visit from an open Bible. They regularly practice in mothers' meetings, girls' sewing-schools, and in house-to-house visiting. They live in different localities of the city, but assemble once a week in the Bible Workroom of the Young Men's Christian Association building to confer and report. The work is sustained by voluntary contributions and is doing an inestimable amount of good.

A Child's Intercession for her Grandfather was mentioned in a letter read last week at the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting. The writer said: "Years ago my little daughter sent a printed request, before she could write, for prayer for the conversion of her aged grandfather. Nine or ten years afterward your prayers and ours for him were answered when he was nearly eighty-two years of age. He was happily saved, and went home to heaven a year ago last winter. Last spring my little daughter was very sick. An aunt sent a request to your meeting for her recovery, and she suddenly began to change for the better and gained rapidly, and was soon as well as usual. Let the Lord be praised for all this."

Five Dollars for the Fund for Sending The CHRISTIAN HERALD to colored ministers in the South have been received from W. S. M., who also cheers us by the expression of hearty approval and wishes for the prosperity of the journal.

The Failure of an Effort to Mend the Bible is reported by one of our contemporaries. In a certain church recently, objections were raised to the Lord's Prayer being used in the church meetings. It was argued that the members of the church had been delivered from sin, and therefore the petition "Forgive us our trespasses" was inappropriate. A formal resolution was passed directing that in the future whenever the Lord's Prayer was offered in church meetings the inappropriate petition should be omitted. After this resolution had been observed for some time, the clause was restored. Unhappily, certain members of the church had fallen into grievous sin, and to the sorrow and shame of the church the clause had become glaringly appropriate, as they would have seen it had been all along if they had only examined their own hearts (I. John 1 : 8-10).

The Curious Discovery of a Lost Title-Deed is described in a California journal. For a number of years past the United States patent to the San Bernardino ranch of 17,763 acres, San Diego County, California, had been mislaid or lost, a fact which gave rise to litigation and retarded materially the sale of land on the ranch, which was to be subdivided. The lost patent has been found, however, in a singular manner. A lady residing in San Diego, being about to remove to San Francisco, was burning some old papers, when one was caught by the wind and blown for some distance. The lady picked it up and brought it back, and out of curiosity looked at it, finding it to be, to her great surprise, the long-lost patent, signed and sealed. If some one had informed those seekers that the title was among those old papers they would have lost no time in searching there for it, and they would not have had so narrow an escape of losing it altogether. But when men are told that in a venerable book they will find a title to an eternal possession they pay no heed to the information, or ridicule it (Isa. 34 : 16, 17).

A Unique Deed of Gift has been Registered in the State of Maine. A Christian philanthropist of Milton, Mass., recently presented to the First Baptist Church in East Dedham a piece of land upon which to build a parsonage. The deed of the land contains the following restriction and provisions: "The minister or ministers who shall occupy the parsonage erected on this land shall not preach or teach in Christ's temple any matters pertaining to this world except such as were taught by Christ. Should the church or society ever break, or cause to be broken, the covenant they have entered into with the giver of the land whereon to build their parsonage, their trial and condemnation shall be before and by that Christ whom they have professed to worship; this is their penalty, and only this." If the ministers who will occupy the parsonage are truly called of God to their work they will not find themselves hampered by this restriction. It is one of the evidences of Christ's divinity that His teachings are as thoroughly adapted to this age of the world as to that in which He uttered them (Matt. 28 : 20).

A Bewildered Child was Found on the Cars recently by two ladies from Portland, Me., as they were returning from the Old Orchard camp-meeting. The little girl was about five years old, and she sat on the car seat alone. She could not tell her name or where she belonged, and the conductor telegraphed back, but could get no information. When the train arrived in Portland the ladies took the little waif home with them, keeping her three days without eliciting any information concerning her relatives. Finally the railroad officials sent up a book containing the names of the stations on the route, and upon reading this to the little girl she clapped her hands when the name of Lawrence was mentioned, saying that was where she lived. They telegraphed there and received an answer from the little girl's father, who came on after her. It seems that she followed the circus to Andover, and getting tired sat down in one of the cars. As the little wanderer grows older she may witness conduct that will remind her of her involuntary journey. She will see people leaving their Father's house to follow a vain show, and, becoming weary in the pursuit, seek repose, and while they rest, drift still farther from home. She may count those happy, whose wanderings, like her own, end in return under their Father's care to His fold (Luke 15 : 4-7).

A Providential Accident Occurred on the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad on August 3d. Between Sanborn and Vermillion on that morning a freight train was wrecked, which blocked the line and interfered with the running time of the fast express due about the time the wreck occurred. One of the express trains had orders to meet the other at Sanborn, the other had instructions to run to Vermillion—a mistake in duplicating the order. These two points are six miles apart, and if the freight wreck had not occurred the lightning expresses might in the darkness have crashed into each other, running at the rate of forty-five miles an hour. When the conductors met, each asked the other, "What are you doing here?" A comparison of orders explained the situation. Doubtless the freight wreck was at the time it happened regarded as a misfortune, but later, when it was found out that if it had not occurred there would have been a fatal catastrophe, it was regarded as a blessing. The time will come when believers who now repine at the hardships and trials of their life will in the light of eternity thank God that He permitted them to come upon them (Rom. 8 : 28).

A School in a Cave was the Novel Spectacle recently seen by a gentleman who was travelling in Oregon. He was being rowed down the Snake River when he was astonished to observe a row of children, with books in their hands, sitting at the mouth of a cave on one of the banks. He was still more surprised to learn from the boatmen that the children were at school. It seems that in summer, school is kept in the cave, which is dry and open-mouthed, being really a nice place in which to study. There is no doubt that after a while the settlers there will build a fine school-house; but in the early days of the settlement the boys and girls have been obliged to sit in Nature's school-house. A cave is usually associated in our minds with darkness and gloom rather than with a place in which light, natural or intellectual, is imparted, but there is no reason why children should not acquire knowledge so. Many of God's children have learned valuable lessons of their Father's faithfulness in caves, natural, and metaphorical. In the gloom of sickness and adversity and in the shadow of death they have found Him with them, and many who were not His children have in their affliction learned to call Him Father (Heb. 11 : 38).

A Symbolical Necklace was Presented Recently to an aged nurse at Hingham, Mass. The Boston Courier publishes the report of a nurse's golden reception, which was held at the Methodist church at Hingham on August 1st. It was complimentary to Miss Mary Patterson, a lady well known in families in Boston and vicinity, who during her eventful life has officiated as nurse for 374 children. The church was finely decorated with flowers, and a collation provided by the ladies who had the matter in charge. Many affectionate letters were read and speeches made recalling some interesting incidents, and there were many pleasing reminiscences related. The presents were numerous, one in particular being unique. It was a necklace composed of tiny china dolls, 374 in number, which was presented in a very happy manner by a gentleman whose humorous presentation speech caused much merriment. Doubtless the lady will set a high value on her symbolical necklace as an evidence of the gratitude of her friends. The gift is an illustration of that decoration God will give His servants. The day is coming when the laborers among God's children, whom the Apostle Paul compares to nurses, will wear crowns glistening with jewels representing the souls they have been the means of saving (I Thess. 2 : 7, 19).

ACCEPTED OF THE GREAT FATHER.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"He hath made us accepted in the beloved."—Ephesians 1 : 6.

A Significant Expression—A Sign of Unselfishness—An Assurance—I. A Contrast—Between the Present and the Past—The Possible Future—II. Explanation—Entirely God's Work—Excluding the Guiltless—Righteousness Essential—Acceptance of a Daughter-in-law—III. Enlargement—Acceptation of the Person—Access Granted—Prayers Answered—Gifts Received—A Father's Regard for his Son's Drawings—IV. Reflections—Security—Consolation—Strange Theories—V. Practical Use—Preach it Everywhere.

A few Sabbath mornings ago I spoke to you upon those memorable words of the great Father, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."* We now go a step farther, and see how the love of God to His beloved Son overflows, and runs like a river of life to all those who are in Christ Jesus. To Him He saith, "This is My beloved Son," and then He turns to all who are in union with Him and says, "These also are My beloved for His sake." As believers we are assured by the text that we are "accepted in the Beloved," to the praise of the glory of God's grace. Why is that peculiar title here used? It might have been said, we are accepted in Christ, or accepted in the Mediator; there must be some motive for giving Him this special name in this place. The motive is declared to be that we may praise the glory of divine grace. God did not want for a beloved when He made us His beloved: His heart was not pining for an object; His affections were not lone and desolate. His only-begotten Son was His delight, and there was room enough in Him for all the Father's love; it was we that needed to be loved, and so the Beloved is mentioned that we may remember the unselfishness of divine grace. He makes us His beloved, but before. We are also reminded that we are "accepted in the Beloved" to let us know that God has not shifted His love—His first Beloved is His Beloved still. We have not supplanted His dear Son, nor even diverted a beam of love from Him. The Lord has called us beloved who were not so, and made us a people who were not a people; but He has not withdrawn a grain of love from Jesus, whom He still calls "mine elect, in whom My soul delighteth."

All the infinite love of God still flows to Jesus, and then to us in Him. It pleased the Father that to Him a fulness of love should be given, that out of it we might each one receive. God's love to us is His love to His Son, flowing in a hundred channels. For His sake He makes the wedding-feast, and we are the happy guests who sit at the table. Not for our sakes is this done, but for Jesus' sake, that so it might be all of grace. His perpetual acceptance with God is our acceptance, that nothing legal, nothing whereof we might boast, might be mingled with the work of sovereign grace.

We are "accepted in the Beloved." Do you not love that sweet title? Is it not the highest quality of the acceptance, that it comes through such an One? He is beloved in the highest conceivable degree by the Father, and in this you imitate the great God, for to you also the Lord Jesus is altogether lovely. He is your Beloved as well as God's Beloved, and this is one proof that you are accepted; for all who truly love the Son are approved by the Father. Thus saith the Scripture: "Because He hath set his love upon Me, therefore will I deliver Him: I will set Him on high because He hath known My name."

Is Christ your Beloved? Then, as He is the Father's Beloved, you and the Father have evidently come to a sweet agreement; you have come to look at things from the same standpoint as the glorious Jehovah; the Lord and you evidently have a mutual interest in one common person—the incarnate God. Your recognition of Christ as your Beloved is thus a sure proof that you are accepted in the Beloved.

Let this stand for our preface, and now let us come close to our subject, upon which I do not desire so much to descant myself as to lead you individually to meditate, and personally to feed. I desire that you may this morning experimentally enjoy the precious drop of honey from the rock Christ Jesus which is contained in the four words, "Accepted in the Beloved." Oh that the Holy Spirit may make you enter into the treasures which they contain!

I. I will begin by treating the text by way of CONTRAST.

Brethren and sisters, the grace of God hath made us to be this day "accepted in the Beloved;" but it was not always so. As many of us as have, through grace, believed in Christ are now, to a certainty, at this very moment, "accepted in the Beloved;" but in times past it was very different. It is not a matter of question, nor of imagination, nor of sentiment; but a matter of fact, declared by the Holy Ghost Himself, that the Lord hath "made us accepted in the Beloved;" but it was far otherwise a little while ago. Our way was contrary to God's way, our thoughts were not His thoughts, our hearts were not according to His heart. Oh, if He had dealt with us then after our sins what must have become of us? At that time we were condemned, "condemned already," because we had not believed on the Son of God. We had no acceptableness before God; He could take no complacency in us; His pure and holy eyes could not look upon us, we were so full of everything that provoked Him to jealousy; but now we are—"accepted in the Beloved." The criminal is now a child, the enemy is now a friend, the condemned one is now justified.

Mark, it is not said that we are "acceptable," though that were a very great thing, but we are actually accepted; it has become not a thing possible that God might accept us, but He has accepted us in Christ. Lay this to your soul, and may it fill you with delight. The Lord has chosen you: He has received you to Himself, and set His love upon you, and His delight is in you now. What a contrast from what you were a season ago in your own consciousness, in your own judgment. Refresh your memories a little. If you passed through the same state of mind as I did, you loathed your very selves in the sight of God; you felt that God must abhor you, for you abhorred yourselves; you saw sin to be exceeding sinful, and that sinful thing was permeating your entire being, saturating your thoughts, putrefying your aims, making you to be corrupt and offensive in the sight of the Most High.

I know I felt that if the Lord swept me away with the besom of destruction, and cast me into the lowest hell, I well deserved it. But now that condemnation is no more to be dreaded; we receive not the spirit of bondage, but the spirit of adoption. Lift up your eyes out of the thick darkness, and behold the light. You, who in your own judgment were cast away forever; you, who thought that the Lord would never be favorable to you, nor blot out your sins, are this day accepted, "accepted in the Beloved." No contrast could be more sharp and clear, and no reflections could be more joyful than this contrast suggests to the heart.

Think, again, of the contrast between what you are now and had not grace stepped in. Left out of Christ as we then were, we might at this time have been going from sin to sin, revelling and rioting in it, as so many do. Ay, by this time we might have been dead, as the result of our own sins. The measure of our iniquity might have been full, and we might have been in hell. Be startled, my soul, at this thought, that nothing but infinite longsuffering has kept thee out of the pit that is bottomless, "where their worm dieth not, and their fire is not quenched." But, brothers, we are not in hell, and, what is more, we never shall be, for those iron gates can never close upon a soul that is "accepted in the Beloved," and that is our condition now. We have fled for refuge to the hope set before us, and now no more need we be in terror of the great white throne and the righteous Judge, and the stern sentence, "Depart, ye cursed." Clinging to the cross, and beholding ourselves covered with the righteousness of Christ, we know that we are saved, and, what is far more, we are accepted.

One more point I cannot quite pass over, and that is, the contrast between what we now are and all we ever could have been in the most favorable circumstances apart from the Beloved. If it had been possible for us out of Christ to have had desires after righteousness, yet those desires would all have run in a wrong direction; we should have had a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge, and so, going about to establish our own righteousness, we should not have submitted ourselves to the righteousness of God. We should have heard the voice of the Eternal saying, "Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto Me"; for out of Christ our righteousness is as unacceptable as our unrighteousness, and all our attempts to merit acceptance increase our unworthiness. Oh, strive as ye will, ye self-righteous; labor as ye may after a righteousness of your own, what can come of it but confusion? Woe is unto the man who is out of Christ, wherever he may be. In any case the wrath of God abideth on him. But we are not out of Christ, we are not striving in vain, we are not spending our strength for naught, for here is the blessed contrast, we are "accepted in the Beloved."

II. Secondly, we will say a little by way of

that the text may sink yet deeper into your hearts, and afford you richer enjoyment. Recollect, brethren, that once we were pitied of God as poor, lost, self-destroyed creatures: that was in a degree hopeful. We were chosen of God while in that pitiable condition, and although forlorn, wretched, and ruined, yet were we marked by his electing love—this was still more encouraging. Then came a time of dealing with us, and we were pardoned, our transgressions were put away, we were renewed in the spirit of our minds by the Holy Ghost, and the righteousness of Christ was imputed to us, and at length burst forth the light of this word, "He hath made us accepted in the Beloved."

Understand that this acceptance comes to us entirely as a work of God—"He hath made us accepted in the Beloved." We never made ourselves acceptable, nor could we have done so, but He that made us first in creation, hath now new made us by His grace, and so hath made us accepted in the Beloved.

That this was an act of pure grace there can be no doubt, for the verse runs thus, "Wherein he hath made us accepted in the Beloved"—that is, in His grace. There was no reason in ourselves why we should have been put into Christ, and so accepted; the reason lay in the heart of the Eternal Father Himself. It is only as we are in Christ that we are accepted. Let no man steal out of Christ, and then say, "God has accepted me." Nothing of the kind. If the Lord views you apart from Christ, whoever you may be, you are a thing to be consumed, and not to be accepted. "In the Beloved," that is, as it were, within the gates of the city of refuge. You must abide within that wall of fire of which the cross is the centre, or else you are not accepted.

No man, my brethren, can be accepted of God while he is guilty of sin, so that our acceptance in the Beloved involves the fact that our sin at this moment is forever put away. Covered is our unrighteousness, and therefore from condemnation we are free, and we are accepted. Realize this truth. It does not require any oratory to set it forth; it needs only that your faith should fully apprehend it. Realize that you are forgiven to-day. With your eye upon the wounds of Christ, say unto your soul by the Spirit, "I am without spot or wrinkle in the sight of God; for Christ hath washed me whiter than the driven snow." He has said of His people, "Ye are clean every whit." Rejoice in this. You could not be accepted if He had not made you clean, for the filthy are not accepted of the Lord.

Neither could God accept a man devoid of righteousness. A mere colorless person, whose sin was forgiven, but who had no righteousness, could not be acceptable with him. I cannot suppose the existence of such a being; but if there were such, he would be like one who was neither cold nor hot, and must be spewed out of God's mouth. He that is accepted with God must be positively righteous. Very well, then, if He has made believers "accepted in the Beloved," they that believe in Christ are righteous in the sight of God.

Now to come back again. If we be indeed "accepted in the Beloved," does it not show how close, how real our union with the Beloved must be? Do we even share in Christ's acceptance with God? Then we are one with Him in everything. Here is a father who has no particular interest in such and such a woman, but his son takes to himself that woman to be his wife, and now the loving father says, "That woman is my daughter," and so she is received into his love for his son's sake. He says to her, "You are therefore you are my daughter, and dear to me, and welcome to my house at any time." Thus it is with the great God. He says to us, whom Christ has espoused unto Himself, that we may be His bride in blessed conjugal union forever and ever, "Come to My heart, my children, for He is My Son, and I love you for His sake; I accept you in Him."

Is not that a wonderful union, closer than the marriage bond, which causes us to share in Christ's righteousness, so that the holy God can say to us who are sinful by nature, "You are acceptable to Me because of your connection with My Son?" If a woman of base character were married to the best of men it would not make her acceptable. A father would scarcely know what to do with such a daughter-in-law: we should try and carry out our relationship as far as we could with all kindness, but we could hardly say that such a person brought into our family by marriage would be acceptable to us; but, oh, the Lord sees His people so wrapped up in Christ that He must accept them in Him. You are "accepted in the Beloved," and it is clear that there is a blessed union between you and Christ. The acceptance which the Father gives to Christ He gives to you. Now, see if you can measure it. How acceptable is Christ to God?

III. Can we get a step farther? Will the Holy Spirit help us while I say a few words by way of ENLARGEMENT?

If we are "accepted in the Beloved," then, first, our persons are accepted: we ourselves are well-pleasing to Him. God looks upon us now with pleasure. Once He said of men that it repented Him that He had made them, but now when He looks at His people He never repents that He made us; He is glad He made us, He takes delight in us. Look at your own children; sometimes they grieve you, but still you are pleased with them; it is a pleasure to have them near you; and if they are long out of your sight you grow anxious about them. They are coming home for their holidays soon: they are glad to return home, and I am sure their mothers are glad at the thought of seeing them again. Our Father is as truly pleased with us: our very persons are accepted of God. He delights in us individually; He thinks of us with joy, and when we are near to Him it gives pleasure to His great heart.

Being ourselves accepted, the right of access to Him is given us. When a person is accepted with God he may come to God when he chooses; he is one of those sheep who may go in and out and find pasture; he is one of those courtiers who may come even to the royal throne and meet with no rebuff. No chamber of our great Father's house is closed against us; no blessing of the covenant is withheld from us; no sweet smile of the Father's face is refused us. He that accepted us gives us access into all blessings. "See, I have accepted thee concerning this thing also." You remember the story of King Ahasuerus and his poor trembling spouse Esther, how she ventured in at peril of her life, for if her royal lord and master did not stretch out the golden sceptre then the guards that stood about the throne would cut her down, the queen royal though she was, for daring to come unbidden into the despot's presence; but to-day, when you and I come to God, we have no fear of that kind, because we are accepted first; He hath already stretched out to us the golden sceptre, and He bids us come boldly. All is well between us and Him.

And, being accepted ourselves, are accepted. Children of God, can you sincerely believe this? Do you not sometimes pray as if you were beggars in the street, pleading with unwilling persons to give you a gratuity of coppers? I believe many children of God do so; but when we know we are "accepted in the Beloved" we speak to God with a sweet confidence, expecting Him to answer us. To us it is no surprise that our heavenly Father should hear our prayers. He does it so often and so generously that we expect Him to do so always.

It follows, then, as a pleasant sequence, that our gifts are accepted, for those who are accepted with God find a great delight in giving of their substance to the glory of His name. I know that when money is wanted for the Church of God, and one of the brethren goes round to collect the offerings, the subjects of the Kingdom are wont to say, "Here comes the tax-gatherer again." Yes, that is what the subjects say. Oh, but when the children are about, they cry, "Here is another opportunity of presenting an offering to our Father, a welcome occasion of proving that our love to Him is pure, without greed or grudging."

If God can find a speck of good in us He will. Then let us try what we can do for Him. Here is a great lump of quartz, but if the Lord can see a grain of gold He will save the quartz for the sake of it. He says, "Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it." I do not mean that the Lord deals thus with all men. It is only for accepted men that He has this kind way of accepting their gifts.

HAD YOU SEEN ME,

when a young man, and an usher, walking through the streets with rolls of drawings from a boys' school, you would have guessed that I considered them of no value and fit only to be consigned to the fire; but I always took a great interest in the drawings of my own boy, and I still think them rather remarkable. You smile, I dare say, but I do so think, and my judgment is as good as yours. I value them because they are His, and I think I see budding genius in every touch, but you do not see it because you are so blind. I see it since love has opened my eyes. God can see in his people's gifts to Him and their works for Him a beauty which no eyes but His can perceive. Oh, if He so treats our poor service, what ought we not to do for Him?

IV. We have thus pursued our train of thought in a contrast, an explanation, and an enlargement; let us now indulge in a few

REFLECTIONS.

"Accepted in the Beloved." May not each believer talk thus with himself—I have my sorrows and griefs, I have my aches and pains, and weaknesses, but I must not repine, for God accepts me. Ah me! How one can laugh at griefs when this sweet word comes in, "accepted in the Beloved." I may be blind, but I am "accepted in the Beloved;" I may be lame, I may be poor, I may be despised, I may be persecuted, I may have much to put up with in many ways, but really these troubles of the flesh count for little or nothing to me since I am "accepted in the Beloved."

I have to mourn over a multitude of infirmities and imperfections, and there is never a day but what when night comes on I have repenting work to do, and feel compelled to fly to the precious blood again for a renewed sense of pardon. Yes, but I am "accepted in the Beloved." Ah me, I have been struggling with this evil and that, and I hope I have got the victory, though I have had many a wound in the battle: yes, but I am "accepted in the Beloved." I have just now been blaming myself for my shortcomings, and mourning over my many slips and failures: yes, but I am "accepted in the Beloved." I am speaking for you, or at least I am trying to interpret your meditations: I want you to let this blessed fact go down sweetly with you, that whatever may be whatever the burdens that oppress you, whatever the difficulties of the way, whatever the infirmities of the body, whatever the frailties of the mind, yet still you are accepted.

Let a further reflection be added also to the sweetness of your enjoyment. Think of who it is that doth accept you. It is no common person who admits us to His favor: it is the God whose name is Jehovah, the jealous God. "Holy, holy, holy," cry the seraphim unceasingly, and nothing that is defiled can ever enter His palace-gates, nor can His heart endure the thought of iniquity, and yet it is He that hath accepted you. Did your brethren cast you out? Did your friend condemn you? Did your own heart accuse you? Did the devil roar upon you? What matters it, for He hath accepted you.

Now, just think again, He has made you "accepted in the Beloved." He, that is, God, has accepted you in Christ. Would you have liked any other way of acceptance one half as well? For my part, I had infinitely rather receive everything through Christ than reach it from myself. Mercy seems so much the sweeter and the better from the fact that it all comes from that dear pierced hand. If I were this day accepted in myself, I should fear that I might lose my acceptance, for I am a poor, changeable being, but if I am "accepted in the Beloved," then the Beloved will never change, and I always must and shall be accepted, come what may. Is not this a word to die with? We will meet death and face his open jaws with this word, "Accepted in the Beloved." Will not this be a word to rise with amid the blaze of the great judgment day? You wake up from your tomb, life up your eyes, and ere you gaze upon the terrors of that tremendous hour, you say, "I am accepted in the Beloved," what can then fill you with alarm? I hear of what may happen to the saints: they tell us the sinners will die out, or be restored, or something else; for they are not content with the Scripture teaching of eternity, but must needs invent strange notions about the punishment of the ungodly. Then they begin to picture new destiny for saints too, and the heaven of our fathers has sad doubts cast on it. I care not for their dreams, for I am "accepted in the Beloved." It matters nothing what all the eternities can reveal: he that is accepted in Christ, and eternally one with Him, has nothing before him at which he need tremble.

V. And now I wish to finish with this one

PRACTICAL USE.

If it be so that we are "accepted in the Beloved," then let us go forth and tell poor sinners how they can be accepted too. Are you, to-day, though unconverted, anxious to be found right at last? Listen, friend. If you want to be accepted, you must accept. "And what," do you ask, "must I accept?" You must accept Christ as the free gift of God; you must accept Christ as God's way of accepting you, for if you get into Christ you are accepted. The guiltiest of the guilty may be accepted in Christ: no matter how great and grievous their transgressions may have been, the atoning sacrifice can take all their guilt away, and the perfect righteousness can justify the most heinous sinner before God.

You may be accepted. Listen. If you come to Christ now and trust Him you will be accepted. Never did one come to Christ to be rejected. You shall not be the first. Try it; and though you came into this house condemned you shall go out accepted, if you come now and hide in those dear wounds of His as doves do hide them in the clefts of the rocks. Listen again. It is not only that you may be accepted; it is rather that you will be accepted, you cannot but be accepted in Christ: there is no sort of fear nor possibility that you shall come to Christ and be cast out. Christ must change, truth must change, God must change toward His Well-beloved, He must cease to love him ere He could refrain from loving a soul that is in Him. Guilty as you are, come to Christ this morning. Come, despise not the exhortation, for you must be accepted; it cannot but be that you should be accepted if you come. And you shall be accepted at once. If at this moment you are as vile as vile can be, if while I speak you know that you are black as hell's dark night, yet the moment that you come to Christ you are "accepted in the Beloved." Trust Him; trust Him. Have you done so? Your sin is gone; righteousness is imputed;

YOU ARE SAVED.

And, then, to close, if you get into Christ you shall be accepted as long as you are in Christ, and as the grace of God will never let you go out of Christ you shall be accepted forever, "accepted in the Beloved" world without end. If that be the verdict of this day it shall be the verdict of every day till days shall be no more; the hope for you dying, the song for your rising again, the verdict which shall be given out when the great assize shall sit, and you shall be tried for your life for the last time. They that sit in judgment shall say, "Let that man go; he is accepted in the Beloved." If thou believest in Jesus it shall be so; it is so; it shall be so forever and ever. God bless you all by His good Spirit, for Christ's sake. Amen.

THE LATE DR. W. C. PALMER.

Dr. Palmer, whose portrait appears on the next page, was well known on both sides the Atlantic as an earnest preacher and revivalist, and as the most prominent leader among the advocates of what is generally known as the doctrine of Holiness.

He was born in the State of New Jersey on February 9th, 1804. The family, soon after his birth, removed to New York, and in that State Dr. Palmer made his home during his long, laborious, and useful life. He was indebted to his parents for a consistent Christian example and for thorough Christian training, and at the age of thirteen, to the intense joy of those parents and in answer to their constant and earnest supplications, he gave himself to the Saviour. He at once commenced work for the Lord as a Sabbath-school teacher, and concentrated all his energies on that humble yet useful sphere of labor.

The calling in life he selected was that of a physician, believing that in that profession he would find abundant opportunities for Christian service. He regarded the vocation as one of the happiest and most honorable it was possible to follow, and his conception of the Christian physician passing in and out among his fellows, "going about doing good" to the souls and bodies of men, was indeed an enviable one. He commenced his studies in the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York, and passed his examinations with credit. Nor did the studies and the association with unbelievers and sceptics, into which those studies brought him, affect his faith or cause the ardor of his love for his Saviour to abate. He received his diploma, and immediately commenced practice as a physician. Success attended him from the first, and he soon acquired a large and lucrative practice.

Dr. Palmer's conduct as a physician furnished practical proof of the sincerity of the motives which had prompted him to select the medical profession as a sphere of Christian service. The profits of his practice, large as they were, were consecrated to the promotion of evangelical religion and in charity. No one knows how much he gave away, but it is known that, though his profession furnished him with a princely income, he was never a rich man.

After thirty-three years' labor as a physician he relinquished the profession and devoted the whole of his time to religious exercises. He became one of the managers of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was the President of the Young Men's Total Abstinence Society, one of the first total abstinence societies organized in America. Other religious and philanthropic work also occupied his attention and received his personal and pecuniary support.

Dr. Palmer's name and that of Mrs. Phœbe Palmer, his beloved wife, will, however, be chiefly remembered by their earnest and indefatigable advocacy of the doctrine of Holiness. That is, not the advocacy of the duty of every Christian to strive after perfect holiness according to the Divine injunction—all Christian churches include that in their creed—but the firm belief that it is possible for Christians in this life to attain perfect holiness. He believed and preached that by perfect consecration the believer might, and many have, reached "a higher life," in which temptation has no power, and in which no sin of thought, word, or deed is committed. To the preaching of this "higher life" Dr. and Mrs. Palmer devoted themselves, and held meetings in most of the great cities of this country and Europe. They also established a monthly magazine as an organ of their views, which is still issued.

Mrs. Phœbe Palmer died in 1874, and Dr. Palmer married her sister, Mrs. Langford, who has aided him enthusiastically as his first wife did, in the propagation of his favorite doctrine. She accompanied Dr. Palmer to Ocean Grove, N. J., this summer, to hold a series of meetings, as has been their habit every year since 1875. Dr. Palmer, however, was obliged to return to New York, owing to an attack of dysentery. He was so much better on July 19th that he returned to Ocean Grove, and his friends were delighted to see that, although weak from suffering, he appeared to be convalescent. On the following day he wrote a letter and attended to other matters which had accumulated during his absence. About five o'clock in the evening, while he was sitting on the piazza of his cottage, he suddenly put his hand to his heart and exclaimed, "I am going," and in a few minutes breathed his last. His death is deeply mourned by hundreds of friends.

A FAMOUS JOURNEY OVER GATESHEAD FELL.

(See Illustration.)

When John Wesley commenced his great work of religious revival he encountered hardships and dangers of which modern evangelists happily know nothing by experience. Like the great Apostle of the Gentiles, he was "in journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by his own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren." The servant of Christ, however, was not cast down; the Master whom he served supported and encouraged him, and enabled him to do a work the final results of which no man can estimate. He worked for the glory of God and for the salvation of men, and not for his own glory; yet glory and honor came to him. His name is more widely known and esteemed to-day than that of kings and emperors, and his conquests won by the power of the Holy Spirit are more enduring than those of the greatest generals of history.

The illustration on this page depicts John Wesley's miserable plight when, in attempting to cross Gateshead Fell in one of his evangelizing tours, he and his companion were overtaken in a snow-storm, and one of their horses, overcome by fatigue, lay down in utter exhaustion. The following is the modest account the great evangelist gives of the occurrence in his journal:

February 23d, 1745: "We found the roads abundantly worse than they had been the day before; not only because the snows were deeper, which made the causeways in many places unpassable [and turnpike-roads were not known in these parts of England till some years after], but, likewise, because the hard frost, succeeding the thaw, had made all the ground like glass. We were often obliged to walk, it being impossible to ride, and our horses several times fell down while we were leading them, but not once while we were riding them during the whole journey. It was past eight before we got to Gateshead Fell, which appeared a great pathless waste of white. The snow filling up and covering all the roads, we were at a loss how to proceed, when an honest man of Newcastle overtook and guided us safe into the town."

This was roughing it indeed, but as the result of his apostolic zeal and self-denial, a community was called into existence which is laboring successfully in Christ's great army to-day; and though John Wesley "rests from his labors," his works are ever following him.

COLONEL TOWNLEY'S OFFER.

A funeral was leaving the doors of a country house. It was that of a man about forty years of age, and in one of the carriages sat his widow, some ten years younger, and his only child, a boy about ten years old. Whatever might have been the mourning in the other carriages, sincere or otherwise, there could be no doubt about the sincerity of the grief in that one. The widow and her boy were weeping bitterly, and no wonder: the dearest being on earth to both of them was being carried to his last resting-place. The last sad rites performed, the widow and her boy returned to their desolate home. That, too, they must soon leave, for the widow's circumstances were straitened, and they would have to seek some less expensive residence than the one in which they had passed many happy days.

Two weeks later such a residence had been found, and Mrs. Hamilton was sitting with her boy in a disordered room, the bulk of the furniture packed up ready for removal there. It had been a heart-breaking day for them both, but especially for the widowed mother, for whom every room in the house had a tender association with the time when she had been brought there, a blushing bride, a few years ago. All those memories came upon her like a flood now that the hurry and labor of the day were over, and with her boy Edgar on her knee she sat in a low rocking-chair weeping silently.

They must have sat there longer than Mrs. Hamilton was aware, for the shadows had deepened into darkness when a message was brought her that Colonel Townley had arrived from Europe, and begged to know at what hour in the morning she could receive him. The intelligence agitated her considerably, for though the colonel's name was familiar to her, she had never had an interview with him, and she expected that it would be impossible to make it otherwise than painful to both. She knew not why the colonel should seek her in her trouble, but she apprehended that some sorrow was before her, and she carried her foreboding to the Throne of Grace, to which she had taken all her troubles for many years. When she rose from her knees she was calmer, for she had confided her future and that of her boy to the care of Him who careth for us.

The next day Colonel Townley called and briefly introduced himself. He said, "I ventured to intrude upon you so early, madam, because I have plans to lay before you which it is well you should consider before you make changes which, I presume, your husband's death will render necessary."

Mrs. Hamilton bowed respectfully, and he went on: "You are doubtless aware that my nephew before you became his wife was my adopted son. I educated him when he was left an orphan; I took him into my business, and informed him that if he conducted himself properly he would be my heir. I so regarded him until his marriage, which, as you know, I opposed. My disapproval was not due to personal feeling toward you, but I had other plans for him which that marriage thwarted. I explained to him how his own interests were concerned in obeying my wishes, but he was obstinate. We quarrelled and separated, and I never saw him again. While on a tour in Europe I heard of his death, and immediately returned. I loved him more than either he or I knew, and if he had lived I think we should have been reconciled. Will you take me to see his grave?"

"What would your husband have said?"

Mrs. Hamilton knew perfectly the circumstances Colonel Townley detailed. She knew, too, that the colonel was a hard, implacable, domineering man, a despot in his home and in his business, whose fury against his nephew when he married her had been described to her by her husband.

On the way to the cemetery the colonel entered upon his plans. He proposed that she should give up her boy to him. He promised to adopt him as his own son and give him all the advantages once showered on the father. "I will train him, madam, and make a man of him, and at my death he will be one of the richest men in the city. You see the advantages of my offer; what do you say?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Hamilton, "I see its advantages, but I see its perils too. Worldly prosperity is not the chief thing I covet for Edgar. I am anxious that he should be a godly man, and, forgive my saying so, I fear that the training you would give him would not tend to gain that object." They had by this time arrived at the cemetery, and Mrs. Hamilton, her eyes full of tears, pointed out the grave of her husband. The colonel reverently removed his hat and stood for a few moments looking sadly at the poor, grass-covered mound. Then turning to her he said:

"It would be a sad thing for the boy if you suffered your own prejudices to be an obstacle to his brilliant prospects. What," said he, pointing to the grave, "would he think of your blighting his child's future? Madam, do you not love your boy?"

Mrs. Hamilton rested her hand on Edgar's shoulder caressingly and said, "Ah, sir, you cannot understand how much. It is because I love him that I dare not intrust his training to one who, I fear, would teach him that the world and wealth were the highest objects to strive after, and would make him worldly and sordid and avaricious."

"Do you think I am a heathen, madam? I am not a professor of religion, but I am a better man than many of them. Your husband, I am sure, would wish you to accept my offer."

"I believe not, sir. He was a different man before he died from the man he was when you knew him. He learned to love the Saviour, and he often prayed that you, who had been so kind to him, might come to love Him too and discover that wealth is not all you think it. No, sir, brilliant as your offer is I must decline it. I dare not put my boy's eternal welfare in peril for the sake of money."

"I am sorry to hear your decision, madam," said the colonel, "sorry on the boy's account and on my own. Perhaps it is not final. If you change your mind write to me. I must go to the city now." And Colonel Townley bade her a ceremonious farewell and left her.

Mrs. Hamilton fell on her knees by the grave and prayed. She knew she had done right, but it was at a great sacrifice. Would her boy grow up to reproach her that she had lost him a fortune? What would her husband have said? The tempter was distressing her, but after a little while calm came.

As Colonel Townley travelled away he was perplexed. What was he? His mind travelled back over the years of his life to the time when such a boy as the one he had left stood at his mother's knee. That mother had died while he was young, but Colonel Townley remembered her well. Yes, she would have acted as that woman did to-day. She had a similar dread of his becoming hardened and worldly. Yet here he was to-day just what she had dreaded. He was troubled at that thought, and when he had looked in at his office he went home and straight to his private room, where from an old bureau he scarcely ever opened, he took his mother's portrait and a packet of faded letters. These he read, and for the first time in many years the stalwart man shed tears. If his mother in heaven could see those tears there must have been joy in her heart. He had travelled the broad road against which she warned him, and as he looked at her portrait those loving eyes seemed to cast on him a reproachful look. Could he retrace his steps? Was it too late? Who could help him? With these questions in his mind the colonel went to bed, but not to sleep. All night he tossed restlessly, and in the darkness the faces of those two women were before him. They were strangely alike, he thought, as he lay there—a certain spiritual, holy light in each, and the aversion he had seen in Mrs. Hamilton's eyes that day seemed somehow to have communicated itself to those of his mother as she looked upon him who had neglected all her warnings.

The next day saw Colonel Townley again at Mrs. Hamilton's door. "Madam," he said when he was alone with her, "you did not spare me yesterday when you told me you would not trust me with your son. I think you consider me in a bad way, and since I left you I have been coming around to your opinion. Do you think there is any hope for a man who has neglected religion all his life? You have proved your sincerity by refusing my fortune for your boy, now do you think you could help me?"

Colonel Townley was a sincere seeker. Such never go empty away. He had thought to bestow a gift when he first entered that house; he paid it many visits afterward, and there he learned the way through Jesus to riches far better than those on which his heart was set and to the peace which passes all understanding. Edgar Hamilton did not lose his fortune after all.

MRS. CHANTREY'S SECRET.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Weary Struggle.

AN image of a besotted, drunken woman always in his house, and bearing his name, stood out for a moment sharply before Mr. Chantrey's imagination. He shuddered, and paused; but almost before she could notice it, he went on in low and solemn tones.

"Your sin does not separate you from me; you are my wife. I must help you and save you at whatever cost. Your soul is nearer to mine than any other; and what one human being can do for the soul of another, it is my lot to do. Do not be afraid of me, Sophy. You cannot estrange yourself from me; and you cannot wear out the patience of God. He is ever waiting to receive back those who have wandered farthest from Him. Can I refuse love and pity, when He freely gives them in full measure to you? Will Christ forsake you—He who saved Mary Magdalen? He will cast out this demon that has possession of you."

He was replying to some of the questions which had troubled him, while he was kneeling at her side, before she was awake. There was no separation possible of their lives. If she broke away from him, or if he sent her away from his home, they would still be bound together by ties that could never be broken. Whatever depth she sank to, she was his wife, and he must tread step by step with her the path that ran through all the future. But if any one could help her, and lead her back out of her present bondage, it was he; and he must not fail her in any extremity for lack of pity and tenderness.

He was about to speak again, when a loud, rough noise broke in upon the quiet of the house. It was nearly midnight; and Ann Holland's drunken brother was stumbling and staggering through his shop into the peaceful little kitchen. Sophy sat up and listened. They could hear his thick, coarse voice shouting out snatches of vulgar songs, mingled with oaths at his sister, who was doing her utmost to persuade him to go quietly to bed. His shambling step, dragging across the floor, seemed about to enter the darkened room where they were sitting; and Sophy caught her husband's arm, clinging to it with fright. It was a more bitter moment for Mr. Chantrey than even for her. The comparison thrust upon him was too terrible. His delicate, tender, beloved wife, and this coarse, brutal, degraded man! Was it possible that both were bound by the chains of the same sin?

But Ann Holland succeeded before long in getting her brother out of the way, and releasing them from their painful imprisonment. The streets of Upton were hushed in utter solitude and silence as they walked through them speechless and heavy-hearted; those streets which, on the morrow, were to have been crowded with groups of his people, eager to welcome him home. They passed the church, lit up with the moonlight, clear enough to make every grave visible; a lovely light, in which all the dead seemed to be sleeping restfully. He sighed heavily as he passed by. Sophy was clinging to him, sobbing now and then; for her agitation had subsided into a weak dejection, which found no relief but in tears. Every step they trod along the too familiar road brought a fresh pang to him. For thousands of memories of happy days haunted him, and a thousand vague fears dogged him. He dared not open his heart either to the memories or the fears. Nothing was possible to him, except a silent, continuous cry to God for help.

"It is a melancholy coming home," Sophy murmured, as they stood together on the threshold of their aunt's house. He had not time to answer, for the door was opened quickly, and Mrs. Bolton hurried forward to welcome him. She had been expecting him for some time, for Ann Holland had sent word that both he and Mrs. Chantrey were at her house. One glance at his anxious and sorrowful face revealed to her the anguish of the last few hours. Sophy crept away guiltily up stairs, and she put her arm through his and led him into the dining-room, where a luxurious supper was spread for him.

"You know all about it, then?" said Mrs. Bolton, as he threw himself into a chair by the fireside, looking utterly bowed down and wretched.

"Yes," he answered. "Oh! aunt, could you do nothing for her? Could you not prevent it? It is a miserable thing for a man to come back to."

"I have done all I could," she replied, hesitatingly. "I have been quite wretched about it myself; but what could I do? I told your friend Mr. Warden there was nothing in reason I would refuse to do; but his ideas were so impracticable they could not be carried out."

"What were they?" he asked.

"Positively that I should abstain altogether myself," she said; "and not only that, but I must refuse it to my guests, and have nothing of the kind in my house; not even those choice wines your uncle bought. Neither wine for myself nor ale for my servants! It was quite out of the question, you know. Mr. Warden was meddlesome to the very verge of impertinence about it, until I was compelled to give up inviting him to my house. He went so far as to doubt my being a Christian! And it was of no use telling him I followed our Lord's example more strictly by drinking wine than he did by abstaining from it. He used his influence with Sophy to persuade her to suggest the same thing, that I would keep it altogether out of her sight at all times; but she soon saw how impossible it was for a person of my station and responsibility to do such a thing. I told her it was putting total abstinence above religion."

"Did Sophy think that would save her?" asked Mr. Chantrey.

"She had a fancy it would," answered Mrs. Bolton, "but only because Mr. Warden put it into her head. She was quite reasonable about it, poor girl! I proved to her that our Lord did not do it, nor some of the best Christians that ever lived; and she was quite convinced. Even Ann Holland was troublesome about it, begging me to do all kinds of extraordinary things—to have Charlie here was one of them, as if that could cure her—but I soon made her understand her position and mine. I am sure nobody can be more anxious than I am to do what is right. I am afraid it is the development of an hereditary taste in your wife, David, and nothing will cure it; for I have made many inquiries about her family, and I hear several of her relations were given to excess; so you may depend upon it, it is hereditary and incurable."

There was little comfort for him in this speech, which was delivered in a satisfied and judicial tone. Sophy's sin had been present to Mrs. Bolton for so many months, and she had grown so accustomed to analyze it and argue about it, that she could not enter into the sudden and direful shock the discovery had been to her nephew. An antagonism had risen in her mind about it, not only against Mr. Warden, but against some faint, suppressed reproaches of conscience, which made her secretly cleave to the idea that this vice was hereditary, and consequently incurable. She was afraid also of David reproaching her. But he did not. He was too crushed to reason yet about his wife's fall, or what measures might have been taken to prevent it. Long after his aunt had left him, and not a sound was to be heard in the house, he sat alone, scarcely thinking, but with one deep, poignant, bitter sense of anguish weighing upon his soul. Now and then he cried to God inarticulately; that dumb, incoherent cry of the stricken spirit to the only Saviour.

There was no doubt in Upton, when the people saw their rector again, that he knew full well the calamity that had befallen him. No one ventured to speak to him of it; but their very silence was a measure of the gravity of his trouble. His friend Warden told him more accurately than any one else could have done, how it had gradually come about, and what remonstrances he had made both to Mrs. Bolton and Sophy. Mr. Chantrey was impatient to get into his own house, where he could do what his aunt had refused to do, and where he could shield his wife from all temptation to yield to the craving for stimulants in any form. When they were at home once more, with their little son with them, filling up her time and thoughts, all would be well again.

But he did not know the force of the habit she had fallen into. At first there were a few gleams of hope and thankfulness during the pleasant days of summer, while it was a new thing for Sophy to have her husband and child with her. But he could not keep her altogether from temptation, while they visited constantly at Bolton Villa, and the houses of other friends. It was in vain that he abstained himself; that he made himself a fanatic on the question, as all his acquaintances said; Sophy could not go out without being exposed to temptation, and she was not strong enough to resist it.

Before the next spring came the people of Upton spoke of her as confirmed in her miserable failing. There was no one but herself who could now break off this fatal habit; and her will had grown wretchedly feeble. The sin domineered over her, and she felt herself a helpless slave to it. There had been no want of firmness or tenderness on the part of her husband; but it had taken too strong a hold upon her before he came to her aid. The intolerable sense of humiliation which she suffered only drove her to seek to forget it by sinking lower into the depth of her degradation and his.

A great change came over the rector of Upton. He went about among his parishioners, no longer gladly taking the leadership among them, and claiming the pre-eminence as his by right. It had been one of his most pleasant thoughts in former days that he was the rector of the parish, chosen of God and appointed by men, to teach them truths good for himself and them, and to go before them, seeking out the path in which they should walk. But his own feet were now stumbling upon dark mountains. He was quickly losing his popularity among them; for whereas, while he was himself happy and honored, he had not seen clearly all the evils, and wrongs, and excesses of his parish, now he was growing, as they said, more fanatical and ascetic than Mr. Warden had been, who had won the name of a puritan among them.

Why could he not leave the Upton Arms and the numerous smaller taverns alone, so long as the landladies and their daughters attended church, as they had been used to do? His presence at the dinner parties of his friends was a check upon all hilarity; and by and by they ceased to invite him, and then, half ashamed to see his face, ceased to go to his church, where his sermons had not the smooth and flowery eloquence of former days.

Probably Mr. Chantrey knew better now what was good for his people; he had clearer views of the snares and dangers that beset them, and the sorrows that lie lurking on every man's path. He saw more distinctly what Christ came to do; and how he did it by complete self-abnegation, and by descending to the level of the lowest. But he had no delight in standing up in his pulpit in full face of his dwindling congregation. Language seemed poor to him; and it had grown difficult to him to put his burning thoughts into words. As the bitter experience of daily life seared his very soul, he found that no smooth, fit expressions of his self-comm ning rose to his lips. It pained him to face his people, and speak to them in old, trite forms of speech, while his heart was burning within him; and they knew it, as they sat quiet in their pews, looking up to him with inquisitive or indifferent eyes.

Mrs. Bolton could not escape her share of these troubles, though she never accused herself for a moment as having had any part in causing them. It was the archdeacon who had obtained the living of Upton for her favorite nephew; and she had settled there to be the patroness of every good thing in the parish. Mr. Chantrey's popularity had been a source of great satisfaction and self-applause to her. She had foreseen how useful he would be; what a shining light in this somewhat dark corner of the church.

The increasing congregations, and the number of carriages at the church-door, had given her much pleasure. She had delighted in taking the lead, side by side with her nephew, and in being looked up to in Upton, as one who set an example in every good thing. But this unfortunate failing in her nephew's wife, developed under her roof and during his absence, had been a severe blow. No one directly blamed her for it, except the late curate, Mr. Warden, and a few extravagant, visionary persons, who deemed it best to abstain totally from the source of so much misery and poverty among their fellow-beings, and to take care, as far as in them lay, to place no stumbling-block in the way of feeble feet. But, strange to say, all the estimable people in Upton regarded her with less veneration since her niece had gone astray. Even Ann Holland was plainly less impressed and swayed by the idea of her goodness; and there were many others like Ann Holland. As for her nephew, he was gradually falling away from her in his trouble. He would seldom go to dine with her without Sophy; and he had urgent reasons to decline every invitation for her.

Their conversations upon religious subjects, which had always tended to make her comfortably assured of her own state of grace, had quite ceased. David never talked to her now about his sermons, past or future. He was in the "wasteful wilderness" himself, and could not walk with her through trim alleys of the vineyards. Now and then there fell from him, as from his friend, unpractical notions of a Christian's duty; as if Christianity consisted more in acts of self-denial than in an accurate creed concerning fundamental doctrines. It was an uneasy time for Mrs. Bolton; and her chief consolation was found in a volume of sermons, published by the archdeacon, which made her feel sure that all must be right with the widow of such a dignitary.

GIDEON THE DELIVERER.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 26, Judges 7: 1-8; Golden Text, 7: 20. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Midianitish Scourge—According to Warning—No Help from the False Gods—The Lord's Answer—The Salutation to Gideon—A Noteworthy Tense—Creative Words—Gideon's Question—The Answer Applied—The Work Commenced at Home—Lynching Threatened—God's Deliverance—Gideon Making Sure—The Army Reduced—A Strange Test—Typical Warfare.

THE state of things grew worse instead of better among the children of Israel; they again "did evil in the sight of the Lord," and this time the Midianites were the scourge which He used. So terrible was their oppression that the people fled from their homes and lands, and "made them dens which are in the mountains, and caves, and strongholds." If they attempted to sow their land, their enemies destroyed their labor, and God s Word was fulfilled, "It shall come to pass if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God . . . the Lord shall send upon thee cursing, vexation, and rebuke, in all that thou settest thine hand unto for to do" (Deut. 28: 15-20).

Hard pressed under their affliction, the rebellious people found no solace and no relief from their false gods. "Israel was greatly impoverished because of the Midianites;" it is a terrible thing when the children of God are impoverished through the ungodly, but sure it is that if we are not winning them to the Lord's side, they have power to make us their prey; an unfaithful believer is morally the weakest of all beings. The Lord's answer, when at last the people cried unto Him, was by sending them a prophet to convict them of their sin, but at the very same time He was preparing them a deliverer. Gideon, one of the younger sons of Joash (a landed proprietor of Ophrah and one of the leaders in idolatry), was threshing wheat by the winepress to hide it from the Midianites, when "the angel of the Lord appeared unto him, and said unto him," thou mighty man of valor." Gideon was not surprised to get a message from God; probably as a believer he was alone in his family, and the Lord always has special care for such, and makes up for the want of sympathy around, by manifesting Himself the more fully and blessedly. But the angel's words troubled him; he looked at circumstances, and the words of the angel seemed to him a mockery, he said, "O my Lord, if the Lord be with us, why then is all this befallen us? and where be all His miracles which our fathers told us of? . . . but now the Lord hath forsaken us, and delivered us into the hands of the Midianites." Gideon recognized God's hand in judgment; he saw no chance or fate in what had happened, but he had yet to learn God's hand in deliverance. "The Lord looked upon him, and said, Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites; have not I sent thee?"

THE LORD IS WITH THEE,

God "calleth those things which be not, as though they were" (Rom. 4: 17); He called Gideon a mighty man of valor, because He was about to make him one. God's Word is creative, and thus when Jesus said to the woman who had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, "Woman, thou art loosed from thine infirmity" (Luke 11: 12), while as yet she was bent double; He was pledged to bring it to pass, asking of her only faith to receive the fulfilment of His word. "Go in this thy might," the might of God's spoken Word, the might of a mission commanded by God, and for which God was responsible, but above all the might of the Lord with thee. The Lord had looked upon Gideon, but Gideon, instead of looking upon the Lord, looked upon himself, and began to calculate probabilities of success accordingly. "O my Lord, wherewith shall I save Israel? behold my family is poor in Manasseh, and I am the least in my father's house." Had Gideon known more of God, he would have seen his nothingness as the greatest claim that God should use him (1 Cor. 1: 26-29). Wherewith? Gideon had neither riches, power, influence, nor talent. Wherewith? But the answer of God was enough

WITH ME.

"Surely I will be with thee, and thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man." "Wherewith shall I endure the trials which are pressing upon me?" says some oppressed child of God. Wherewith shall I gain control over the wayward heart of my son? says an anxious mother. Wherewith shall I meet the humiliation which the losses in my business have brought upon me? says a man of business. Wherewith shall I love the one who has proved himself my greatest enemy? says another. There is one answer to the real seeker: With Me. "Surely I will be (nay, I am) with thee."

Gideon was a timid soul; and in order to be sure of his ground he asked a sign, viz., that his offering might be accepted. When he had presented his offering, and the angel of the Lord brought forth fire out of the rocks to devour it, and then departed out of his sight, Gideon still continued communing with God, and built an altar unto the Lord. But now that his faith was established, Gideon must begin to act. At the command of the Lord he must commence by overthrowing idolatry at home, in his father's house. He feared his father's household, and therefore waited until night, and then the work began. With the help of ten servants, probably men whom he had taught to fear the Lord, he threw down the altar of Baal which belonged to his father, and cut down the idol grove which was beside it. Are any of my readers as witnesses for God? He calls you to overthrow, by the power of God with you, the idolatry of your father's house: not by unkind reflections, not by the odious impression that you think yourself holier than they, not by taking the high hand and dealing out law to them; but by the power of God which is with you, and by following Him at any apparent risk to yourself. In spite of the hardest insinuations, or the most earnest solicitations from friends to follow in their ways, follow still after Jesus. None are fit for work elsewhere who have not been proved true in home trials.

The morning came, and with it the revelation that the altar of Baal was thrown down, the grove cut down, and the bullock, representing the seven years' sin of Israel, offered upon the altar built unto the Lord. There was a hue and cry after the man who had dared to make such an attack upon the sin of the city, and a demand was made upon Joash to yield up his son for execution. It was a terrible moment for Gideon; human probabilities were all in favor of his father's yielding him up to die, since Joash himself was the great upholder of idolatry. But God had called Gideon to deliver Israel, and He was not at a loss how to do it, but made Joash himself turn right round. Addressing the men of the city, he said, "Will ye plead for Baal? Will ye save him? He that will plead for him, let him be put to death whilst it is yet morning: if he be a god, let him plead for himself, because one hath cast down his altar." Here was sound, common-sense reasoning. If Baal could not take care of himself, how could he take care of his votaries? Oh how we learn through this that we run no risk when we trust God, He can change the hearts of our relations who oppose us when we simply follow Him. Things came to a crisis; the Midianites concentrated themselves, and united with other enemies; Gideon, on his side, "blew a trumpet, and Abiezer was gathered after him," and in response to his messengers, many also from other tribes. But far from being uplifted with success, we find him communing with God far into the night, and getting himself "rooted and fixed in God" before the conflict should commence. True, he sought for signs, but he was determined to make SURE OF HIS POSITION.

Some who seek for signs nowadays justify their position from the history of Gideon. God does in some cases vouchsafe signs to His people, but His written Word is the precious and safe guide for us at all times. Any way, let us follow Gideon in making sure.

The strength of Gideon's army at this time was thirty-two thousand; how provisioned, we know not, how drilled we know not, but the Lord soon took all into His own hands. Gideon, being sure in his God, was prepared for anything which God might say or do, however unusual and apparently unpropitious: this is real faith. God told him that his army was too large, "lest Israel vaunt themselves against Me, saying, Mine own hand hath saved me." So the order was given, "Whosoever is fearful and afraid, let him return and depart early from Mount Gilead" (Deut. 20: 8). Twenty two thousand, more than two thirds of his forces, returned, and ten thousand only remained. But even these were too many, for the Lord commanded Gideon to bring them down to the water that He might try them for Him there. The test was a simple one: "Every one that lappeth with his tongue [or his hand] as a dog lappeth, him shalt thou set by himself; likewise every one that boweth down on his knees to drink."

THIS WAS GOD'S DRILL.

The muscular strength of the men, their prowess in performing military evolutions, familiarity with their weapons—all this passed for nothing; if under all this there was a heart fearful and afraid, the man did not come up to the mark. Those who work for God and who show a timid disposition, afraid of the roughs, afraid of the public papers, afraid of the opinion of other Christians, afraid of not getting a living, cannot pass with God. "Let him return" is God's decision; he cannot fill up God's form for candidates. Again, they who stoop down to take a deep draught of what earth can give, rather than taking in passing like those who lapped, do not pass muster with God.

To strengthen yet more Gideon's faith, his loving God took him down to the host that he might know by the very dream of an enemy how surely God had given him the victory. He returned to his little company, after having worshipped the Lord, and he announced to his three hundred that the Lord had delivered the host of Midian into their hand. Then dividing them into three companies of a hundred strong, he gave them their weapons, to each man a trumpet and an empty pitcher with a torch within, and gave the word of command: "Look on me, and do likewise." It was yet how typical—praise, self-emptiness, and the sight of God within; praise, because we have the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ; in ourselves emptiness—yes, and brokenness—for the pitchers were broken ere the light could shine, and then the shout of victory in the certainty that God is with us—this is God's warfare. But it answered. When Gideon blew with the trumpet, his feeble followers did the same, and the shout rang in the air on all sides of the Midianitish camp, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon," and instantaneously a crash of broken pitchers startled the sleeping Midianites, who, seeing the children of Israel in the light of three hundred flaming torches, and knowing not how many thousands were pressing on from behind, fell upon the first they came across, always their own people, and the whole army of Midian was routed. God's mighty man of valor had prevailed because he trusted in God, and the Lord was with him.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

An Outbreak in Spain Against the Government occurred on Monday, August 6th, at Badajos, a city eighteen hours by rail from Madrid. The garrison, consisting of about nine hundred soldiers, proclaimed a republic, with Señor Ruiz Zorilla as President. The civilians of the city were overpowered or joined with the military in the rising. The King and his Prime Minister were absent from Madrid when the news of the movement arrived, but Marshal Campos telegraphed to the garrisons near Badajos for the troops stationed there to surround Badajos and capture the insurgents. General Blanco collected a small force from those garrisons and marched to Badajos, but found that the disaffected soldiers had fled in the direction of the Portuguese frontier, carrying with them arms, cannon, and large sums of money. The revolt was declared to be suppressed, but later intelligence tends to show that it was not an isolated affair, as everybody believed, but had ramifications in other provinces. The authorities now have acquired proofs of a republican plan, which was to make in several important towns a movement simultaneous with that of the Badajos military. Severe precautions have been taken all over the kingdom. Arrests have been numerous. Señor Sagasta has been recalled by his colleagues for the second time. There is great excitement in Madrid.

The Relations of France and China have undergone no improvement. The correspondent of the London Times at Hong Kong says he has been informed that there are no Chinese troops either in Tonquin or on the frontier, but the garrisons in the provinces of Yun-Nan and Kwang-Si have been secretly increased. Much grain and rice is being stored at Canton. The impression prevails that China is playing a waiting game, which is costing the French much and the Chinese little. Vianlan, who has been proclaimed King of Annam, in succession to Tu-duc by the Mandarins at Hue, is considered the nominee of the war party in Annam.

The Count de Chambord, the Last Representative of the Bourbon kings of France, whose serious illness was mentioned in these columns recently, has suffered another relapse. A cablegram from his residence at Frohsdorf, in Austria, on Saturday, says his condition is extremely unfavorable. He is slowly losing strength. He was much agitated during Friday night, and was occasionally delirious. His physicians have been summoned to hold a consultation as to his case.

The Decrease in the Rate of Deaths from the cholera in Egypt was maintained last week. The commander of the British forces in Egypt announces that there have been no fresh cases of cholera among the soldiers since the last report, and that the sick are doing well. The deaths from cholera in Egypt to date have been 16,488, of which 6366 persons died in Cairo. There is an unconfirmed report of a carbuncular plague at Damietta. The deaths from cholera averaged twenty-two each day in Alexandria last week.

At a Banquet Given by the Lord Mayor of London to Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues on August 8th, the Premier commented on recent public events. He said the Government had gone to Egypt in an unselfish spirit, and desired simply to accelerate reform there. It was felt that too much haste might spoil the work. When the views of the Government in this respect were accomplished, the British would disappear from the country. He said that nothing would be more grateful to every one of the ministers than an early and successful accomplishment of the grand movement toward reform in Egypt. In regard to the Tamatave affair and the difficulty with France, Mr. Gladstone said the Government had received fuller advices from Madagascar confirming the hope that no difficulty existed which could not be solved by generous and honorable dispositions, which should always exist, especially between France and England. He also said he was thankful to be able to record the great change in the condition of affairs in Ireland. The authority of the law, he said, had been reasserted there, and peace and security prevailed. The dark dens of assassination had been effectually suppressed, and the confidence which had united their unhappy frequenters and enabled them to execute their deadly purposes had been in a large degree destroyed. Deep gratitude was due to the Almighty, and secondarily to Earl Spencer, the Lord Lieutenant, and Mr. Trevelyan, the Chief Secretary.

The Irish Dynamite Conspirators who were imprisoned in Liverpool to take their trial for endangering life and property have been convicted. The trial was concluded on August 9th. The judge in summing up said that the question was whether the prisoners had brought or had caused the bringing of the machines to Liverpool, and whether they had intended them to cause damage. He was sure that those who attacked the Crown and sought to dismember the kingdom would meet enemies in a vast majority of Englishmen. The prisoners were found guilty and sentenced to life-long penal servitude. The informers in the recent Dublin trials were sent by the British Government to Australia, but the authorities at Melbourne refused them permission to land, and they were therefore sent to New South Wales.

The Announcement of the Death of Cetewayo, King of the Zulus, is contradicted by members of the sable king's family. According to their account the wily monarch was severely wounded in the battle with the insurgents, but succeeded in making his escape. A member of Mr. Gladstone's administration said in the House of Commons that the Government had received a telegram from the Governor of Natal, in which the latter says he is informed that King Cetewayo, who was reported to have been killed by the Zulu insurgents, is in the reserved territory. A reliable witness says he has seen him alive since his reported death. One statement that Cetewayo is alive comes from Cetewayo's brother, who says that Cetewayo took refuge in an isolated kraal after the late battle, having received two wounds in the leg.

The Luther Celebration.—The Members of the evangelical churches throughout Germany are signing a memorial suggesting that two days toward the end of September should be set apart for the celebration at Wittenberg of the forthcoming Luther anniversary. The festival at Erfurt promises to be a very imposing and magnificent affair. About a thousand students have announced their intention of taking part in the historical procession, and from all parts of the country artists' and choral societies have promised their co-operation in making the celebration the most complete and splendid possible. Large numbers of strangers, especially English and Americans, are expected to be present. An exhibition of various articles belonging to Martin Luther will be held on the 10th of November at the Brandenburg Provincial Museum in Berlin. This museum already possesses the Bible of which Luther made daily use, and which has annotations in his own handwriting. An announcement that the statue of the Reformer is to be erected in Berlin has been received in the capital with the greatest enthusiasm.

A Bitterly Hostile Feeling Animates the population of the Hungarian towns where the defendants in the recent Jewish trials reside. A riotous demonstration was made against the Jews acquitted of the terrible charge of murdering a Christian girl to obtain blood for use in the Passover cakes. Scharf, the principal defendant, and his family were mobbed. They removed to Pesth, but the hostility to them was more openly manifested there. The house in which the family had been staying was wrecked on August 9th, and a number of Jewish shops in the vicinity were plundered. The police were powerless, and the military had to be summoned. Fighting in the streets continued at a late hour. The riot was resumed the following night, when the soldiers found it necessary to fire on the mob, and several rioters were wounded and thirty-two persons arrested. The authorities, in order to stop the disorders, were compelled to place a cordon of troops around the street where the plundering of the Jewish houses occurred. The entire garrison was confined in the barracks in readiness for further anti-Semitic outbreaks. Moritz Scharf, the boy who was the principal witness for the prosecution in the recent trial, and who swore he saw the murder committed, has confessed to a reporter that his testimony was false. Since the acquittal there have been several cases of arson at Tisza Ezlar, where the murder is alleged to have occurred, which persons opposed to the Jews seek to attribute to them. Six persons, four of whom are officials, are to be placed on trial for conspiracy in bringing a false charge against the Jews.

The Death of Dr. Robert Moffat, the Veteran missionary and the father-in-law of Livingstone, is announced in a brief cablegram from England. Dr. Moffat was eighty-eight years of age, fifty-five of which he had spent in missionary labor. He was born in 1795, in Fifeshire, Scotland, and was taught the business of a gardener. After his conversion he offered his services to the London Missionary Society and was sent to South Africa. There he labored with marked success, preaching the Gospel and teaching the natives the arts of civilization. He frequently made tours among the barbarous, warlike tribes, and his remarkable adventures on these dangerous journeys are described in his "Missionary Labors and Scenes in Southern Africa," published in London in 1842. In 1837, his health failing, he found it necessary to return to England, and he remained at home for five years, during which time he reduced the Bechuana language to written characters, and had printed a version of the New Testament and the Psalms in that language. He returned to Africa in 1842, and continued his work until 1870, when, being seventy-five years old, he was obliged to retire from active labor, and after that he lived in London. In 1873 he was presented by his friends in England with a purse worth $145,000, in recognition of his services in Africa to the cause of religion and civilization. Mary, the daughter of Dr. Moffat, who was married to Dr. Livingstone, died in April, 1862.

Mr. Gladstone's Praise of the Blue Ribbon.—In the British Temperance Advocate for this month there is a letter from "A. C. Bevington," in which the writer says: "As I am stationed at Hawarden, I have had the honor of several visits at my humble home from the distinguished Premier of England; and in connection with his last visit a very interesting conversation ensued in relation to the Gospel Temperance Mission, when the following statements in substance were made by Mr. Gladstone: 'I see,' he said, as he looked at the blue ribbon worn by my wife, my two boys, and myself, 'I see, Mr. Bevington, that you and your family are connected with the Blue Ribbon Movement, and I am very pleased to see it. From the first, I have watched the temperance question with great interest; but I am bound to say that no phase of it has ever yielded me so much satisfaction as this has done. To witness the large number of ministers of all denominations, and, of course, the still larger number of members of perhaps all the churches, wearing the blue ribbon is an exceedingly gratifying circumstance, and speaks well for the future.

ROBERT MOFFAT is dead! A brief announcement of the fact without details was cabled across the Atlantic on Thursday, August 9th, and was doubtless read by the great majority of newspaper readers without interest or emotion. Yet what a life it was that has now closed! Grand in its simple beauty, sublime in its unlimited devotion, brilliant in its splendid achievements. The lives of kings and great generals appear sordid and insignificant compared with his, and the lustre that surrounds their names pales beside that with which the name of Moffat glows on the page of history. The half century of his warfare is a record of conquest, in which one simple, faithful, intrepid man confronted savage potentates, unarmed save with his faith; labored in squalor and discomfort, braving disease and all danger to extend the empire of the Prince of Peace. At the age of eighty-eight his Master has called him home, where he must surely have received a glorious welcome, and where he must meet hundreds of men who, but for his devotion and self-sacrifice, would never have heard the name of Jesus. He was a king among men, and the crown he wears now is an eternal crown, won by a lifetime of patient labor for the good of others.

Robert Moffat, "the Patriarch of Kuruman," and the "Apostle of the Bechuanas," whose portrait, engraved from a photograph of his own selection, appears on our frontispiece, was born at Ormestone, near Haddington, Scotland, on December 21st, 1795. The greater part of his boyhood was spent at Carron Shore, near the great Carron Iron Works, where his father held an appointment in the Customs.

A GARDENER.

When Robert was about twelve years of age he was ambitious to be a sailor, and at the request of a ship's captain his father consented that he should try a taste of sea life in a coasting vessel; but not finding much that was pleasant on board ship or during the voyage, he returned to school, and began to study botany and horticulture, in order to qualify himself for the position of a skilled gardener.

Some time after this—the exact period cannot be ascertained—Robert's father removed to Inverkeithing, Fifeshire, and the lad obtained congenial employment near the town in the gardens of the Earl of Moray. Scotch gardeners then, as now, had a good repute in England, and he was invited to a situation in Cheshire, where he continued two or three years, pursuing his studies with avidity.

Robert's parents were pious, God-fearing people. The virtuous and consistent example of his father produced upon him the happiest effect. From his mother he received instruction of a more positively religious nature. The worthy woman had set her heart upon her boy "knowing from a child the Holy Scriptures."

HIS MOTHER'S REQUEST.

When about to quit his native country for his new situation in England, his mother wished him to promise that he would read his Bible every day, both morning and evening. Sensible of his own weakness, and perhaps also of his boyish disinclination, he tried to evade the request. But as she was about to bid him farewell, she took his hand, and looking into his face with tearful eyes, said, imploringly, "Robert you will promise me to read the Bible; more particularly the New Testament, and most especially the Gospels—those are the words of Christ Himself; and there you cannot possibly go astray." He could not resist such an appeal, and replied, "Yes, mother, I make you the promise." He knew, as he once remarked in relating the circumstance, that the promise once made must be kept. "And, oh!" he added, "I am happy that I did make it."

Not long after he went to Cheshire, the reading of God's word and the preaching of the Gospel was blessed by the Holy Ghost to his conversion to Christ. Though the particulars of this momentous event are nowhere published, it is known that it was in Warrington that the cardinal occurrence in the life of the future missionary happned.

A MEMORABLE POSTER.

On a calm summer's evening the meditative youth was walking into that town from High Leigh, when, just as he had crossed the bridge, a poster caught his eye. It was the first of the kind he had ever seen. The two lines which arrested his attention were "London Missionary Society," and "Rev. W. Roby, of Manchester." The meeting announced had been already held, and therefore he could not attend it; but, to use his own words, the poster had made him "another man." The stories his mother had told him about the Moravian Brethren in Greenland flashed back upon his memory with the force of a new inspiration. There lay before him, in the path of his chosen profession, a flattering and lucrative prospect; but "it now tempted him in vain;" all at once it had "dwindled into nothingness, when compared to the service of Christ among the perishing heathen." Hearing him speak thus, persons who had the power and will to serve him said, "his brains were turned." "And so they were," he responded, "but turned the right way."

ORDAINED AS A MISSIONARY.

The same influence that had made the mute poster speak to Robert's heart induced him to resolve upon going to Manchester, to seek out Mr. Roby for the express purpose of offering himself for mission work. Not without much timidity and some sense of misgiving, he knocked at the door. Mr. Roby received him with great kindness, told him to be of good courage, and promised to use what influence he had with the directors of the Society on his behalf. The final consequence was that Robert Moffat was accepted by the Society, and, in October, 1816, was, with eight other young men, ordained in Surrey Chapel, London, as a minister of the Gospel to the heathen.

SAILS FOR SOUTH AFRICA.

The youthful missionary sailed for the Cape of Good Hope on October 31st, 1816, being not quite twenty-one years of age. Like the pioneers of Protestant missions in India, he was tried by a discouraging reception. When he reached the Cape he had to solicit the permission of the British governor to visit the heathen beyond the boundaries of the colony. This was refused for some time, but while waiting he was not idle. Day after day, with commendable importunity, he repeated and emphasized his application to the Government. The post of Resident with one of the Kaffir chiefs was offered to him, where he might act as agent and as Christian instructor at the same time; but he declined to be fettered, even though the chains were of gold, and in God's strength was determined to secure the untrammelled liberty of a missionary of the Cross.

Boarding with a godly Hollander, he soon acquired the Dutch language, so as to be able to preach the glad tidings of salvation to the Dutch Boers and their native servants. At length permission was granted him to go up the country.

AFRICANER'S CAREER.

The scene of action which at length opened to the enthusiastic missionary was on the North-west Border, beyond the Orange River, where a Hottentot chief, known as Africaner, had gathered a fierce body of desperate marauders about him. He had been outlawed from the colony for the murder of a farmer named Pienaar, who was shot down in the presence of his wife and family. At one time the lands of this chief reached within a hundred miles of Cape Town, and his kraals, and pastures, and hunting-grounds were scenes of rude abundance and barbaric freedom.

Many attempts were made by the colonial authorities to destroy Africaner, but they only excited him to reprisals, and he became the terror of all the farmsteads in the Border Country.

It was to

of this dreaded outlaw and "banditti chief" that Moffat set forth. The farmers at whose houses he was entertained en route assured him that Africaner would think no more of taking his life than he would of slaying a zebra or an antelope. One said the outlaw chieftain would set him up for a mark for his young men to shoot their arrows at; another, that he would strip off his skin and make a drum of it to dance to; another, that he would strike his head from his body, and use his skull for a drinking-cup; and a motherly old lady, wiping the tears from her eyes as she bade him farewell, said, "Had you been an old man it would have been nothing, for you would soon have died, whether or no; but you are young, and going to be eaten up by that monster!"

Undeterred, however, by these reports, Robert Moffat proceeded onward in his journey, and at length arrived at Africaner's kraal. He found that though the appearance of things was somewhat discouraging, the chief was not so formidable as he had been pictured by the fears of the planters. He received a reluctant welcome, but presently the order was given to the women to make a house for him. This they did by binding long rods into a hemispheric form, and covering them with mats. It was as uncomfortable as it was frail, for the rain streamed through it, the sun heated it to an almost unbearable degree, and when the wind blew it was filled with suffocating dust. Vagrant dogs crept into it for a night's shelter, and frequently ran off with the food the missionary had prepared for the following day; serpents coiled themselves behind his boxes; and at times he had to start up from sleep to drive away contending bulls, lest in their struggles they should crush himself and his dwelling.

The young missionary's sincerity and fitness for the work which he had undertaken was thus tested at the very commencement, but his devotion rose as hardships and difficulties increased. Through the day he was fully employed in teaching school and holding services; and in the stillness of the evening he silently retired to a pile of rocks in the neighborhood to sing and pray.

ENCOURAGING SIGNS.

He was soon cheered by a pleasing change in Africaner. The truth, applied by the Holy Spirit, was apprehended by him as a transforming energy, and the fierceness of the bandit was melted into the gentleness of the Christian. The weapons by which he had become so formidable were laid aside, and the Bible was almost always in his hands.

The outlawed robber chieftain now submitted himself in all things to the missionary, as "his guide, philosopher, and friend;" and some months after his conversion Mr. Moffat proposed that he should accompany him to Cape Town. Africaner said, "I had thought you loved me, and do you advise me to go to the Government to be hung up as a spectacle of public justice?" Then laying his hand on his head, he said, "Do you not know that I am an outlaw, and that one thousand rix dollars have been offered for this poor head?" At last, however, Mr. Moffat, having assured him that he would be well received in Cape Town, he consented to go.

A FARMER'S INCREDULITY.

On their way they came near a farmhouse in which the missionary had received kind entertainment when travelling toward Namaqua-land. Mr. Moffat left the wagons and went alone to meet the farmer. The latter seemed startled by his appearance, and asked, in rather a wild manner, who he was. When the name was given the farmer exclaimed, "Moffat, it is your ghost!" and it was with difficulty he was persuaded it was the living missionary, for the cur-turn have you done me, but one good turn you did when the ribbon was put on my coat, so that we'll say we are square now.' "

An Unwise Wealthy Man.—Major Colquhoun said: "I know of a man who had all his life toiled honestly and amassed much wealth. He was a man of taste and refinement, loved pictures and other objects of art. During his many journeys over the world on business, he collected a large number of beautiful articles. Wearied with his labors, he returned to his native land, to spend the remainder of his days there, and looked about for a suitable mansion in which to put his treasures of art and beauty. After several fruitless searches he found a fine house surrounded by beautiful grounds which the proprietor was willing to sell for a large sum. He now looked forward to a long life of enjoyment and refined pleasure amid his wealth. He was not satisfied, but expected to be so when settled in his new home. Although he was an estimable man, he knew not Jesus, and therefore could not have the quiet rest which He gives to those who love Him. He hardly had got into his new residence when the first summons came to him in the shape of disease. The doctors could do nothing for him, and he had to leave his house and treasures to appear naked before God. His pictures and curiosities were sold, and the proceeds, along with the rest of his money, were given to endow a hospital, which will be of great benefit to the district in which it is. But what of his own soul? for he knew not Jesus."

THE PURLEYS.

By Rev. Charles Courtenay.

THE HUSBAND.

It was in the afternoon that I called on Mr. Purley. I had been carefully advised as to my time of approach.

"Yes, father is at home. He is lying down."

While waiting for his appearance I saw that the wife had prepared a cup of beef-tea ready for his awakening. The weather being cold, and his work in an exposed position, she took care that he should be well fortified against discomfort and danger.

And now I am facing the husband and father, the cause of so much trouble, and the object of so many prayers. A good-looking man enough, clean, neat, and with but little appearance of dissipated habits; moreover very respectful, and really desirous of talking to me. I gradually bring the conversation round to the subject of strong drink. I press him as to his personal habits. I declaim against the cruelty, the selfishness, the sinful extravagance, the physical and spiritual danger involved in excess.

Just as I anticipated, he denies it all. He does not take too much. He is a strictly moderate drinker. He knows exactly where to stop. He is not only no drunkard, but is not even approaching one. He takes his glass of beer, he doesn't deny, and he's not ashamed of it. I change my tactics. I press him on the subject of his soul. I speak of sin, judgment, eternity.

"Could you face the Judge on the great White Throne to-night?"

Were the tears that flowed so freely a hopeful sign? Up to a certain point "Yes." The man's soul was not beyond the reach of impressions. He had real leanings toward Christ and the Gospel. So far they were hopeful. But then he was a man who could weep easily. He was one of those weak men who wear their hearts on their coat sleeve, as the saying is. And, added to his natural weakness, there was the artificial tearfulness produced by the influence of strong drink. I cannot say that, on the whole, his tears produced in me much hopefulness. And all the less when I again reverted to the subject of strong drink, and, taking his own version of the matter, pleaded with him, on the score of influence, to give up its use.

"Doesn't the amount of drink you take affect your temper, and make you snap at your wife and daughter?"

Well, yes, he wouldn't deny but that it did sometimes.

"And wouldn't the money you spend in drink come in nicely for a rainy day, or to provide for your wife and children should you be cut off by death?"

Yes, he wouldn't deny that.

"And wouldn't you be better personally in your own health if you were to take less? Do you require to take so much?"

Well, he thought he might possibly do with less.

Here let me say that he was a highly nervous man, and not at all strong.

"Then if the drink affects your temper, doesn't improve your health, wastes your money, and exposes your soul to danger, why not give it up?"

Alas! how firm is weakness! Here was a man who couldn't say "No" to a glass of ale, who carried weakness in every feature and movement, and in the very mildness of his voice, and yet was in the matter of abstinence as strong as a giant.

"No, sir, I won't give it up, I'm determined."

It was no use my staying longer. I had failed in my mission. So, with a sad, disappointed heart, I left the room. At the door the wife was waiting, her face twitching with the greatness of her anxiety, and yet unable to ask how my errand had sped because of her husband's presence. He must not know that this interview was her work. All that I could do to signify my failure was to shake my head.

Poor wife! Thy heavy heart is not to be lightened yet. Thy tears must flow unchecked. Thy prayers yet remain to be answered.

"You'll come again and see us, sir," she said with assumed lightness, but with a yearning in the tone that could not be mistaken. Things were looking very dark for the wife, and daughter, and husband, all three.

Of course I did not give him up. He is but a poor workman who despairs at his first failure. Again and again I called, and at each new visit pleaded with more energy for his surrender to the thousand claims of mercy, justice, and reason.

It was most disheartening work, however. Failure, failure, failure, nothing but failure.

He was certainly drinking harder. His visits to the public-house were becoming daily more frequent and more prolonged. He was showing his intemperance more unmistakably too in his face and his whole outward bearing. And more than once he had misconducted himself during his working hours; so much so that his master called him into his office and solemnly warned him that he could not retain him in his service if he acted so again.

Violent diseases require violent remedies. Certainly John Purley's treatment must be an uncommon one. And so it was. One day he was brought home unconscious on a stretcher. He had been badly hurt while at work. A horse had violently kicked him. For days he hung between life and death, not even the doctor knowing how it would go with him. With his eyes closed, and his breathing so low as to be scarcely perceptible, he lay the very picture of death. That he was conscious, however, all the time was proved by the first remark he made after his accident. In the lowest of tones he said to his wife—

"I've been a bad husband, my dear."

This was the first breaking of the clouds, for the tone in which it was said and the look which accompanied it expressed even more than the words. Afterward he said a great deal more, in continuation of the same subject, for his mind seemed full of nothing else. Often would a shudder pass over him at the remembrance of the past.

There came a time, however, when he grew braver and calmer at the prospect of temptation. Indeed, the change that came over him in connection with the whole subject was marvellous. His wife had one day ventured with much fear and trembling to read him a verse or two from the Book she loved so dearly. She was careful to select only those portions which were most suited to his case. She observed an eagerness in his looks after she had read a while, a sort of thirsty expression, as though the words she read were the very ones that he had been wanting.

At first she read but once a day. Afterward, at his special request, she read twice, and sometimes three times. It made her so happy. And many a little prayer did she and her daughter have together for a blessing on the reading of the Word to him. One day she overheard him saying to himself—

"That was love now, wan't it? Fancy that! To die for a horrid old sinner like me. I say 'twas wonderful! 'That whosoever believeth' —whosoever. Come now, John, my man, there's no way of getting out of that, is there? You're there, sure enough. Yes, Lord, it's all right. I'll believe. I'll take it. It's all true. Thank the Lord!"

When next she entered his room he was lying back, with his eyes cast upward, and with a most beaming expression on his face.

"You look happy, John," she cried.

"My dear," he whispered, "I am. I feel as light as a feather. I'm that happy I can hardly contain myself. I've found Jesus; that's why."

They had never prayed together before, but now Mrs. Purley slipped on her knees beside her husband's bed, and in simple words poured out her praises. And now nothing would content him but that I should be sent for. He wanted to tell me what had happened.

"You see, sir, I've been struck down. The Lord wouldn't let me go on any longer so madly. And it's been good for me, sir, for He's been teaching me such a lot. I know you'll be right-down glad to hear I've been to Jesus and put my trust in Him, and I'm so happy."

Just then the wife and daughter came in full of joy.

"They've had a lot to put up with, haven't they, sir? But they shan't have any more of it if the Lord spare me. I'll make it up to them, I know."

"Let us all thank God together," I said.

After I had finished, John himself began—

"O Lord, I've been a bad husband and father. Thou knowest I have, but I'm going to be better, Lord. I'm going to give up the drink and everything that's wrong. Give me strength, Lord, I'm so weak. Keep me straight for Jesus' sake."

It was extraordinary the speed with which John Purley recovered after this. It seemed as though he had taken a new lease of life. The doctor was completely astounded. The first thing he did as soon as he could hold a pen was to sign the pledge.

"And now I'll make up for it all." This was John Purley's resolve as told in confidence to his wife, and told in prayer to his God. And if ever man tried to undo the past and make up for it, and if ever man fulfilled his resolve, John Purley was the man.

Let us peep in upon them one winter's night not many months after the events just narrated.

There's Mrs. Purley as neat and clean as ever, and looking as happy as a queen. No marks of care are upon her brow now. Yes, and she has some color in her cheeks too.

Then there's the daughter, quite a young woman now. It is wonderful what a difference it has made in her, in looks, manners, and everything.

And last of all, there's John himself, bustling about, here, there, and everywhere, every movement seeming to say by its eagerness, "And now I'll make up for it all."

That is something like a model family circle, I think.

And when later on John takes down the big family Bible and reverently reads therefrom, and afterward leads them all in prayer, I think you will agree with me that this is just the finishing touch to one of the prettiest pictures in the world.

The stories his mother had told him about the Moravian Brethren in Greenland flashed back upon his memory with the force of a new inspiration. There lay before him, in the path of his chosen profession, a flattering and lucrative prospect; but "it now tempted him in vain;" all at once it had "dwindled into nothingness, when compared to the service of Christ among the perishing heathen." Hearing him speak thus, persons who had the power and will to serve him said, "his brains were turned." "And so they were," he responded, "but turned the right way."

ORDAINED AS A MISSIONARY.

The same influence that had made the mute poster speak to Robert's heart induced him to resolve upon going to Manchester, to seek out Mr. Roby for the express purpose of offering himself for mission work. Not without much timidity and some sense of misgiving, he knocked at the door. Mr. Roby received him with great kindness, told him to be of good courage, and promised to use what influence he had with the directors of the Society on his behalf. The final consequence was that Robert Moffat was accepted by the Society, and, in October, 1816, was, with eight other young men, ordained in Surrey Chapel, London, as a minister of the Gospel to the heathen.

SAILS FOR SOUTH AFRICA.

The youthful missionary sailed for the Cape of Good Hope on October 31st, 1816, being not quite twenty-one years of age. Like the pioneers of Protestant missions in India, he was tried by a discouraging reception. When he reached the Cape he had to solicit the permission of the British governor to visit the heathen beyond the boundaries of the colony. This was refused for some time, but while waiting he was not idle. Day after day, with commendable importunity, he repeated and emphasized his application to the Government. The post of Resident with one of the Kaffir chiefs was offered to him, where he might act as agent and as Christian instructor at the same time; but he declined to be fettered, even though the chains were of gold, and in God's strength was determined to secure the untrammelled liberty of a missionary of the Cross.

Boarding with a godly Hollander, he soon acquired the Dutch language, so as to be able to preach the glad tidings of salvation to the Dutch Boers and their native servants. At length permission was granted him to go up the country.

AFRICANER'S CAREER.

The scene of action which at length opened to the enthusiastic missionary was on the North-west Border, beyond the Orange River, where a Hottentot chief, known as Africaner, had gathered a fierce body of desperate marauders about him. He had been outlawed from the colony for the murder of a farmer named Pienaar, who was shot down in the presence of his wife and family. At one time the lands of this chief reached within a hundred miles of Cape Town, and his kraals, and pastures, and hunting-grounds were scenes of rude abundance and barbaric freedom.

Many attempts were made by the colonial authorities to destroy Africaner, but they only excited him to reprisals, and he became the terror of all the farmsteads in the Border Country.

It was to

of this dreaded outlaw and "banditti chief" that Moffat set forth. The farmers at whose houses he was entertained en route assured him that Africaner would think no more of taking his life than he would of slaying a zebra or an antelope. One said the outlaw chieftain would set him up for a mark for his young men to shoot their arrows at; another, that he would strip off his skin and make a drum of it to dance to; another, that he would strike his head from his body, and use his skull for a drinking-cup; and a motherly old lady, wiping the tears from her eyes as she bade him farewell, said, "Had you been an old man it would have been nothing, for you would soon have died, whether or no; but you are young, and going to be eaten up by that monster!"

Undeterred, however, by these reports, Robert Moffat proceeded onward in his journey, and at length arrived at Africaner's kraal. He found that though the appearance of things was somewhat discouraging, the chief was not so formidable as he had been pictured by the fears of the planters. He received a reluctant welcome, but presently the order was given to the women to make a house for him. This they did by binding long rods into a hemispheric form, and covering them with mats. It was as uncomfortable as it was frail, for the rain streamed through it, the sun heated it to an almost unbearable degree, and when the wind blew it was filled with suffocating dust. Vagrant dogs crept into it for a night's shelter, and frequently ran off with the food the missionary had prepared for the following day; serpents coiled themselves behind his boxes; and at times he had to start up from sleep to drive away contending bulls, lest in their struggles they should crush himself and his dwelling.

The young missionary's sincerity and fitness for the work which he had undertaken was thus tested at the very commencement, but his devotion rose as hardships and difficulties increased. Through the day he was fully employed in teaching school and holding services; and in the stillness of the evening he silently retired to a pile of rocks in the neighborhood to sing and pray.

ENCOURAGING SIGNS.

He was soon cheered by a pleasing change in Africaner. The truth, applied by the Holy Spirit, was apprehended by him as a transforming energy, and the fierceness of the bandit was melted into the gentleness of the Christian. The weapons by which he had become so formidable were laid aside, and the Bible was almost always in his hands.

The outlawed robber chieftain now submitted himself in all things to the missionary, as "his guide, philosopher, and friend;" and some months after his conversion Mr. Moffat proposed that he should accompany him to Cape Town. Africaner said, "I had thought you loved me, and do you advise me to go to the Government to be hung up as a spectacle of public justice?" Then laying his hand on his head, he said, "Do you not know that I am an outlaw, and that one thousand rix dollars have been offered for this poor head?" At last, however, Mr. Moffat, having assured him that he would be well received in Cape Town, he consented to go.

A FARMER'S INCREDULITY.

On their way they came near a farmhouse in which the missionary had received kind entertainment when travelling toward Namaqua-land. Mr. Moffat left the wagons and went alone to meet the farmer. The latter seemed startled by his appearance, and asked, in rather a wild manner, who he was. When the name was given the farmer exclaimed, "Moffat, it is your ghost!" and it was with difficulty he was persuaded it was the living missionary, for the cur-turn have you done me, but one good turn you did when the ribbon was put on my coat, so that we'll say we are square now.' "

An Unwise Wealthy Man.—Major Colquhoun said: "I know of a man who had all his life toiled honestly and amassed much wealth. He was a man of taste and refinement, loved pictures and other objects of art. During his many journeys over the world on business, he collected a large number of beautiful articles. Wearied with his labors, he returned to his native land, to spend the remainder of his days there, and looked about for a suitable mansion in which to put his treasures of art and beauty. After several fruitless searches he found a fine house surrounded by beautiful grounds which the proprietor was willing to sell for a large sum. He now looked forward to a long life of enjoyment and refined pleasure amid his wealth. He was not satisfied, but expected to be so when settled in his new home. Although he was an estimable man, he knew not Jesus, and therefore could not have the quiet rest which He gives to those who love Him. He hardly had got into his new residence when the first summons came to him in the shape of disease. The doctors could do nothing for him, and he had to leave his house and treasures to appear naked before God. His pictures and curiosities were sold, and the proceeds, along with the rest of his money, were given to endow a hospital, which will be of great benefit to the district in which it is. But what of his own soul? for he knew not Jesus."

THE PURLEYS.

By Rev. Charles Courtenay.

THE HUSBAND.

It was in the afternoon that I called on Mr. Purley. I had been carefully advised as to my time of approach.

"Yes, father is at home. He is lying down."

While waiting for his appearance I saw that the wife had prepared a cup of beef-tea ready for his awakening. The weather being cold, and his work in an exposed position, she took care that he should be well fortified against discomfort and danger.

And now I am facing the husband and father, the cause of so much trouble, and the object of so many prayers. A good-looking man enough, clean, neat, and with but little appearance of dissipated habits; moreover very respectful, and really desirous of talking to me. I gradually bring the conversation round to the subject of strong drink. I press him as to his personal habits. I declaim against the cruelty, the selfishness, the sinful extravagance, the physical and spiritual danger involved in excess.

Just as I anticipated, he denies it all. He does not take too much. He is a strictly moderate drinker. He knows exactly where to stop. He is not only no drunkard, but is not even approaching one. He takes his glass of beer, he doesn't deny, and he's not ashamed of it. I change my tactics. I press him on the subject of his soul. I speak of sin, judgment, eternity.

"Could you face the Judge on the great White Throne to-night?"

Were the tears that flowed so freely a hopeful sign? Up to a certain point "Yes." The man's soul was not beyond the reach of impressions. He had real leanings toward Christ and the Gospel. So far they were hopeful. But then he was a man who could weep easily. He was one of those weak men who wear their hearts on their coat sleeve, as the saying is. And, added to his natural weakness, there was the artificial tearfulness produced by the influence of strong drink. I cannot say that, on the whole, his tears produced in me much hopefulness. And all the less when I again reverted to the subject of strong drink, and, taking his own version of the matter, pleaded with him, on the score of influence, to give up its use.

"Doesn't the amount of drink you take affect your temper, and make you snap at your wife and daughter?"

Well, yes, he wouldn't deny but that it did sometimes.

"And wouldn't the money you spend in drink come in nicely for a rainy day, or to provide for your wife and children should you be cut off by death?"

Yes, he wouldn't deny that.

"And wouldn't you be better personally in your own health if you were to take less? Do you require to take so much?"

Well, he thought he might possibly do with less.

Here let me say that he was a highly nervous man, and not at all strong.

"Then if the drink affects your temper, doesn't improve your health, wastes your money, and exposes your soul to danger, why not give it up?"

Alas! how firm is weakness! Here was a man who couldn't say "No" to a glass of ale, who carried weakness in every feature and movement, and in the very mildness of his voice, and yet was in the matter of abstinence as strong as a giant.

"No, sir, I won't give it up, I'm determined."

It was no use my staying longer. I had failed in my mission. So, with a sad, disappointed heart, I left the room. At the door the wife was waiting, her face twitching with the greatness of her anxiety, and yet unable to ask how my errand had sped because of her husband's presence. He must not know that this interview was her work. All that I could do to signify my failure was to shake my head.

Poor wife! Thy heavy heart is not to be lightened yet. Thy tears must flow unchecked. Thy prayers yet remain to be answered.

"You'll come again and see us, sir," she said with assumed lightness, but with a yearning in the tone that could not be mistaken. Things were looking very dark for the wife, and daughter, and husband, all three.

Of course I did not give him up. He is but a poor workman who despairs at his first failure. Again and again I called, and at each new visit pleaded with more energy for his surrender to the thousand claims of mercy, justice, and reason.

It was most disheartening work, however. Failure, failure, failure, nothing but failure.

He was certainly drinking harder. His visits to the public-house were becoming daily more frequent and more prolonged. He was showing his intemperance more unmistakably too in his face and his whole outward bearing. And more than once he had misconducted himself during his working hours; so much so that his master called him into his office and solemnly warned him that he could not retain him in his service if he acted so again.

Violent diseases require violent remedies. Certainly John Purley's treatment must be an uncommon one. And so it was. One day he was brought home unconscious on a stretcher. He had been badly hurt while at work. A horse had violently kicked him. For days he hung between life and death, not even the doctor knowing how it would go with him. With his eyes closed, and his breathing so low as to be scarcely perceptible, he lay the very picture of death. That he was conscious, however, all the time was proved by the first remark he made after his accident. In the lowest of tones he said to his wife—

"I've been a bad husband, my dear."

This was the first breaking of the clouds, for the tone in which it was said and the look which accompanied it expressed even more than the words. Afterward he said a great deal more, in continuation of the same subject, for his mind seemed full of nothing else. Often would a shudder pass over him at the remembrance of the past.

There came a time, however, when he grew braver and calmer at the prospect of temptation. Indeed, the change that came over him in connection with the whole subject was marvellous. His wife had one day ventured with much fear and trembling to read him a verse or two from the Book she loved so dearly. She was careful to select only those portions which were most suited to his case. She observed an eagerness in his looks after she had read a while, a sort of thirsty expression, as though the words she read were the very ones that he had been wanting.

At first she read but once a day. Afterward, at his special request, she read twice, and sometimes three times. It made her so happy. And many a little prayer did she and her daughter have together for a blessing on the reading of the Word to him. One day she overheard him saying to himself—

"That was love now, wan't it? Fancy that! To die for a horrid old sinner like me. I say 'twas wonderful! 'That whosoever believeth' —whosoever. Come now, John, my man, there's no way of getting out of that, is there? You're there, sure enough. Yes, Lord, it's all right. I'll believe. I'll take it. It's all true. Thank the Lord!"

When next she entered his room he was lying back, with his eyes cast upward, and with a most beaming expression on his face.

"You look happy, John," she cried.

"My dear," he whispered, "I am. I feel as light as a feather. I'm that happy I can hardly contain myself. I've found Jesus; that's why."

They had never prayed together before, but now Mrs. Purley slipped on her knees beside her husband's bed, and in simple words poured out her praises. And now nothing would content him but that I should be sent for. He wanted to tell me what had happened.

"You see, sir, I've been struck down. The Lord wouldn't let me go on any longer so madly. And it's been good for me, sir, for He's been teaching me such a lot. I know you'll be right-down glad to hear I've been to Jesus and put my trust in Him, and I'm so happy."

Just then the wife and daughter came in full of joy.

"They've had a lot to put up with, haven't they, sir? But they shan't have any more of it if the Lord spare me. I'll make it up to them, I know."

"Let us all thank God together," I said.

After I had finished, John himself began—

"O Lord, I've been a bad husband and father. Thou knowest I have, but I'm going to be better, Lord. I'm going to give up the drink and everything that's wrong. Give me strength, Lord, I'm so weak. Keep me straight for Jesus' sake."

It was extraordinary the speed with which John Purley recovered after this. It seemed as though he had taken a new lease of life. The doctor was completely astounded. The first thing he did as soon as he could hold a pen was to sign the pledge.

"And now I'll make up for it all." This was John Purley's resolve as told in confidence to his wife, and told in prayer to his God. And if ever man tried to undo the past and make up for it, and if ever man fulfilled his resolve, John Purley was the man.

Let us peep in upon them one winter's night not many months after the events just narrated.

There's Mrs. Purley as neat and clean as ever, and looking as happy as a queen. No marks of care are upon her brow now. Yes, and she has some color in her cheeks too.

Then there's the daughter, quite a young woman now. It is wonderful what a difference it has made in her, in looks, manners, and everything.

And last of all, there's John himself, bustling about, here, there, and everywhere, every movement seeming to say by its eagerness, "And now I'll make up for it all."

That is something like a model family circle, I think.

And when later on John takes down the big family Bible and reverently reads therefrom, and afterward leads them all in prayer, I think you will agree with me that this is just the finishing touch to one of the prettiest pictures in the world.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Strike of the Telegraph Operators has failed. On Friday last the Executive Committee of the Brotherhood sent telegrams to all points, announcing that the strike was a failure, and giving permission to all the members to return to work immediately. There was considerable dissatisfaction manifested by prominent members at this decision, but the general feeling among the operators and of the public was that the hopelessness of the struggle was demonstrated, and that the Brotherhood had acted wisely in ending it. It was chivalrously agreed that no man should apply for work until the lady operators had had the first chance of being engaged, and a committee was appointed to escort them to the Western Union building to make application. Very few of them were taken on, and a very small percentage of the male operators were re-engaged. The strike had lasted twenty-nine days, and it is estimated that the loss to the strikers was about $400,000. How much the companies lost by decrease of business is of course unknown. They have won because their resources were greater than those of their employes, and they could afford to maintain the struggle so long as no concentrated effort was made by the public to compel them to do their duty. The triumph of the companies, however, has its dangers for them. The public is disgusted with their greed and their arrogance, and is more than ever determined to overthrow the monopoly, either by a Government service or some other method.

The Object on which the Civil Service Reform Association is concentrating its energies, now that the Pendleton bill has become law, was described by Mr. George William Curtis, in his annual address before the Association at Providence, R. I., on August 1st. He said: "This object is the repeal of the United States statutes which limit the term of most of the subordinate offices to four years, and which result in practically establishing that term for all offices, places, and employments in the service, except such as are specifically excepted. This mischievous practice is strongly intrenched in tradition and it is speciously defended. But it was introduced to prostitute the public service to personal control, and it is one of the chief sources of the abuses which have aroused public attention and indignation. The people are beginning to see that the absolute dependence of the great army of employes of the Government upon personal favor instead of the faithful discharge of duty creates an enormous danger to republican institutions. The limited term fosters utter servility and lack of self-respect, because reappointment depends not upon official fidelity and efficiency, but upon personal favor. The incumbent cannot be properly devoted to his duty, since it is necessary to propitiate the influence which can secure reappointment. The applicant is equally busy in seeking similar influence to obtain the place, and as fixed terms are constantly expiring, the wretched and demoralizing contest is perpetually raging. The repeal of the four years' law, therefore, is an essential step toward the complete correction of the personal and partisan prostitution of the public service, which is the object of this league." Mr. Curtis spoke in terms of high praise of President Arthur's "steady refusal to satisfy the faction of his party which demands that the public patronage shall be prostituted to a factional interest." At the business meeting which followed, Mr. Curtis was unanimously re-elected president of the Association.

Judge Jere. S. Black Died on Sunday Morning last at his residence at York, Pa. On Monday, August 13th, he was attacked by a painful disease, which from its first appearance he insisted would terminate fatally. His physicians, however, believed that his life could be saved by an operation. Judge Black consented to undergo the suffering, and the operation was successfully performed. It was, however, followed by blood poisoning, and on Sunday he died. His last hours were peaceful, and shortly before he breathed his last he told his son, Chauncey, that he had "no fear of crossing the dark river," assured, as he was, that his Heavenly Father would welcome him on the other shore. He was an active member of the Church of the Disciples to which President Garfield also belonged and was in early life an intimate friend of the founder of the Church. Judge Black occupied a prominent place in public affairs, and even in the retirement of his latter years he has exerted considerable influence on public affairs and was a trusted counsellor of the Democratic party. The people have admired and honored him, and he did nothing to shake that confidence at any step in the whole of his career, as he rose from the plough to the bar, to the District Attorneyship of his county, to the Supreme Court Bench, and to a seat in Buchanan's cabinet. He was always just, upright and consistent, and though intensely combative, his opponents respected him as a fair, though formidable foe. He was seventy-three years of age when he died.

A Destructive Fire Broke Out at Vineyard Haven, Mass., on Saturday, August 11th, which was not gotten under control until Sunday morning. It completely destroyed the town. Only one store remained unburned, and fifty acres in the heart of the town, which were thickly covered with hotels and private dwellings, were burned into a heap of smoking ruins. Hundreds of people were rendered homeless, and are being supported by charity. Happily, no lives were lost by burning.

A Startling Statement as to the Policy of the Mormons was made by Dr. Jackson, a Utah missionary, in Westminster Presbyterian Church, New York, on Sunday evening, July 29th. He said that there is danger of a Mormon outbreak against the Christian settlers in the Territory and of a fanatical massacre. He described the efficient organization of the Mormons as being adapted to such a crisis. All power is centred in the hands of John Taylor, the President or Prophet. Taylor has telegraph wires from his house to the houses of the bishops, and they in turn have wires to the houses of those subordinate to them, and so on till every man within 500 miles north and south is reached almost instantly by the great central power—a power that could even cut off the supply of water from the agriculturist who should be suspected of apostasy. Under the guise of what is known as Zion's Co-operative Mercantile Association, the entire mercantile business of the Territory is done through the Church and through the President. One half of the population of Idaho, Dr. Jackson said, are sworn to obey John Taylor, and he may control the elections in that Territory. His influence extends to Washington, Oregon, Colorado, New Mexico, Nevada, and Montana.

The Number of Immigrants Received by this country during the fiscal year ending June 30th was 599,114. Of this number 191,643 came from Germany; 79,852 from England and Wales; 63,200 from Ireland; 34,596 from Sweden, and 31,715 from Italy. The number shows a decrease of 189,878 over the returns for 1882, and of 70,317 over those for 1881. The falling off is in part due to the operation of the law checking Chinese immigration. But for that law about 40,000 Chinamen would probably have arrived during the year.

Governor Crittenden of Missouri has Written a letter which deserves the thanks of Christians throughout the country. Referring to the Downing law, which the Legislature passed and by which all liquor saloons in the State are required under penalty to be closed on the Lord's day, the Governor says: "The law must be enforced, and it is not unnatural in its demands nor hurtful to society in its results. The saloon-keepers should recognize the fact that in the public estimation they are not engaged in as honorable and elevating a trade as those in the commercial, mechanical, ministerial, or professional business, and it is a matter of presumption for them to assert it. Their threats to rigidly enforce the Sunday law against all other classes, all other trades, is foolish, and is warming into life a feeling of disgust at their selfishness. I think I can safely say where one dollar demands freedom from the restraint of this law, ten ask its rigid enforcement. The question of the sanctity of this day in the minds of an invincible majority of our people is no longer a debatable one. Those who oppose it should consider well their position. No man or body of men can overthrow that day in this country." A stubborn fight is being made against the law in St. Louis by the liquor-dealers.

A Legal Decision on the Sabbath Question has been pronounced in Manitoba. Six young men went to Manitoba to work on a railroad. The contractor ordered them to work on the Sabbath, and they refused, whereupon he dismissed them, and they brought suit for damages. The court gave a decision for the amount claimed, and the Chief Justice of Manitoba said he "was bound to tell them that they were not bound to work on Sunday."

The Appalling Statistics of Divorce Recently published have led the Congregational ministers of Chicago to agree unanimously not to solemnize marriage where either party has procured divorce on other than scriptural grounds.

A Useful Work Appears to be in Progress at Excelsior Springs, Clay County, Mo., according to a report sent to us by a correspondent. The mineral waters found there having attracted a large number of visitors seeking health and recuperation, a few Christian people were moved to undertake the erection of a church. Prominent among these was Mr. B. Faucett, who contributed and collected largely toward the building fund. Rev. J. V. Flack, D.D., has accepted the pastoral charge there, and is building up a non-sectarian church. The pastor is content to labor without salary, but the report he sends us of the success already attained, indicates that he is not without the reward he covets in the prosperity of the Lord's work. He asks the prayers of the readers of The Christian Herald for a continued blessing.

A Wedding was Solemnized Underground on August 16th in Virginia. A party of excursionists from Pennsylvania had been exploring the famous Luray Caverns on the previous day. In the party were two affianced lovers, who were so impressed with the beauties of the place that they desired to be married there. The next day arrangements were made for realizing their wish. The wedding party obtained the services of an expert guide, who conducted them to the cavern called the ball-room, which was lit up by seven flambeaux, and looked brilliant. The bride and groom stood under a large arch of stalactites, and eleven young ladies and gentlemen stood around them. The responses of the parties, though uttered in low tones, were reverberated throughout the chamber. It was a pretty sight, and after the couple had been pronounced man and wife the crowd began to come in, and the bride and bridegroom received the congratulations of a large number of friends as they held their first reception half a mile underground. It was a romantic idea, and as the bride and bridegroom were led by an expert guide they had no reason to apprehend having to spend their married lives in the gloomy caves where they commenced. It may be hoped that in the future, when they involuntarily descend into gloom and trouble and finally death, they may have a heavenly Guide, in whom they may have as much confidence, and who will lead them into celestial light (Psa. 23 : 4).

A Difficult and Curious Question, which the law courts will have to determine, has arisen in Baltimore, Md. It is raised by the relatives of two people who claim considerable property, and it turns on a doubt as to which of two persons found dead, died first. It appears that about three weeks ago a man named Schmidt, who kept a beer saloon in Baltimore, first shot his wife and then himself, both being dead before the arrival of any physician. The wife was shot while in the store, first in the throat and then in the body, and Schmidt then ran up-stairs and shot himself. According to the statements of witnesses examined at the inquest, it would appear that Mrs. Schmidt may have lived for fifteen minutes after she was shot, while Schmidt, from the nature of the wound inflicted by himself, evidently lived but a few minutes. Should Mrs. Schmidt prove to have been the survivor, the property will go to her brothers; but, should Mr. Schmidt prove to have been the survivor, the property will pass to relatives in Germany. The claim in both cases is based on probabilities, there being no certain evidence either way. Usually, the death of a person being proved, the heirs have only to substantiate their claim to the inheritance, but in this case they are as much concerned in proving that their relatives lived a certain time as that they are dead. The believer, in claiming a heavenly inheritance, also takes into account, though in a better way, the subject of life and death. His inheritance was won for him by the death of his Redeemer, and was secured to him by His resurrection life (Rom. 4 : 25).

A Night of Agony in Niagara was Spent by a boatman who was suddenly surrounded by a fog while out on the river. The incident, as related to a reporter engaged in investigating Captain Webb's death, is as follows: The boatman being unable to see on account of the fog lost his bearings and knew he was drifting to death. His cries alarmed the village, and bells were rung for him to row toward them. Then an oar broke. His only hope then lay in a paltry little anchor, and a common rope, which was, moreover, much worn. Then he threw it over. It bumped along the stones, and his heart beat each time it failed to catch a grip. At last it caught and brought the boat up standing, while the tense string throbbed like the bass gut of a harp. For the moment it held. How soon would it part? He shrank from feeling along the strands. He was more afraid not to do so lest he should read his fate in the twine, tense and twanging under the current. Inch by inch his fingers travelled to his arm's length. So long as it held there he was safe. Time and time again through the long night he did this, but never, he said, without a heart like lead and hands quivering like a leaf. When morning dawned at last he was easily saved. It must have been an agonizing night; such times have men passed through who, having found themselves drifting to eternal death, and havin vainly struggled under the guidance of others to save themselves, have at length trusted tremblingly to the anchor of Christ. But then there is no real cause for fear; that anchor of the soul is always sure and steadfast (Heb. 6 : 19).

A Suit for Breach of Promise of Marriage commenced last week in Brooklyn, deserves the attention of people who may be tempted into similar difficulties. The lady, who appeared as plaintiff, was formerly the wife of a German schoolmaster. She formed the acquaintance in Germany of a young man who persuaded her to elope with him. She consented, and came to America, and her husband died from the consequences of the shock caused by his wife's flight. She then begged the young man to marry her, but he refused, and has married a wealthy lady, and left the woman who sinned for his sake to earn her living as a domestic servant. The reports published in the daily newspapers show that society is becoming increasingly careless of the sanctity of the marriage tie. Women so tempted should remember that in this case, as in thousands of others, the sin that will be inevitably punished in a future world, has been followed also by sorrow and misery in this life (Prov. 1 : 31).

A Singular Fatality Occurred at Wilkesbarre, Pa., on August 16th. A young woman employed at the Trucksville woollen mill was standing near the main shaft when the machinery was set in motion; and her hair, which was very long and was worn hanging down her back was caught by the rapidly revolving shaft. In an instant she was whirled around the shaft with great violence, and before the machinery could be stopped and the unfortunate girl extricated she had received fatal injuries. Her hair was partially torn from her head and she was otherwise terribly bruised. She also received injuries to her spine, and has since been lying in a paralyzed condition. She is about twenty years of age and of considerable personal beauty. This distressing calamity will doubtless lead to some precautionary measures being taken by the proprietors of the mill to prevent its recurrence. What a blessing it would be if some protection could be found against still more distressing moral calamities. In those, too, it often happens that personal charms, which people naturally value, involve the catastrophe (II Tim. 3 : 6).

A Snake around a Lady's Waist Caused her a fright recently. The daughter of a gentleman, whose residence is on the fringe of the woods at Sheridan, Pa., was, a few days ago, out walking in company with a lady companion, when suddenly she felt a peculiar and painful sensation around her waist, as if being tightly pressed. She was quite overcome, and seemed to be held in a vise-like grasp, which almost deprived her of breath. She found that something had coiled round her waist, and she called to her companion for help. The latter upon coming to her rescue was horrified to see the head of a large snake protrude from the folds of her dress. With rare presence of mind she caught hold of the light summer costume which her companion wore and pulled the skirt from her body. With it there fell a large black snake, which the young ladies declare was fully six feet in length. It darted away and made its escape into the bushes. The young lady was so alarmed that she fainted. We are not surprised that the lady should have been frightened by a danger so close and deadly, because she could see and feel the enemy that threatened her life. There are many people, however, who are in danger of losing eternal life through deadly sins that hold them in their power, but they are not alarmed, and do not call for help, but caress the enemy that is trying to slay their souls (Eph. 4 : 17-19).

IN HIM: LIKE HIM.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"He that saith he abideth in him ought himself also so to walk, even as he walked."—1 John 2 : 6.

Abiding in Christ—The Obligation of the Text—A Bible "Ought"—Initiation Followed by Imitation—I. How the Obligation is Proved—By the Original Covenant—The Necessity to the Mystical Christ—The Fruit of the One Spirit—An Article of Agreement—Preaching with the Feet—II. In what the Walking Consists—Holiness—Obedience—Activity—Self-Denial—Lowliness—Tenderness—Love—Delight in God—III. What is Needful—Constant Anointing—Communion—An Unfinished Portrait.

"He that saith he abideth in Him:"—that is exactly what every Christian does say. He cannot be a Christian unless this be true of him, and he cannot fully enjoy his religion unless he assuredly knows that he is in Christ, and can boldly say as much. We must be in Christ, and abidingly in Christ, or else we are not saved in the Lord. It is our union with the Christ that makes us Christians: by union with Him as our life we truly live—live in the favor of God. We are in Christ, dear brethren, as the manslayer was in the city of refuge: I hope that we can say we abide in Him as our sanctuary and shelter.

Beloved, since we, then, are the people who say that we abide in Him, it is upon us that the obligation of the text falls: we ought ourselves also so to walk even as He walked.

"A BIBLE OUGHT"

has great weight with a conscientious man. Ought it to be so? Then it shall be so, God helping me. If we say, we must do. If we talk, we must walk, or it will be mere talk. If we make the profession of abiding in Christ, we must prove it by our practice of walking with Christ. If we say that we are in Christ and abide in Him, we must take care that our life and character are conformed to Christ, or else we shall be making an empty boast. This is true of every man who says he is in Christ, for the text is put in the most general and absolute manner: be the man old or young, rich or poor, learned or simple, pastor or hearer, it is incumbent upon him to live like Christ if he professes to live in Christ.

The first thing about a Christian is initiation, initiation into Christ; the next thing is imitation, the imitation of Christ. We cannot be Christians unless we are in Christ; and we are not truly in Christ unless in Him we live and move and have our being, and the life of Christ is lived over again by us according to our measure. "Be ye imitators of God, as dear children." It is the nature of children to imitate their parents. Be ye imitators of Christ as good soldiers, who cannot have a better model for their soldierly life than their Captain and Lord. It is said to have been the distinguishing mark of Cæsar as a soldier that he never said to his followers "Go!" but he always said "Come!" Of Alexander, also, it was noted that in weary marches he was sure to be on foot with his warriors, and in fierce attacks he always was in the van.

The most persuasive sermon is the example which leads the way. This certainly is one trait in the Good Shepherd's character, "when He putteth forth His own sheep He goeth before them." If Jesus bids us do anything, He first does it Himself. He would have us wash one another's feet; and this is the argument—"Ye call me Master and Lord, and ye say well; for so I am. If I, then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet." Shall we not do as He does whom we profess to follow? He has left His footprints that we may set our feet in them. Will we not joyfully fix our feet upon this royal road?

But I stop a minute. I know that there are some here who cannot say that they are in Christ. Then, if you are not in Christ, you are out of Christ; and out of Christ terrible, ruinous. If we saw a man hanging over a deep pit, if we saw a man exposed to a sea of fire, and likely to perish in it, all our tenderest emotions would begin to flow, and we should pray in an agony of spirit, "Oh, God, save this man from danger!" My brethren, there are some among us to-night who are in the utmost danger; in a most emphatic sense they are lost already, for they are without God, and without Christ, strangers to the commonwealth of Israel. Oh, my hearers, how shall I speak of you without tears? Poor souls, abiding under the wrath of God! Poor souls! The mercy is that you are not past hope. There is an arm that can reach you; there is a voice that calls you—calls you even now; hear it: "Look unto Me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and besides Me there is none else."

I. I shall first of all ask you to consider how this obligation is proved. Let us spend a few minutes over the question, Why ought we to walk as Jesus did?

When we read the word "ought," if we are honest men, we begin to look about us and to make inquiries as to the reason and the measure of this obligation.

AN "OUGHT" IS A COMPULSION to a true heart. There is a "needs be" to every godly man that he should do what he ought. What, then, is the ground upon which this "ought" is fixed?

First, it is the design of God that those who are in Christ should walk as Christ walked. It is a part of the original covenant purpose; for "whom He did foreknow He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son." That is the drift of the plan of grace, the aim of the covenant. Grace looks toward holiness, that there should be a people called forth to whom Christ should be the elder brother, the first-born among many brethren. You certainly have not had the purpose of God fulfilled in you, dear friend, unless you have been conformed to the image of His dear Son.

Observe, again, another point of this necessity: it is necessary to the mystical Christ that we should walk as He walked, for we are joined unto the Lord Jesus in one body. Now, Christ cannot be made a monster; that would be a blasphemous notion. The mystical body must be the most beautiful and precious production of God; for the church is Christ's body, "the fulness of Him that filleth all in all." And shall that mysterious fulness be something defiled, deformed, full of sin, subject to Satan? God forbid! "As He which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy," and as your HEAD is holy, so be ye, as members of His body, holy too. Ought it not to be so? Does anybody raise a question? Does not every member of Christ, by the very fact that he is joined to Him by living union, feel at once that he must walk even as Christ walked?

And this, beloved, again, must all be the fruit of the one Spirit that is in Christ and in us. The Father anointed Christ of old with the same anointing which rests on us in our measure. The Holy Spirit descended upon Him, and rested upon Him, and we have an unction from the same Holy One. If, then, the Spirit of God dwell in you (and if it do not, you are not in Christ), it must work in you conformity to Christ that you should walk even as He walked.

Perhaps further argument is not needed; but I would have Christians remember that this is

which we make with Christ when we become His disciples. It is taken for granted that when we enter the service of Jesus we by that act and deed undertake by His help to follow His example. We put ourselves into Christ's hands unreservedly, and we said, "Lord, sanctify me, and then use me. Take my body and all its members; take my mind and all its faculties; take my spirit and all the new powers which Thou hast bestowed upon me with it; and let all these be Thine. Reign in me; rule me absolutely, sovereignly, always and alone. I do not ask to be my own, for I am not my own, I am bought with a price." Are we not, then, to be true to this blessed compact? "I do remember my faults this day," says one. Ay, but remember also the vows that still engage you. Do not desire to escape from the sacred bond. This day remember the Lord to whom you dedicated yourself in the days of your youth, perhaps long years ago, and again entreat Him to take full possession of the purchased possession, and hold it against all comers, forever.

For, once more, inasmuch as we are in Christ, we are now bound to live to Christ's glory, and this is a great means of glorifying Christ. What can we do to glorify Christ if we do not walk even as He walked? Suppose you church-members are unjust in your trade; suppose that in your common conversation you are loose; suppose that in your acts you are licentious or untrue; what does the world say of your Christianity? Why, it becomes to them a thing of contempt. They sniff at it. In the early ages some of the worst opponents of Christianity used to wing their shafts with the of Christian professors, and they were wise in their generation. One of them said, "Where is that catholic holiness of which we have often heard so much?" and another said, "We heard of these people that they love their Christ, and love other men so that they would even die for love of their brethren; but many of them do not love as well as the heathen whom they despise." I dare say there was a good deal of slander and scandal in what they said; but I am also afraid that, if it were said to-day, there would be a vast deal of sorrowful truth in it. Christian love is by no means so plentiful as it might be, nor holy living either.

Is not this the thing that weakens the preaching of the Gospel—the want of living the Gospel? If all the professed Christians who live in London really walked as Christ walked, would not the salt have more effect upon the corrupt mass than the stuff which is now called salt seems to have? We preach here in the pulpit; but what can we do, unless you preach yonder at home? It is you preaching in your shops, in your kitchens, in your nurseries, in your parlors, in the streets, which will tell on the masses. This is the preaching—the best preaching in the world, for it is seen as well as heard. I heard one say he liked to see men preach with their feet; and this is it, "they ought also so to walk even as Christ walked." No testimony excels that which is borne in ordinary life. Christ ought to be glorified by us, and therefore we ought to be like Him, for if we are not, we cannot glorify Him, but must dishonor Him.

II. Now, secondly, consider wherein this walking with Christ as He walked consists. Here is a wide subject. I have a sea before me with as much sailing room as Noah in the ark. I can only just point out the direction in which you should sail if you would make a prosperous voyage.

First, brothers, to put it all together in one word, that every Christian has to see to is holiness. I will not try at any great length to explain what that word means, but it always sounds to me as if it explained itself. You know what wholeness is—a thing without a crack, or flaw, or break; complete, entire, uninjured, whole. Well, that is the main meaning of holy. The character of God is perfectly holy: in it nothing is lacking; nothing is redundant. When a thing is complete it is whole, and this applied to moral and spiritual things gives you the inner meaning of "holy." When a man is healthy, perfectly healthy, in spirit, soul, and body, then he is perfectly holy; for sin is a moral disorder, and righteousness is the right state of every faculty. I cannot spare time to tell you all that the word "holy" means; but if you wish to see holiness, look at Christ. In Him you see a perfect character, an all-round character. He is the perfect one; be ye like Him in all holiness.

THE FIRST THING

We must go a little into detail; so I say, next, one main point in which we ought to walk according to the walk of our great Exemplar is

OBEDIENCE.

Our Lord Jesus Christ took upon Himself the form of a servant; and what service it was that He rendered! "He was a son; yet learned He obedience by the things that He suffered." And what obedience that dear Son of God rendered to the Father! He did not come to do His own will, but the will of Him that sent Him. He yielded Himself up to come under law to God, and to do the Father's will. Now in this respect we ought also to walk even as He walked. We have not come into the world to do what we like, to possess what we choose, or to say, "That is my notion, and therefore so shall it be." Sin promised freedom, and brought us bondage; grace now binds us, and insures us liberty.

Such a life would necessarily be one of great for the life of Jesus was intensely energetic. The life of Christ was as full as it could hold. After He had been developed and disciplined by thirty years of seclusion, He showed Himself among men as one moved to vehemence with love: "He was clad with zeal as with a cloak." From the day of His baptism till His death He went about doing good. It is wonderful what was packed into about three years: each action had a world of meaning within its own self, and there were thousands of such acts; each sermon was a complete revelation, and every day heard Him pour forth such sermons. His biography is made up of the essence of life. He not only had zeal burning at His heart, but, like a sheet of flame, it covered Him from head to foot. There is never an idle hour in the life of Christ. It is wonderful how He sustained the toil. Perhaps He measured out His zeal and His open industry by the fact that he was only to be for a short time here below. It might not be possible to others that they should do as much as He did in so short a space, because they are intended to live longer here, and must not destroy future usefulness by present indiscretion; but still, activity was the rule of our Master's existence. At it, always at it, altogether at it, spending and being spent for His Father; such was His mode of walking among men. Oh, friends, if we, indeed, are in Him, we ought also so to walk even as He walked! Wake up, you lazy ones!

Next, we ought to walk as Christ did in the matter of SELF-DENIAL.

Of course, in this work of self-denial we are not called to imitate Christ in offering up ourselves as a propitiatory sacrifice. That would be a vain intrusion into things which are His peculiar domain. The self-denials which we practice should be such as He prescribes us. There is a will-worship which is practiced in the Church of Rome of self-denials which are absurd, and must, I think, be hateful in the sight of God rather than pleasing to Him. Saint Bernard was a man whom I admire to the last degree, and I count him to be one of the Lord's choice ones; yet in the early part of his life there is no doubt that he lessened his powers of usefulness to a large extent by the emaciation which he endured, and the way in which he brought himself to death's door. At times he was incapable of activity by reason of the weakness which he had incurred through fasting, and cold, and exposure. There is no need to inflict useless torture upon the body. When did the Saviour thus behave Himself? Point me to a single mortification of a needless kind.

Enough self-denials come naturally in every Christian man's way to make him try whether he can deny himself in very deed for the Lord's sake. You are thus tested when you are put in positions where you might get gain by an unrighteous act, or win fame by withholding a truth, or earn love and honor by pandering to the passions of those about you. May you have grace enough to say, "No; it cannot be. I love not myself, but my Lord. I seek not myself, but Christ. I desire to propagate nothing but

His truth, and not my own ideas;" then will you have exhibited the self-denial of Jesus. These self-denials will sometimes be hard to flesh and blood.

And then in the Church of God to be able to give all your substance, to devote all your time, to lay out all your ability—this is to walk as Jesus walked. When weary and worn, still to be busy; to deny yourself things which may be allowable, but which if allowable to you would be dangerous to others—this also is like the Lord. Such self-denial as may be helpful to the weak you ought to practise. Think what Christ would do in such a case, and do it; and, whenever you can glorify Him by denying yourself, do it.

Another point in which we ought to imitate Christ most certainly is that of LOWLINESS.

I wish that all Christians did this. When I see some Christian women dressed out—well, like women of the world, though not with half a worldling's taste, and when I see men so big that they cannot speak to poor people, as if they were made of something better than ordinary flesh and blood; when I notice a haughty, high, hectoring disposition anywhere, it grates upon my feelings, and makes me wonder whether these blunderers hope to go to the heaven of the lowly. The Lord Jesus would never have been half as big as some of His followers are. What great folk some of His disciples are, as compared with Him! He was lowly, meek, gentle, a man who so loved the souls of others that He forgot Himself. You never detect in the Lord Jesus Christ any tendency toward pride or self-exaltation. Quite the reverse; He is ever compassionate and condescending to men of low estate.

And then note again another point, and that is His great and gentleness, and readiness to forgive. His dying words ought to ring in the ear of all who find it hard to pass by affronts, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Did He not set us an example of bearing and forbearing? "Who, when He was reviled, reviled not again." For every curse He gave a blessing. You cannot be Christians if this spirit of love is foreign to you. "Oh," say you, "we indorse the confession." I do not care. You must love your enemies, or you will die with the Creed in your throats. "Oh," say you, "we are regular in our pews, hearing the Gospel." I do not care; you must forgive them that trespass against you, or you will go from your pews to perdition. "Oh, but we have been baptized, and we come to the communion." I do not care even about that; for unless you are made meek and lowly in heart you will not find rest unto your souls. Pride goeth not before salvation, but before destruction; and a haughty spirit is no prophecy of elevation, but the herald of a fall. Take care, take care, you that say that you are in Christ; you ought also to walk in all the lowliness and in all the tenderness of Christ, or else at the end you will be discovered to be none of His. Hard, cruel, unrelenting, iron-hearted professors will no more go to heaven than the hogs they fatten.

There is one little big word which tells us more than all this about how Christ walked, and that is the word

"LOVE."

Jesus was incarnate love. "God is love," but God is a spirit, therefore if you wish to see love embodied, look at Christ. He loves the little children, and suffers them to come to Him. He loves the widow, and He is tender to her, and raises her dead son. He loves the sinners, and they draw near to Him. He loves all sinful and tempted and tried ones, and therefore He comes to seek and to save. He loves the Father first, and then for the Father's sake He loves the myriads of men. Do you love nobody? Do you live within yourself? Are you immured within your own ribs? Is self all your world? Then you will go to hell. There is no help for it; for the place of unloving spirits is the bottomless pit. Only he that loves can live in heaven, for heaven is love: and you cannot go to glory unless you have learned to love, and to find it your very life to do good to those about you.

And, then, think of His delight in God. How wonderful was Christ's delight in His God! I can never think of His life as an unhappy one. He was, it is true, "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief;" but still there was a deep spring of wondrous happiness in the midst of His heart, which made Him always blessed; for He said to His Father, "I delight to do Thy will, O My God! Yea, Thy law is within My heart." He delighted in God. And you and I also must delight in God. This charming duty is far too much neglected. Strange that this honey should so seldom be in men's mouths! Oh, brethren, let us find our pleasure, our treasure, our heaven, our all, in the Lord our God, even as our Lord Jesus did. In this thing let us walk even as He walked.

In a word, Christ lived above this world; let us walk as He walked. Christ lived for God, and for God alone; let us live after His fashion. And Christ persevered in such living; He never turned aside from it at all; but as He lived so He died, still serving His God, obedient to His Father's will, even unto death. May our lives be a mosaic of perfect obedience, and our deaths the completion of the fair design. From our Bethlehem to our Gethsemane may our walk run parallel with the pathway of the Well-beloved! Oh, Holy Spirit, work us to this sacred pattern!

III. I close now by saying, in the last place, consider, dear friends, to all this.

WHAT IS NEEDFUL

First, it is needful to have a nature like that of Christ. You cannot give out sweet waters so long as the fountains are impure. "Ye must be born again." That being done, the next thing that is necessary is a constant anointing of the Holy Spirit. Can any Christian here do without the Holy Spirit? Then I am afraid that he is no Christian. But, as for us, we feel every day that we must try for a fresh visitation of the Spirit, a renewed sense of indwelling, a fresh anointing from the Holy One of Israel, or else we cannot walk as Christ walked.

And then, again, there must be in us a strong resolve that we will walk as Christ walked; for our Lord Himself did not lead in that holy life without stern resolution. He set His face like a flint that He would do the right; and He did the right. Do not, I pray you, be led astray by thoughtlessly following your fellow-men: it is that running in crowds. Dare to be singular; dare to stand alone. Stand to it firmly that you will follow Christ.

And so, once again, I add that if we want to walk as Christ walked, we must have much communion with Him. We cannot possibly get to be like Christ except by being with Him. I wish that we could rise to be so much like the Saviour that we should resemble a certain ancient saint who died a martyr's death, to whom the world said, "What are you?" He said, "I am a Christian." They asked, "What trade do you follow?" And he said, "I am a Christian." They inquired, "What language do you speak?" And he said, "I am a Christian." "But what treasures have you?" said they; and he replied, "I am a Christian." They asked him what friends he had, and he said, "I am a Christian;" for all he was, and all he had, and all he wished to be, and all he hoped to be, were all wrapped up in Christ. If you live with Christ you will be absorbed by Him, and He will embrace the whole of your existence; and, in consequence, your walk will be like His.

Take care that you do not in all things copy any but Christ; for if I set my watch by the watch of one of my friends, and he sets his watch by that of another friend, we may all be wrong together. If we shall, each one, take his time from the sun, we shall all be right. There is nothing like going to the fountain-head. Take your lessons in holiness, not from a poor erring disciple, but from the infallible Master. God help you to do so.

A person has written to me this morning to say that he has painted my portrait, but that he cannot finish it until he sees me. I should think not. Certainly you cannot paint a portrait of Christ in your own life unless you see Him—see Him clearly, see Him continually. You may have a general notion of what Christ is like, and you may put a good deal of color into your copy; but I am sure you will fail unless you see the grand original. You must get to commune with Jesus. You know what we did when we went to school. Our schoolmasters were not quite so wise then as schoolmasters are now. They wrote at the top of the page a certain line for us to follow, and a poor following it was. When I wrote my first line I copied the writing-master's model, but when I wrote the next line of the top line; so that when I reached the bottom of the page I produced a copy of my copy of my copy of my copy of the top line. Thus my handwriting fed upon itself, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse. So one man copies Christ, perhaps; a friend who hears Him preach copies Him, and his wife at home copies the hearer, and somebody copies her; and so it goes on all down the line, till we all miss that glorious handwriting which Jesus has come to teach us. Keep your eye on Christ, dear brother. Never mind me; never mind your friend; never mind the old doctor that you have been hearing so long. Look to Jesus, and to Him alone. We have had our sects and our divisions all through that copying of the lines of the boys, instead of looking to the top line that the Master wrote. "He that saith he abideth in Him ought himself also so to walk even as He walked." May the Spirit of God cause us to do it! Amen and Amen.

HOW MARY BROWN WAS SAVED.

THE following story is narrated by a contributor to the Methodist:

Some years ago I was in a store in Sixth Avenue, New York, purchasing lace and ribbon. There was a very pretty young girl who served me. I noticed her more than usually attractive face and manner. I could not help thinking to myself how sad it was to see such a girl there, so young, so pretty, so unprotected. I wanted to get some lace like a collar I had brought with me.

She cut off the yard and a half of lace I had chosen and handed me my change and the parcel containing some muslin and my bit of lace. It was almost with a sensation of regret that I moved away. I went to another portion of the store to get some ribbon, and having found what I wanted, the parcel being returned from the desk, I bethought me to wrap that and the lace together, so that I should not have so many small articles to carry. Undoing my parcel, what was my surprise to find the muslin, but no lace with it. I unfolded the bundle, shook it out, looked over my dress, on the floor, under the counter, but it was nowhere to be seen. I went hastily to the girl, and told her that the lace was not in the paper she had given me. She knew nothing of it, save that she had handed it to me. Soon the foreman was attracted to ask what was the matter. Then came the owner of the store. He listened to my tale, and then, turning to the girl, said sternly, "Come with me, Miss Brown."

The poor girl's face was scarlet to her temples. Then he said politely to me, "Wait here, madam, a moment, if you please." It was but a few minutes when he came back and asked me to go upstairs. With a beating heart I followed him to a little off-room. There stood the girl, with her face between her hands, sobbing convulsively: the piece of lace lay upon the table.

Mr. —— went out, called away by some one who wanted to speak with him. I cannot express the pain I felt. I could not at first speak. The girl threw herself at my feet, clasping her hands. "Forgive me," she cried. "I forgive you," I said; "but why, my poor girl, did you take it?" "It looked so pretty, and I could hide it so easily, I yielded to the temptation."

She leaned against me as if she clung to me for protection, as if she needed love and kind words. "Where does your mother live?" I asked. "My mother is dead. Oh, she begged me so to be honest when she died!" and the girl looked up at me with streaming eyes. "Believe me, madam, it is the first time I ever took anything." "And your father?" "Oh, ma'am, he comes home drunk every night, so I ran away, and I came here to ask for a place, and they took me in, for I had been to school, and I knew how to keep accounts, and then the girls were good to me and helped me so I soon learned."

Just then the forbidding-looking storekeeper came back. He beckoned me out. "It's a bad case," he said; "It's partly my own fault. I ought not to have been taken in, but I was misled by her remarkably pleasant ways, and by her pretty, innocent-looking face." "But it is the first time," I pleaded. "There must always be a first time," he replied; "but these first times ruin the reputation of my store. You'll have to bear witness against her, madam." "That I will never do," I said. "Let her come home with me now; I will keep her." "The girl is 'prenticed to me for the next six months, and she's my property until her term expires."

The man's hardness was so repulsive to me that I was glad to hurry off. I determined to call the next day, when, perhaps, I might again speak to the girl alone. I went home sorrowful enough. I was engaged out in the evening, but I could not wear my lace. Its recollection was too sad. The following morning I called early at the store. I made a pretext first of buying something, but my eyes searched eagerly for the girl; she was not there. With reluctance I went to the desk, and inquired for Mr.——. He was out. Then I bethought me of Mary's name, and I asked for Miss Brown.

The man was apparently deep in accounts; he did not raise his head to look at me, but answered carelessly, "She's at the Island by this time."

At the Island! My heart leaped into my throat. How fearful—at the House of Refuge! Oh, my poor girl! In a moment I had determined to follow her, and see what I could do for her. I soon landed in front of the great House of Refuge! I had not provided myself with a pass, but I spoke so imploringly that they allowed me to enter. I was shown over the establishment as a visitor; I looked eagerly for Mary Brown, and yet I dreaded seeing her. At length I mentioned her name. Yes, they knew her: her pretty face and sweet ways had marked her here too. They showed me the narrow cell where she was locked in at night: then I followed on upstairs to the workroom—whizz, whirr, went the machinery, and every one of those industrial girls and women who guided it had committed some fault that barred them away from free intercourse with their fellow-beings. I shuddered, and felt that perhaps the only difference between us was that, in the great goodness of God, I had been guarded from the sorrow of temptation and sin.

Soon I saw Mary. It was not difficult to pick her out. She was diligently sewing on her machine, so absorbed that she did not see me. I approached her; she looked up, her face was dyed crimson, her hands trembled. "Mary," I said, "I came to see after you." "How kind!" she said, in a faltering voice. "Would you like to come with me, Mary?" I spoke in a low voice. "Oh, ma'am," she answered, "I can't; I've got to work my time out!" "How long Mary?" "Six months, ma'am. If I work well and do my duty I'll be free then." "And you will do your duty, Mary?" "Oh, yes, ma'am. It was well I was found out so soon," she said, bursting into tears. "It will be a lesson I shall never forget."

"God help you, my child! In six months from the day you entered I shall be here for you; do not forget that. You may depend upon me." The poor girl could not speak her gratitude. I left and returned to my happy home, more grateful than I had ever been for its blessings.

Six months passed, as they pass for us all, whether in pain or pleasure, in a prison or a palace.

I was again at the Island. I found Mary awaiting me with eager, anxious face. I brought her home—to my country home. No one knew of her story—not even my husband. I wished her to start on the fair ground of self-respect. Mary was to be my maid, to sew for me, to wait on me, but soon she became maid-of-all-work. She showed herself most willing, kind, and skilful in everything she undertook. We had a great deal of company that summer, and I became so dependent upon Mary that, little by little, I let many of my duties slide into her hand. At first I would give her the keys of the storeroom, which she was to return to me, until gradually I left the keys entirely with her; and she was intrusted with the cares of housekeeper as well as those of maid.

Three years passed — years in which my respect and affection for Mary always increased. One day a farmer—a well-to-do farmer from the far West—came to the North, and, fortunately for her, unfortunately for me, he met my faithful girl. He paid her his court, and then came to ask her hand of me. When I told Mary his wish, she confessed her affection for him, but with much emotion she told me she would never marry him until he first knew of her fault. I reasoned with her that it might not be wise—that she had long since redeemed her life. Her only reply was that he must know it and choose for himself. So I told him as much of Mary's life as I knew, but he only loved her better for her loyalty. Mary left us, and went with her husband far West. When she was leaving me she said, choked with tears, "You saved me! Some day you must write my story. It may be a help to keep some girl from crime."

I have written my Mary's story, only I have changed her name.

A WOMAN SAVES A RAILWAY TRAIN.

(See Illustration on this page.)

A WOMAN'S energy saved a large number of lives in New Hampshire, U. S., on June 14th. She had occasion to cross the Nashua and Rochester Railroad near Nashua about noon on that day, and was startled at seeing a large pile of timber laid across the line. She knew that a passenger train would be due in a short time at the spot, and quickly realized that some wicked men had placed the obstruction there with the design of wrecking the train. She looked around for a man to remove the timber, but in vain, and she calculated that before she could give an alarm at the station and the company could send a gang to clear the line, the train would have arrived. It was evident that she alone could save the train. She did not hesitate, but commenced the arduous task of removing the timber, and had the satisfaction of dragging the last piece off the line just as the train was coming into sight. It was a noble act for a woman to perform; it was a type of the work that has been done in the moral and spiritual world in which gigantic obstructions, such as strong drink, and other temptations to sin and infamy, have often been overthrown by apparently inadequate agency. "Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called: but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty" (1 Cor. 1: 26–29.)

THE FISHERMAN'S LOST CHILD.

(See Illustration.)

"LOST! lost! a child lost." The distressing cry went through a fishing village on the North Atlantic coast. There is no cry that so powerfully moves those who have children of their own. It is a trouble that more than any other makes all men brothers, and draws together every woman whose maternal love is strong and warm.

"Whose child is it?" was asked eagerly by a score of voices, and hurrying men and women replied as they hastened to join in the search. "George Fraser's little Freddie."

"Dear, dear!" said a matronly woman with four little children around her knee. "Little Freddie; why he is not two years old. Where can he be? And his mother sick and his father's out in his boat, and there's only Kitty to do anything. Will, Will," she called at the top of her voice to her husband at work in their garden, "George Fraser's little boy is lost, do go and help them search for him."

"Was lost and is found."

Will started with the other villagers to look for the tiny wanderer, who could but just toddle unsteadily along, and usually performed his locomotion in quadruped fashion.

The search was unavailing. It covered but a small area around the cottage, for it was not thought possible that the little mite could have travelled far. Every bush, every cluster of rocks was carefully examined, but no trace of him could be seen. The tide was coming in, and alarm increased. He might have laid himself down to sleep somewhere, and the cruel waters would carry him away. George Fraser's boat, too, could be seen coming in, and Kitty was not the only one who trembled at the thought of the strong man's distress at the loss of his treasured child.

Her father must have landed by this time. The thought came upon her as she stood there, and moved, partly by a desire to meet her trouble and partly by the hope that father could do something, she walked toward the place where he moored his boat about a mile away. Her tears fell fast as she trod the path she had gone over the day before with Freddie in her arms. She looked anxiously toward the point at which she knew she would first see her father, and there he was, coming slowly homeward.

But what was he carrying? Kitty strained her eager eyes, and to her intense delight saw Freddie safe in his father's arms. With a cry of joy she ran to meet them, and flinging her arms around her father's neck laughed and wept and kissed him by turns.

"Why, lassie," George said, "what ails you? How came you to let the little laddie come so far away? I found him sitting close by the logs where I tied the boat, just where he was yesterday when I went away. I could scarcely believe my eyes."

Then Kitty told him all, and the father's heart almost stood still while he listened. Kitty relieved her father of his lantern and rubber coat, and while the fisherman carried his boy in his arms they wended their way to the cottage, while the unconscious cause of all the trouble laughed and prattled as Kitty scolded him, and he waved her red necktie around his head triumphantly from his elevation. It appeared that being left alone when Kitty went to her mother, he had crawled along the path his father travelled to his boat, with the childish idea that he would find him there, and must have escaped many dangers on his way to the place where the father found him. There was more joy that night in the fisherman's cottage than if Freddie had not been lost and found that day. When Freddie was comfortably sleeping in his little cot, George Fraser opened his old Bible and read the fifteenth chapter of Luke; the little family needed no commentator to explain it to them.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Sin and a Shame.

IT was May again; a soft, sunny day, with spring showers falling, or gathering in glistening clouds in the blue sky. The bells chimed for morning service, as the people came up to church from the old-fashioned streets.

Mr. Chantrey read the service in a clear, steady voice, but with a tone of trouble in it which only a very dull ear could have missed. When he ascended his pulpit, and looked down with sad and sunken eyes upon his people, every face was lifted up to him attentively, as he gave out the text, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Mrs. Bolton moved uneasily in her pew, for she knew he was going to preach a disagreeable sermon. It was not as eloquent as many of his old ones, but it had a hundredfold more power.

His hearers had often been pleased and touched before; now they were stirred, and made uncomfortable. Their responsibilities, as each one the keeper of his brother's soul, were solemnly laid before them. The listless, contented indifference to the sins and sorrows of their fellowmen was rudely shaken. Their satisfaction in their own safety was attacked. As clearly as words could put it, they were told that not one of them could go to heaven alone; that there was no solitary path of salvation for any foot to tread. As long as any fell because of temptation, they were bound, as far as in them lay, to remove every kind of temptation. If each one was not careful to be his brother's keeper, then the voice of their brother's blood would cry unto God against them. There was scarcely a person present who could listen to their rector's sermon with feelings of self-satisfaction.

He left his pulpit at the close of it, troubled and exhausted. His little son followed him into the vestry to wait until the congregation, that loved to linger a little about the porch, should have dispersed. But hardly had he entered than, looking out, as it was his wont to do upon the grave of his other child, he saw a figure stretched across it, asleep. Could it possibly be his wife? Large drops of rain were beginning to fall upon her upturned face, but they did not rouse her from her heavy slumber; nor did the noise of many feet passing by along the churchyard path. It was a moment of unutterable shame and agony to him. His people saw her; they had heard of his trouble before, but now they saw it; and they were lingering to look at her. He must go out in the midst of them all, and they must see him take his miserable wife home.

Those who were there that day will never forget the sight. His people made way for him, as he passed among them, still in the gown he had worn while preaching, with a rigid and wan face, and eyes that seemed blind to every object except the unhappy woman he could not save. His little boy was pressing close behind him, but he bade him go back into the church, and wait until he came for him. Then he knelt down beside his wife in the falling rain, and lifted her gently, calling her by her name, "Sophy! Sophy!" But her heavy head fell back again upon the grave, and he was not strong enough to raise her from it. He burst into tears, a passion of tears; such as men only weep in hours of extreme anguish of mind. Slowly his people melted away, helpless to do anything for him; except two or three of his most familiar friends, who stayed to assist him in taking the wretched wife back to her home.

Ann Holland lingered unseen in the porch until all were out of sight. The child she loved so fondly was standing with the great door ajar, holding it with his small hand, and peeping out now and then. She called to him when all were gone, and he came out of the church gladly, yet with an air of concern on his round, rosy face.

"My mother is ill, very ill," he said, putting his hand into hers. "I saw her lying on baby's grave. Couldn't anything be done for her to make her well? Isn't there any doctor clever enough to cure her?"

"I don't know, dear," answered Ann Holland.

"My father never lets me go to see her when she's worst," he went on; "only Sarah goes into her room, and him. She talks and laughs often, and yet my father says she is ill. When I am a man I shall be a doctor, and learn how to make her well. But it will be a long time before I am clever enough for that, I'm afraid. My father says she's too ill for anybody to come to see us; isn't it a pity?"

"Yes, my dear," she answered.

"She can never hear me say my hymns now," he said; "and when she's not so ill that my father won't let me see her, she sits crying, crying ever so; and if I want to play with her, or read to her, she can't bear it, she says. I should think there ought to be somebody to cure her, if we could only find out. My father scarcely ever laughs now, because she's so ill; and when he plays with me he only looks sad, and he speaks in a quiet voice as if it would make her worse. Do try, Miss Holland, and ask everybody that comes to your house if they don't know of some very, very clever doctor for my mother."

"I will try," she said. "I'll do all I can. But you may run home now, Master Charlie. See! There's your father coming back for you."

"I know I sha'n't see my mother again today," he answered; "good-by, and remember, please."

She watched him running across the little meadow to his father; and then she turned away, and walked slowly through the street homeward. Little knots of the townspeople lingered still about the doorways, discussing their rector's troubles. Though most of them greeted her, anxious to hear her opinion as one who was considered on friendly terms with the rector's family, she evaded their questionings, and passed on to the solitude of her own dwelling. It had been solitary now for some days, for her brother had disappeared early in the week; having stripped the house of money, and set off on one of his vagrant tramps, of which she knew nothing except that he always returned penniless, and generally with the good clothes she provided for him exchanged for worthless rags.

How many years it was that her life had been embittered by his drunkenness she could hardly reckon, so many had they been. These strange absences of his had at first been a severe trial to her; but of late years they had been a holiday time of rest, except for the continual anxiety she felt on his behalf. Her quaint and quiet kitchen, as she unlocked the door and entered it, seemed a haven of refuge, where she could indulge in the tears she had kept under control till now. The love she felt for Mr. Chantrey was so deep and true, that any sorrow of his must have grieved her. But she knew so well what this sorrow was! She knew through what long years it might last; and how hopeless it might grow before the end came. Looking back upon her own blighted life, she could foresee for him only a weary, miserable, ever-deepening wretchedness.

The Sunday afternoon passed by slowly, and the evening came. The soft sunshine and spring showers of the morning were gone; and a sullen sweep of rain, driven by the east wind, was beating through the streets. A neighbor looked in to say she had seen the curate from the next parish pass through the town toward the church; and she thought Mr. Chantrey would very likely not be there. But Ann Holland had already decided not to go.

At any moment she might hear her brother's shambling step draw near the door, and his fingers fumbling at the latch. She could not bear the neighbors to see him when he came off one of his vagabond tramps, dirty and ragged as he usually was. She must stay at home again for him; again, as she had done hundreds of times, mourning pitifully over him, and ready to receive him patiently, impenitent as he was. She went up stairs to make his bed quite ready for him; and to put out of his way everything that could by any chance hurt him, if he should stumble and fall in his drunken weakness. When she returned to the kitchen, she lighted a candle, and opened the old family Bible, with its large type, which seemed to her a more sacred book than the little one she used daily. But she could not read: the words passed vaguely and without meaning beneath her eyes. Her mind was full of the thought of her unhappy brother, and Mr. Chantrey's miserable wife.

It was past her usual hour of going to bed before she made up the kitchen fire to be in readiness, lest her brother should knock her up at any hour during the night. At the last moment she opened the street-door, and stood listening for a little while, as she always did when he was not at home. The rain was still sweeping through the street, which was as silent as if the town had been deserted. The gas-lights in the lamps flickered with the wind, and lit up the pools and channels of water running down the pavements.

But just as she turned to go in, her quick ear caught the sound of distant footsteps, growing louder as they came in her direction. It was the tramp of several feet, marching slowly like those of persons bearing a heavy burden. She waited to see who and what it could be so late this Sunday night; and soon, under the flickering lamps, she caught sight of several men, carrying among them a hurdle, with a shapeless heap upon it. A sudden, vague panic seized her, and she hastily retreated inside her house, shutting and barring the door. She said to herself she did not wish to see what they were carrying past. But were they going past? She heard them still, tramping slowly on toward her house; would they pass by with their burden? She put down the light, for her hand trembled too much to hold it; and she stood listening, her ears quickened for every sound, and her white face turned toward the closed and fastened door.

A knock came upon it, which almost caused her to shriek aloud. Yet it was a quiet rap, and a neighbor's voice answered as she asked tremulously who was there. She hastened to open the door, so welcome was the sound of the well-known voice; but there, opposite to her, in the driving rain, rested the hurdle, with the confused mass lying huddled together upon it. The men who bore it were silent, standing with their faces turned toward her; all of them strangers, except the one neighbor, who was on her threshold.

"They found him lying out in the fields near the Woodhouse farm," said her neighbor, in a loud whisper; "he'd strayed there, we reckon."

"Is he dead?" she asked mechanically.

"Not dead, bless your heart! no!" was the answer; "we'll carry him in. There now! Don't take on. There's a special providence over folks like him; they never come to much harm, you know. Show us where to lay him."

Ann Holland made way for the men to pass her, as they carried their burden into the quiet, pleasant kitchen. She followed with the light, and looked down upon him; her brother, who had played with her, and learned the same lessons, when they were innocent little children together. His gray hair was matted, and his bloated face smeared with dust and damp. He was barefooted and bareheaded. But as she gazed down upon him, and listened to his heavy struggle for breath, she cried in a tone of terror, "He is dying."

An hour later the house was comparatively quiet again. A doctor had been, and said nothing could be done for Richard Holland, except to let him die where he was, undisturbed. The men who had carried him home had dispersed or had adjourned to the Upton Arms to drink and to talk over this close of a drunkard's life. The news had in some way reached the Rectory; and now only Mr. Chantrey and Ann Holland watched beside him. They had laid him, as he was, on the little white-covered sofa in the parlor, never so soiled before.

Mr. Chantrey sat gazing at the degraded, dying man. No deeper debasement could come to any human being; almost the likeness of a human being had been lost. The mire and slough of the ditch into which he had fallen still clung to him; for only his face had been hastily washed clean by his sister's hand; a face that had forfeited all intelligence and seemliness; a coarse, squalid, disfigured face. Yet Ann was not repulsed by it; her tears fell upon it; and once she had bent over it, and kissed it gently. Now and then she put her mouth close to the deafened ear, and spoke to him, calling him by fond names, and imploring him to give some sign that he heard, and knew her. But there was no sign. The heavy breathing grew more thick and labored, yet feebler as the time passed slowly on. David Chantrey marvelled at the poor sister's patience and tenderness.

"Don't trouble to stay with me, sir," she said, at last. "I thought perhaps he'd come to himself, and you'd say a word to him. But there's no hope of that now."

"No," he answered, "I will not go, Ann," and his voice trembled with dread. "Do you think my wife could ever be as bad as this?"

"God forbid!" she cried earnestly. "God keep her from it! Oh! if she could but see; if she could but know! But he wasn't always like this. He was a kind, good-natured, clever man once. It's drinking that's ruined him."

"I will stay with you to the end," said Mr. Chantrey; "it is fit for me. You are teaching me a lesson of patience, Ann. All this day I have been thinking if it would be possible for me to give up my wife, and send her away from me, to end her days apart from mine. I have been in despair; in the very deeps. But now, why! even if I knew she would die thus, I cannot forsake her."

"Ay! we must have patience," she answered. "I always hoped to win him back again, but it was too strong for him and me. God knows how he's been tempted on all hands; even those that call themselves religious, and go to church regular as can be. He used to cry to me sometimes, and promise to turn over a new leaf; and then somebody perhaps that he looked up to would treat him at the Upton Arms. He might have been a good man, if he'd been left alone."

"Let us pray together for him and ourselves," said Mr. Chantrey, kneeling down once again by the little couch, as he had knelt the night of his return home. Ann still held her brother's head upon her arm, and her bowed face nearly rested upon it. But all words failed David Chantrey. "Father!" he cried, "Father!" There was nothing more that he could say. It was the single, despairing call of a soul that was full of trouble; that was "laid in the lowest pit, in darkness, in the deeps." But the bewildered brain of the dying man caught the cry, and he muttered: "Father! father! where is he?"

"It's God, our Father who art in heaven," said Ann Holland, uttering the words very slowly and distinctly in his ear; "try to think of Him, and pray to Him. He'll hear you, even now."

"Father!" he muttered again, "why! he'd be ashamed of his boy."

"It's God," she said, keeping down her sobs, "you've no other father. Think of Him: God, who loves you."

"He'd be ashamed of me," repeated the dying man.

For a minute or two he kept on whispering to himself words they could not hear, except the one word "shame." Then all was still. The miserable end had come; and neither love nor patience could avail him anything on this side the grave. He had gone as a drunkard into the presence of his Judge.

(To be continued.)

DEATH OF SAMSON.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 2, Judges 16: 21-31; Golden Text, Ps. 68: 35. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Source of all Strength—Samson's Power in Faith, not Muscle—The Duty of Communion—Turning Light into Life—The Reasoning of Manoah's Wife—Samson's Moral Weakness—His Indignation against His Enemies—Failure of the Attempt to Bind Him—The Water from the Rejected Instrument—His Connection with Delilah—On Dangerous Ground—The Secret Told—His Epitaph.

"THE God of Israel is He that giveth strength and power unto His people." Our golden text thus attributes all strength to God, whether physical strength as in the case of Samson, military strength as in Gideon's case, or spiritual strength in the conquest of temptation, in the endurance of trial and in the carrying on of work for God, as in the case of the Apostle Paul. Ascribe ye strength unto God, says David in the same Psalm, and in this confidence, he of all Israel volunteers to meet the giant champion of the Philistines, himself at the time a mere stripling. "Sing aloud unto was one of the songs of Israel.

We are about to consider something of the history of Samson, the strongest man that ever lived, not because he was muscularly more developed than another, for when the Lord departed from him he was as weak as any other man, but because he was a man who by faith took in and exercised the strength of God. Before his birth, the children of Israel had again done evil in the sight of the Lord, and "the Lord delivered them into the hands of the Philistines forty years." But oh how true it is of our God that in wrath He remembers mercy. While the bondage was becoming continually more severe, the deliverer was being prepared just about the beginning of the time when the Philistines ruled over them. The angel of the Lord appeared to the wife of Manoah, of the family of Dan, and told her she should bear a son, contrary to all human probability. The angel warned her to drink no wine nor strong drink, for her son should be a Nazarite unto God from the womb; and said, "he shall begin to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines."

It is very evident that Manoah and his wife were believers, and in the habit of communing with God. This appears from their conversation together after the angel had appeared unto the woman. Probably they had grieved over the idolatry of their country, and had cried to God to send deliverance. Manoah entreated the Lord for a repetition of the vision, that he and his wife might be further instructed. Would to God every one who gets a message from Him, either through the reading of His Word, in converse with other Christians, or any other way, would always commune with the Lord about it. Too often the steps which we gain in light fail to become steps in life and experience, simply because we rest in the light, instead of carrying it to God, that He may knowledge into experience. The Lord graciously granted Manoah's request, and repeated his injunctions.

Manoah's wife seems to have had more spiritual perception than her husband; she saw the angel's face "like the countenance of an angel of God, very terrible." Manoah asked his name, and "knew not that he was an angel of the Lord." The angel refused to eat of Manoah's bread, but consented that he should offer a burnt-offering unto the Lord, but when the angel ascended in the flame of the altar, Manoah's conclusion was, "We shall surely die, because we have seen God." But his wife said unto him, "If the Lord were pleased to kill us, He would not have received a burnt-offering and a meat-offering at our hands, neither would He have shewed us all these things, nor would as at this time have told us such things as these." Well may we believe that this good mother was much in communion with God about her boy, and that his strong faith in God was nurtured in his early home. We are told of his boy life, "The child grew, and the Lord blessed him. And the Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times in the camp of Dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol."

God always meets faith, in whatsoever manner it is exercised by His children. Had Samson trusted God for moral strength as he did for physical, his history would have been very different; we should not have seen him overcome by a woman's tears, while at the same time he was irresistible in strength to the Philistine enemies of his country. It was a sore trial to his parents when Samson chose it was contrary to the law of God, who said, "Neither shalt thou make marriages with them; thy daughter thou shalt not give unto his son, nor his daughter shalt thou take unto thy son." This must have been a special trial to Samson's mother. Knowing that God had called him to deliver Israel from the Philistine yoke, she would so long that her son might be consistent as a witness for his God. But while God did not approve, he permitted the marriage festivities to take place, He all the time overruling.

As far as the history goes, it would seem as though Samson's parents had far more real care for the glory of God than he, but Samson had an all-conquering faith. When a young lion roared against him, the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and in that strength of God, without any weapon, he tore the lion as he would have rent a kid. Yet his moral weakness is only too apparent; he did not discover the selfishness and treachery of his Philistine wife, who wept before him, urging him to tell her the secret of the riddle which he had proposed to the children of her people, until, overcome by her, he told her the riddle, which she at once disclosed. This roused his indignation, and when his wife was given to another, his wrath was so great against the Philistines that he destroyed their standing corn by sending into it three hundred foxes, in couples, with firebrands tied to the tails. And in addition to this, with his own hand he smote the Philistines with a great slaughter. But the Philistines, being masters of Israel at this time, demanded that Samson be delivered to them. Three thousand men of Judah came to bind him, and he allowed them to do it with one restriction: they were not to fall on him themselves; he knew that the strength which he claimed and obtained of God was powerless against Israel, that it could be used

i.e., against the Philistines. A mighty shout rang through the Philistine camp when Samson appeared, bound with two new cords. But a power unknown to the Philistines was present. "The Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and The cords that were upon his arms became as flax that was burned with fire, and his bands were melted [see margin] from off his hands."

Hardly had the Philistines recovered their surprise, when the hands set free by God were engaged in slaying them with no better a weapon than the jawbone of an ass. One thousand men fell before him, and at the end of the conflict he remained with no further harm than a burning thirst. But the man of faith looked to the Lord to relieve him: "he called on the Lord, and said, Thou hast given this great deliverance into the hand of Thy servant; and now shall I die for thirst, and fall into the hand of the uncircumcised?" Samson thought little of the poor weapon which he had used, but God chose it to refresh him when thirst so overpowered him. God clave a hollow place in that very jawbone which he had thrown away, and there came water thereout; and when he had drunk, his spirit came again, and he revived." What a lesson to us that we should not cast away as useless the meanest thing which God uses.

Samson's name means solar or sunny, and many things in his history would lead us to think he was a merry, thoughtless, rash, hair-brained young man, yet possessed of marvellous faith on the one point of strength. A holy man he was not. His errand to Gaza is not to his credit; but when the Philistines made sure of taking him captive, God shewed that His leave must be obtained even in the case of one of the most unsatisfactory and inconsistent of His children, and so He gave Samson strength to take the doors of the gate of the city, with the posts and bar, and carry them up to the top of a hill; probably the Philistines were too electrified to follow.

But God, although bearing long with Samson, could not ignore the sins of his child, or fail to visit them with judgment. In some way he became connected with Delilah, of whom we do not hear whether she was a Philistine or a woman of Israel; in any case she was treacherous and heartless, making Samson her dupe that she might enrich herself. Samson had never given up his will to God; he sought his own ends, and most terrible was the judgment which came upon him through the unprincipled woman, who was doing the same thing with regard to him. The lords of the Philistines offered her a magnificent bribe, eleven hundred pieces of silver from each of them, if she would entice him, to say wherein his great strength lay. Three times Samson deceived her, and proposed tests of his strength, against all of which he was found proof. But Samson was he was now making use of the gift of God for his own vainglory, and this laid him open to his fall. At last, "when she pressed him daily with her words, and urged him, so that his soul was vexed unto death, that he told her all his heart." This was desecration; the secret was God's, it was nothing personal: "I have been a Nazarite to God from my mother's womb; if I be shaven, then my strength will go from me, and I shall become weak, and be like any other man." His strength lay in his relation to God. But Delilah saw she had discovered his secret, and called in the lords of the Philistines. Samson was asleep, and when Delilah cried, "The Philistines be upon thee, Samson," he said, "I will go out as at other times before, and shake myself. And that the Lord was departed from him." Oh, how great was his fall! his eyes put out, himself bound with fetters of brass, grinding in a Philistine prison! Here he had time to think of his sin and folly, and to return unto the Lord.

His enemies assembled at a feast to rejoice and praise their gods that Samson had come into their hands, and Samson was sent for to make them sport. Once more he cried to the Lord. The house of Dagon was crowded with idol worshippers, three thousand people upon the roof, who beheld while Samson made sport. He requested the lad who led him to let him feel the pillars on which the house stood. Then he prayed, and said, "O Lord God, remember me, I pray Thee, and strengthen me, I pray Thee, only this once, O God that I may be at once avenged of the Philistines for my two eyes." With one more cry, "Let me die with the Philistines," he leaned, in the strength of God, upon the two middle pillars of the house, and down it came in a mighty crash, crushing thousands of the Philistines. He was ready to sacrifice himself in fulfilling his vocation, the destruction of the Philistines, but the most commendatory words which the history says about him are these: "So the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life." So ended the life of a man of faith, whose works were not right before God.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Republican Outbreak in Spain Appears to have been of a more formidable character than was at first supposed. Its ebullition was premature, and therefore was more easily suppressed than it would have been had the insurgents waited until the various sections were organized. It is stated that the organization was on the same lines as the Russian secret societies, each district forming a distinct circle, whose members did not know each other, but received instructions from their local chief. Each affiliated member had a number. Above the local chiefs of the movement were generally half-pay officers, discontented, unattached inferior officers, and sergeants in almost every corps. The local groups and chiefs only communicated by roving agents sent from juntas in Madrid or the great towns and corresponding with Ruiz Zorrilla. Parallel with the military conspiracy was the civilian propaganda of veteran Intransigente republicans, who were at Badajos, ready to take over from the military when successful the management of the towns. The plot was well contrived, as the leaders escaped detection, and the men captured could give information only as to local arrangements. Four sergeants who were arrested were tried by court-martial and shot.

The Difficulty between England and France respecting the Madagascar affair has not yet been arranged, and newspaper correspondents in both countries report an excited and irritated condition of the public mind in respect to it. English journals, especially the London Standard, are urging the government to insist on an apology from France, and the indignation is becoming so strong that the Foreign Office has refrained from publishing the later despatches. The Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs said in the House of Commons, in reply to a question, that the government was aware that Mr. Shaw, an English missionary in Madagascar, had been imprisoned by the French, but had received no definite news as to the charge against him. It appeared, however, that Admiral Pierre, the French commander, held him to be guilty of what was considered a serious offence. The government, said the Under Secretary, would communicate with France on the subject of the arrest of Mr. Shaw. Public feeling is further excited by the intimation, on the part of France, that it may be necessary to blockade Chinese ports unless concessions are made at Pekin. The attitude of the French Government in both Madagascar and the East is tending to isolate her in Europe.

A New Canal Project Which, if Carried Out, will tend to concentrate attention on the Holy Land and attract Jewish merchants thither is under discussion. The Sultan has received very favorably the suggestions of an English company for cutting a ship canal from the Mediterranean by the valley of the Jordan to the Red Sea. The execution of the project would render the Porte independent of the Suez Canal and be very important in regard to the Sultan's eastern dominions.

Irish Obstruction has again been Organized in the British Parliament. On Thursday, the Irish members continued dividing the House and speaking against time throughout the night, and the House did not adjourn until six o'clock on Friday morning. Mr. Parnell and Mr. Healy used language more violent than has been heard in late years within the walls of Parliament. Mr. Parnell threatened that unless the deficiencies of the Land act were speedily remedied he would lead a deeper and more desperate agitation than any that had yet been witnessed. The act, he said, had been applied with a slowness and inefficiency very different from the way in which the Coercion act had been applied. Notwithstanding this assertion, it is matter of fact that under the Land act there has been a reduction made in the rents of the holdings aggregating $20,000,000, and landlords have voluntarily made reductions which raise the figure to $40,000,000. The government are proceeding with marvellous patience with Irish reforms in spite of the ingratitude of Parnell and his colleagues, and has introduced a bill granting a guarantee for $5,000,000 for laying a rail track through Western Ireland, and $250,000 to assist poor tenants to move from one part of Ireland to another and a like sum to aid those who desire to emigrate.

A Plan to Facilitate Emigration from Ireland on a wholesale scale is under the consideration of the British Government. A despatch to the New York Graphic from London describing the scheme says all the details are not yet ready to place before the public, but it has been decided to move from Ireland and settle in Canada 200,000 poor Irish, in families. Ten thousand families, to average five persons each, aggregating 50,000 people, will be moved next spring, and the transportation will be continued as rapidly as the territory to be occupied can be got ready. Those to be moved next spring will, it is understood, be placed upon the lands offered by Chairman Stephens, which the Government will accept. These lands will be divided into sections of one hundred acres each, each section to be provided with all the buildings, equipments, animals, seed, and food necessary for beginning farming upon unbroken land. Each settler will be given his homestead free for the first three years, and after that will be required to pay as rent three per cent upon $500, but may at any time acquire absolute title upon payment of the latter sum. It has not been decided where the second 50,000 emigrants will be located. A public meeting in support of the project was held in London on Friday last, under the presidency of the Earl of Shaftesbury, at which the Archbishop of Canterbury earnestly advocated the proposed emigration.

The Bankruptcy Bill, Prepared by Mr. Chamberlain, the Radical member of the British Cabinet, has been adopted by the House of Commons. It completely revolutionizes the mode of procedure in Great Britain, and will be a new departure in dealing with this extremely difficult subject, which puzzles statesmen in every land. Mr. Chamberlain's plan, which will doubtless in its working be closely watched by statesmen on this side the Atlantic, is a compromise between officialism and private management. Under the new system the creditors get control of the estate while the court alone deals with the debtor. There can now be no private arrangements. Every debtor who fails must go into bankruptcy, from which he can only emerge after the strictest scrutiny into his conduct and dealings in the court. Another alteration is that when a seizure is made by the sheriff, goods to the value of $100 shall be left to the debtor. This will prevent the cruelties now practised, by which the debtor is often stripped of everything he possesses except the clothing he wears.

Sir Moses Montefiore, the Eminent Jewish philanthropist, has sent to each of the ten Jews who were tried in Hungary and acquitted of the charge of murdering a Christian girl, a letter of sympathy and congratulation. The venerable philanthropist also enclosed in each letter the sum of $250 toward recouping their losses through the prosecution. There are indications now of a fresh outbreak of anti-Jewish disturbances in Russia, and the Jews there are filled with the deepest anxiety at the prospect of a new persecution, which threatens to be more serious than any they have endured in that country. The general design appears to be to deprive them of their commercial privileges under particularly odious and unjust conditions. So violent is the hostility toward the race that an English Jew representing a London merchant was summarily ejected from Russia, solely because he was a Jew, and in spite of the fact of his English citizenship.

A Small Difficulty between our Government and that of Turkey has arisen, owing to the ill-treatment of Dr. Calhoun, an American medical missionary, in Barbary. The Constantinople correspondent of the New York Herald gives the following account of the affair: "Dr. Calhoun has been for over a year quietly practising medicine, much to the grief of the native practitioners, who had hitherto been having everything their own way, until he was called to treat a young Turkish girl for erysipelas. Finding that nothing could stop the progress of the disease but the amputation of the limb affected, Dr. Calhoun, with the consent of the parents, did so, but the child died. His rivals immediately seized upon this circumstance as a pretext for driving him out of the place." This was done with some violence, and though, through the representation of our Minister, he was permitted to return to Barbary, he has not been allowed to resume his practice.

The Sheepskin Manuscript Discovered by Mr. Shapira, and for which he asked $5,000,000, is pronounced a forgery by the eminent scholars to whose examination it was submitted. Dr. Ginsburgh so declares it, and Dr. Newbauer, who is a famous expert, calls them forgeries by test of grammar and idiom. Professor Sayee, of Oxford, writes that if the fragments are genuine they must belong to the Moabite, not Jewish, Deuteronomy. He maintains it is absurd to suppose that sheepskin can have lasted 3000 years even if asphalted. Two pieces of the manuscripts are shown at the British Museum.

The Genuine Chara ter of the Christian Work in Madagascar was proved recently by the conduct of the Queen of that country, whose policy toward her enemies showed that her religion was no mere profession. After the bombardment of Tamatave by the French it became necessary that French subjects should be expelled her capital. When requested to sign the order, she replied: "We are Christians, and must remember at this trying time that we are so, and act as becomes Christians. They gave our friends at Majanga an hour. We will give them five days, and not a hair of their heads, remember, is to be harmed." When the French left they could not get bearers to take them to the coast, although they offered three times as much as the ordinary price, the men fearing that when they got to Tamatave they would not be allowed to return. But the Queen, through her Prime Minister, ordered bearers to take them at her own cost, and her orders were obeyed.

The Blue Ribbon Army in Africa is Enrolling recruits. Mr. and Mrs. Mountain are now laboring there in the cause of Gospel temperance. Mr. Mountain, in a letter recently received, says: "Of course our Gospel work forms the staple of our labor, but the Blue Ribbon Army is a most important adjunct to the preaching of the Gospel. I am sorry to say that the Army is as necessary here as elsewhere. It is very successful. In Graaf-Reinet, a town of about 5000 inhabitants, there are 1400 who wear the ribbon. This, however, has been our most successful field of labor. In other places we have had much encouragement. We are at present laboring at Fort Beaufort, on our way to Lovedale, King William's Town, and Queenstown. We expect to spend till next March in this portion of the country, going from place to place as the Lord directs, and then we propose proceeding to Natal, whence several invitations have reached us. After that we hope to return to Cape Town for a number of missions in the Western Province. Should health permit, it is our purpose then to proceed to New Zealand in furtherance of our Evangelistic and Temperance work.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, this week, publishes the portrait of a man who for several years has occupied a prominent position in the world's attention. His great achievement, the construction of the Suez Canal, has been the wonder of modern times as much as the great means of facilitating travel. This latter advantage is of immense importance, and it has been diligently sought in numberless ways by this generation, which, beyond all that have preceded it, has been eager to move from place to place with ease and rapidity. Prophetic students have noticed this characteristic, and have seen in it one among many signs that we are living in that age of the world which will close this dispensation. Daniel 12 : 4 distinctly names this characteristic as one of many by which we may recognize that age, and prepare for the events near at hand.

During the last few weeks renewed attention has been given, both among politicians and shipowners, and others interested in maritime traffic, to the terms of a proposed agreement between the British Government and the Suez Canal Company, represented by its president, M. Ferdinand de Lesseps, for the construction of a second canal or waterway alongside the existing canal, to be aided by an advance of forty million dollars from the English Government. That agreement has fallen in abeyance, owing to the opposition of the British Parliament, which deemed the concessions granted to M. Lesseps and his colleagues prejudicial to British interests.

The Suez Canal is unquestionably one of the greatest engineering feats of the present century. The idea itself was not new. Napoleon I. found time to think of its feasibility, and went so far, indeed, as to order a survey of the isthmus through which the canal is pierced ; but the report which was presented to him caused the temporary abandonment of the scheme ; for his surveyors reported that there was a considerable difference in the levels of the Mediterranean and of the Red Seas, which would necessitate huge and costly locks.

CAREER OF M. LESSEPS.

The projector and the supreme director of the Canal is the Vicomte Ferdinand de Lesseps, who is one of the most extraordinary men of the age. He was born at Versailles, in France, in 1805, and is now in the seventy-eighth year of his age. He chose diplomacy as his profession, and occupied several important positions in the diplomatic service of his country. During the time of Mehemet Ali's supremacy, from 1836 to 1840, he was employed in the French Consular Service in Egypt. He was subsequently appointed Consul at Barcelona, then French Minister at Madrid, and in 1849 he went as Special Envoy to Rome, when the French military intervention took place for the restoration of the Papal Government. In the year 1854, when Said Pasha became Viceroy of Egypt, M. de Lesseps, who knew him intimately, was invited to pay a visit to Cairo. There, living as an honored guest in the Viceroy's palace, he matured the project of the Suez Canal which he had been considering ever since 1840.

THE OBSTACLES IN MAKING THE CANAL

were political as well as natural. The former were principally raised by Great Britain. Before the Suez Canal was cut, the great Mediterranean Sea had only one outlet—that of Gibraltar, which is a British stronghold. It was, therefore, within the power of England to prevent any ship entering or leaving the Mediterranean if she desired to do so. This inestimable power Great Britain was reluctant to lose, and she saw that if another outlet was cut through the Isthmus of Suez her splendid position would be deteriorated. Vessels could then enter and leave the Mediterranean through the Suez Canal in defiance of her. It was useless to point out that she would herself gain largely by being able to send her ships through it to India, instead of having to send them southward around the southernmost point of Africa and then on a long voyage northward to reach India. She saw power slipping from her hands at Gibraltar, and vigorously opposed the project from its first initiation.

The opposition was led by Lord Palmerston and Sir Stratford Canning (afterward Lord Stratford de Redcliffe), the English minister at Constantinople. No assistance or encouragement was afforded by any influential party or class in England ; merchants, shipowners, capitalists, engineers, as well as politicians, set themselves against it. But M. de Lesseps persevered, and the French nation, under the Emperor Napoleon III., entered readily into the scheme, which also found favor in Italy and Austria, and in other Mediterranean States, who naturally desired an outlet for their ships uncontrolled by a power which at any time might become hostile.

The "Compagnie Universelle du Canal Maritime de Suez" was formed, with an original share capital of forty million dollars ; but it raised twenty millions additional by debentures, and received nearly twenty millions from the Viceroy of Egypt as indemnity for his non-fulfilment of some of the conditions of the contract. The canal, with its ports at each end, was to belong to the Company for ninety-nine years, from 1869, after which it would revert to the Egyptian Government. The total cost of the Suez Canal has thus amounted to eighty million dollars, of which the British Government in 1875 became the proprietors of twenty million dollars by purchase from the Khédive of Egypt.

THE ORIGINAL CONCESSION MODIFIED.

The original preliminary concession by the Viceroy of Egypt, Said Pasha, to M. Lesseps, in 1854, and subsequently the definitive concession in 1856, agreed to supply 20,000 natives, who were to work by forced labor for the benefit of the Company. This concession was afterward withdrawn, owing to the humane intervention of England. Latterly, the work of excavation was done by the aid of floating dredges and other mechanical contrivances, a quicker and more economical arrangement.

DIMENSIONS OF THE CANAL.

The total length of the canal is 88 miles, and it follows nearly a straight line from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea. It is throughout its entire length of the uniform depth of 26 feet 4 inches, but its width varies. From Port Saïd to the southern side of Lake Ballah, through the Lake Timsah, and through the Bitter Lakes, and also for 11 miles near Suez, its width is 329 feet, at the surface of the water. But ships have to take a middle course, as the canal has sloping sides which decrease its depth on both sides. The depth of 26 feet 4 inches is only in a track 72 feet wide in the middle of the canal.

The route selected took advantage of certain depressions or valleys which were called lakes, but were, in fact, previous to the construction of the canal, low-lying tracts of country, at some places below the level of the Mediterranean and Red Seas. Lake Menzaleh is next to the Mediterranean, Lake Timsah about half way across the isthmus, and the Bitter Lakes are next to the Red Sea. The water began to flow from the Mediterranean in February, 1869, and from the Red Sea in July, and by the beginning of October of the same year these arid valleys were converted into great lakes navigable by vessels of the largest class.

The cutting of the canal presented no great difficulty. The whole length of the navigation is 88 geographical miles. Of this distance 66 miles are actual canal, formed by cuttings, 14 miles are made by dredging through the lakes, and 8 miles required no works. There was no need of locks, as the level of the two seas, contrary to what was formerly supposed, is almost identical.

The harbors at Port Saïd and Suez form not the least important part of this great work. The Mediterranean entrance to the canal is formed by two breakwaters constructed of concrete blocks, the western one 6940 feet in length, and the eastern one 6020. The entrance to the canal at Suez is also protected by a breakwater, and in connection with this harbor are two large basins and a dry-dock.

The Suez Canal was formally opened November 16th, 1869, in the presence of the Khédive, the Empress of the French, the Emperor of Austria, the Crown Prince of Prussia, and others. The canal has since been open to ships of all nations. The passage through it occupies about fifteen hours, but vessels allow more time than that to provide for delays. Six miles an hour is the rate which the Canal Company fixed for travel, and they do not allow it to be exceeded.

Such, described in mere outline, is the great work executed within the past thirty years, by French enterprise and capital. Though for reasons already mentioned, Great Britain opposed the construction of the canal, she has, now that it has been cut, availed herself of the convenience beyond any other nation, nearly four-fifths of the aggregate tonnage yearly passing through the canal belonging to that one country. In 1875, when the late Khédive, Ismail Pasha, was obliged to raise money by selling his portion of the Company's stock, the British Government wisely purchased his shares at the price of nearly twenty million dollars.

INCREASING TRAFFIC AND RECEIPTS.

The number of steam vessels that passed through the canal, out and home, in the year ending with last April, was 3154, having an aggregate tonnage of 4,889,923 tons. Of these vessels, 2469 were British, with 3,781,905 tons ; 197 were French, with 382,855 tons ; 111 were Dutch, with 199,473 tons ; 115 German, with 144,732 tons ; 65 Italian, with 119,370 tons ; 81 Austrian, with 112,115 tons ; 42 Spanish, with 75,340 tons ; and 74 of all other nations, with 74,133 tons, including Russian, Belgian, Turkish, and Chinese ; Britain having by far the most.

The receipts of the canal for the year 1882 amounted to about $12,500,000, of which nearly $10,000,000, or four-fifths, was paid by the British ships. The year's working expenses were $3,650,000. After certain deductions for the sinking fund and interest on consolidated coupons, there was a net profit of $6,300,000. Of this amount the shareholders received $4,500,000, the balance being divided among the Egyptian Government for rent of land, and the founders of the canal, and other minor claimants.

ADVANTAGES OF THE CANAL ROUTE.

The advantages of the canal route may be estimated from this one fact. The distance between London and Bombay is by it shortened more than four thousand miles, not very far from half the whole voyage. By way of the Cape of Good Hope, by which all ships to India had originally to sail, it is 10,595 nautical miles ; by way of Suez it is reduced to 6330. Its importance to the British possession of India cannot therefore be overestimated.

M. DE LESSEPS'S POPULARITY IN FRANCE.

A Paris correspondent of a London daily journal observes that "the feeling with which his countrymen regard M. de Lesseps is something more intense than admiration. When, therefore, M. de Lesseps holds a meeting of shareholders, his report is accepted, all is unanimity, the only interruptions being the mal-apropos of gushing, gray-haired shareholders rising to propose medals for him and votes of thanks. His call for ayes and noes seems a mere matter of form ; his meetings are models of dispatch.

M. DE LESSEPS'S HOME LIFE.

"Apart from his power the French love in him his human nature. He recently hurried back from London, in the very crisis of negotiations, to watch a sick baby, and he may be seen that coming closes the battle by the destruction of its leaders and their armies.

"And I saw an angel standing in the sun; and he cried with a loud voice, saying to all the fowls that fly in the midst of heaven, Come and gather yourselves together unto the supper of the great God; that ye may eat the flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of mighty men, and the flesh of horses, and of them that sit on them, and the flesh of all men, both free and bond, both small and great. And I saw the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies, gathered together to make war against him that sat on the horse, and against his army. And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone. And the remnant were slain with the sword of him that sat upon the horse, which sword proceeded out of his mouth; and all the fowls were filled with their flesh."—Rev. 19: 17–21.

The reader, for an unsymbolic description, is referred to Ezek. 39 and Zech 14.

2. THE PLACE

or battle-field.

The name of the place is given in Hebrew, Hermageddon—which means "mountain of destruction." That the mountains of Jerusalem are to be the mountains of slaughter to the armies assembled by these unclean spirits, can be learned from Ezek. 39. God, addressing Antichrist, the leader of this host, says:

"And I will cause these to come up from the north parts, and will bring thee upon the mountains of Israel; and I will smite the bow out of thy left hand, and will cause the arrows to fall out of thy right hand. Thou shalt fall upon the mountains of Israel, thou and all thy bands, and the people that are with thee. I will give thee unto the ravenous birds of every sort, and to the beasts of the field to be devoured. Thou shalt fall upon the open field; for I have spoken it, saith the Lord."—Ezek. 39: 2–6.

This is not figurative, but literal language, and refers to the same battle predicted in Rev. 19 and Zech. 14. The next and important inquiry is—

3. What

are to engage in this, the last and greatest of earth's battles? Nor are we left in doubt upon this question. John tells us that these were the kings of the whole habitable—i.e., the Eastern and Western Roman empires. The three powers sending forth these agents are symbolized by "the dragon," the Wild Beast and the false Prophet. The dragon represents the Eastern Roman empire and its rulers, Constantinople being its permanent locality. The Wild Beast represents the Western Roman empire and its rulers (see Rev. 13: 12), and let the reader understand that whatever power may dominate Europe in the latter days, whether Frank or Rosh, he will be an emperor, and "the king of the North." (See Dan. 11: 40.) The false prophet, whose seat is at Rome, represents the Papal Hierarchy.

The reader need not be told that these powers could move all the nations from the Chinese wall to the Pillars of Hercules; and should the first mentioned one engage in a war of conquest, every nation of Asia, even China herself, and every European power, would inevitably be compelled to take sides, offensively or defensively.

It is said to be a war against Christ and His people; but certainly these parties are not visible contestants. This, by the tenor of the Scriptures, seems to be the explanation: The Wild Beast, which is to be some future "king of the North" who, after supporting a scarlet dressed woman drunk with the blood of the saints—which implies that it will be an ecclesio-political government—proposes to make himself master of the East, as he already has of the West, and to take possession of Syria and Palestine, the land he knows God has given by solemn promise to His elect nation—the Jews. He is said to antagonize Christ and His people, since Christ Jehovah was the Maker of that Covenant and under bonds to administer it. It is revealed in most unfigurative language, if we will but refer to the original stocks of the nations referred to, what nations will be gathered by these fell spirits of the pit, into this war, and the literal powers symbolized by the Wild Beast, the head of which is the prime instigator and leader. He is styled in prophecy, Gog, "chief of Rosh Tubal and Meshech and the King of the North," which I claim is some future autocrat of all the Russias, and his antagonist the Tarshish of the West, whose emblem is a lion—which clearly points to England. Since in a future chapter I shall give my reasons at length for these views, I will so refer to them, asking the reader, if he doubts, to suspend judgment until he examines what I have to say.

But though this Gog, or "king of the North," is eventually to fall by the power of Israel's Messiah, yet before he reaches his end, and upon his threatening to enter the holy land, he is antagonized by i.e., the Lion of Tarshish, and the young lions thereof, who occupy the countries of Tarshish, Dedan and Sheba. We think no one will doubt that this refers to the British empire in the last days, which will embrace all of India and Afghanistan, with all the coast from the Gulf of Persia to the Straits of the Red Sea; and thence to Suez, that she may guard her canal and preserve her communication with the Eastern empire. Thus she will become Edom, Moab and Ammon of the latter days, for the prophets refer not to races of men, but the powers occupying the territories mentioned.

Here we see the nations of the whole habitable globe, which these unclean spirits are to gather together and marshal under the opposing standards of Tarshish and Gog—England and Russia—for the last great battle on the plains of Megiddo and the mountains of slaughter around Jerusalem, which armies are to be given as food to the birds of heaven, and the beast and prophet given to the burning lake. This has been known for the last half century, at least, as "The Eastern Question." It is all concerning the possession of Constantinople, and consequently, the dominion of Palestine and Syria and the whole East. The contestants, as all readers of modern events must know, are England and Russia. These unclean spirits have been actively engaged in their fell work ever since the Euphrates River commenced to dry up. The Turkish empire began to wane A.D. 1820. The "king of the North" has been steadily extending his territory on every side, and, despite the protests and threats of England, conquered all the countries west of China.

Twice in the last few years has this Gog of the North quarter attempted to lay his hand upon Constantinople, the key of the whole East, but has been prevented by Tarshish and her allies. But though repulsed, he has never for a moment intermitted his schemes of aggrandizement and preparation for the coming contest. England has been active in attempting to checkmate, and defend her interests against, this "wild beast" of insatiable appetite for territory. She has annexed all India to her empire, with an eye upon a "scientific frontier," which means one offering the most material defences against the increasingly threatening attitude of Russia.

More than two years ago, when studying these prophecies, I laid down my pen quite in despair of being able to understand them, and the then existing relations of France and Russia. The prophet expressly says that in the last battle for universal empire, Gomer and all his bands—allies—shall be at the steps of Gog, which means that France would be a voluntary ally of Russia. How was this conceivable, when past events proved that they were natural enemies, and France for self-protection had allied herself to England, her immemorial enemy, in order to oppose Russia's strides toward Constantinople to lay hands upon the key of the East? Nor did I resume the pen until it was announced by an European correspondent that a secret treaty, offensive and defensive, had been formed between France and Russia. The sun of prophecy passed from behind the cloud and poured a clear light upon the future political map of Europe!

France has long been preparing to wipe out the disgrace of Sedan and to reclaim her lost provinces of Alsace and Lorraine, and consummate her long cherished desire to extend her territory to the Rhine. The Gog of Russia has long had his eye upon the land of Magog—Germany and Austria—but neither could well consummate its wishes without the mutual consent and assistance of each other, and hence this treaty. Germany and Austria, situate between these two enemies and hostile powers, are like grains of wheat between the upper and nether millstone, and must therefore lay aside their asperities and form an alliance as the only hope of their existence as nations.

Since penning these lines, this paragraph from an English paper has fallen under my eye: "The conference between Prince Bismarck and Count Andrassy has been the subject of general comment throughout Europe during the past week. It is one of those events capable of exercising a decisive influence over the future of all European nations. An alliance between Germany and Austria is said to have been the result of the interview, Germany guaranteeing to Austria her acquisitions of territory held under the Berlin Treaty, and Austria engaging to assist Germany if an attempt is made to wrest from her the spoils of the Franco-German war. The alliance indicates that the two nations fear a combination between Russia and France. Its tendency is to divide Europe into

TWO HOSTILE CAMPS.

On the one side there will be Germany and Austria, to which England will be drawn by her jealousy of Russia, and on the other Russia, France, and probably Italy and Denmark. With millions of men under arms, and a store of weapons of the most destructive character the world has ever seen, the elements of a great conflagration are all present."

This has been the work of these unclean spirits; and let every Christian know that before this war shall close, which the statesmen of Europe confess must soon come, Christ will come for His saints. We are no prophet, but we are willing to risk an opinion, based upon the above prophecies, that France in a few years will avenge her disgrace, and carry her boundary to the Rhine, while the "Czar of all the Russias" will also be of Germany and Austria—"Gog of the land of Magog"—and after that he will lay his insatiate hand upon Constantinople.

The reader may well be impressed with this fact, that these wonder-working but unclean spirits have well-nigh accomplished their mission. The nations of Europe are armed to the teeth, and the vast standing armies of all these kings cause the very earth to groan beneath their weight, and the populations are being exhausted in feeding them. A general war is expected and inevitable by every Cabinet of Europe, and then—the End.

Since writing the above the political papers announce that Bismarck, having formed an alliance with Austria—foreseeing the inevitable result of the alliance between France and Russia—is seriously premeditating striking the first blow, and soon, before Russia is prepared! The reader need not doubt these combinations, nor the ultimate result—the frogs are at work. This war, the last, may burst forth any day, and, once commenced, will not close until the armies engaged are destroyed by Christ at His coming.

(To be concluded.)

ing none but the saints will know of it, and they will be withdrawn and remain with Christ in the air until the time of this second stage, when they will return with Him and take part in the last great battle.—Ed.

NOTICE.

Many subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who are laboring to extend the sphere of its usefulness, wish us to afford them the same facilities as were placed at their disposal last year. It appears that the concession in price then made, enabled them to introduce the journal to persons and families to whom it proved a blessing. God used it as a means of conversion in not a few cases; in others it gave comfort and encouragement to tried and afflicted believers; and ministers and lay preachers, to whom our friends sent it, acknowledged their indebtedness for help in their labors to the hints and suggestions contained in its pages.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has no higher object than that which its friends thus state was achieved last year. The same opportunity is therefore cheerfully given this year. Any subscriber wishing to introduce THE CHRISTIAN HERALD where it may do good, may send to THE MANAGER, 63 Bible House, New York, for which sum the paper will be mailed to any address in the United States or in Canada every week from the date on which the money is received, until the end of 1883. Will our friends pray that God will use each number for the advancement of Christ's Kingdom?

CURRENT EVENTS.

One of the Most Destructive Cyclones of recent times struck the city of Rochester, Minn., on August 21st. The calamity was awfully sudden. At seven o'clock in the evening there were no signs of its approach. A minute and a half later the whole of the northern part of the city was in ruins; three hundred houses were completely demolished, two hundred others were seriously damaged, and sixteen people were killed and eighty-two injured. An eye-witness states that the storm rose at a point about eighteen miles north-west of the city. He saw approaching "a decided and dreadful inverted cone with a height seemingly immeasurable and murkiness appalling, with the speed of a cannon ball it came down the valley at Silver Creek, and when within half a mile of the city, its roar could be heard fully three hundred feet in the air. It rose, and in its whirling mass were trees and stones, animals and débris of every conceivable description. Trees were snapped and twisted and lifted bodily into the air with tons of earth clinging to their roots." It cut a wide swath through timber and buildings, leaving behind it a scene of appalling ruin. No time was given for any preparations, had it been possible. The scene among the devastated district and the place where the dead lay was indescribably sad. Mothers wildly searched for their children, while little homeless waifs were found whom the tempest had orphaned. One child was the only survivor of a family of seven. The mayor telegraphed to St. Paul for assistance, and in three minutes $5000 was raised and despatched for the relief of the sufferers, most of whom are very poor.

A Series of Letters have been Published recently by the New York Sun, apparently inspired by ex-Senator Dorsey, charging the late President Garfield with having, during the period between his nomination and election, made bargains of a dishonorable character. The disclosures were exceedingly circumstantial with names and dates, and they caused considerable regret among the late President's friends through the country. The most serious of these charges was that Mr. Jay Gould agreed to subscribe a large sum to the campaign fund, on condition that Mr. Stanley Matthews was nominated for a Supreme Court justiceship. There was, it will be remembered, some surprise caused by the nomination, though no one believed it was the result of a corrupt bargain, until the statement was published in the Sun. General Garfield's friends will be glad to learn that Mr. Jay Gould has issued over his own name an emphatic and categorical denial of the story, thus clearing the late President's name of a reproach which ought never to have rested upon it.

The Proposal to Punish the Chiricahua Prisoners, captured by General Crook, is strenuously opposed by that officer. In the course of a communication to the Indian Bureau, General Crook says: "Though the Chiricahua prisoners are doubtless guilty of many and repeated acts of hostility and outrage, both in Mexico and the United States, they are now prisoners, and surrendered with the understanding on their part that their past misdeeds would not be punished, provided they behaved themselves in the future. To attempt now to punish those who are on the San Carlos Reservation as prisoners would be an act of perfidy and bad faith, and would unquestionably not only prevent the return to the agency of the Chiricahuas left in the Sierra Madres, but would precipitate an Indian war, which would be more serious in its results upon the interests of the two countries than any which has preceded it. I believe firmly that an exact acquiescence by our Government in the terms upon which these Indians understood that they are to be allowed to live upon the San Carlos Reservation, offers the only possible means of protecting the lives and interests of the people of Sonora and Chihuahua as well as our own country, and am as firmly convinced that if the present prisoners are treated with good faith, not only will the renegades now in the mountains return, but also that neither country will hereafter have any reason to complain of depredations or outrages from them."

An Earnest Appeal to the Democrats of Ohio, who sympathize with the effort to control the liquor traffic, was made by Senator Sherman in his speech at Findlay on August 24th. He referred to the action of the Liquor Dealers' Convention in organizing political clubs to assist the Democratic party in this campaign, and claimed that Democrats who approve of the Scott law should hold the Temperance question superior to party ties. He said: "If a particular interest can organize for selfish ends to control elections, and avail themselves of the aid of one of the great parties, that party ought to be defeated by the aid of every man who believes in wholesome restraint upon the traffic. No man should hold his party ties so strongly as to allow them to control his vote on questions like these, when good order, temperance, sobriety, and public safety depend upon the exercise by him of an independent franchise. When the Liquor Dealers' Convention says to the Republican party that it will oppose us because we passed what we regard as wise laws, we can only appeal to our Democratic fellow-citizens to make good any loss that we may suffer in this way. Let the people of Ohio once understand that the liquor-dealers have formed a political alliance with any party, however strong, to prevent the passage of wise temperance laws or to secure their repeal, and there will be a popular revulsion against such an unholy alliance."

A State Convention of the Constitution Prohibition party was held at Nashville, Tenn., on August 23d. The delegates pledged themselves not to support any man for office who does not pledge himself to aid in having the question of an amendment to the Constitution of Tennessee submitted to the vote of the people by the next Legislature, with the view of prohibiting the manufacture, importation, or sale of alcoholic stimulants. It is stated in the declaration of principles that "it is not now the purpose or plan of the party to put separate and independent candidates of their own party into the field, except in counties where the parties and the candidates of existing parties will not agree to give the people a chance to vote on the constitutional amendment herein provided for, in which case they will put candidates of their party into the field and support them without regard to former party affiliations."

The American Tract Society has Issued its fifty-eighth annual report. From this document it appears that the circulation of its publications for the year aggregates about 12,346,400 copies of books, tracts and periodicals, and its receipts from sales and grants amount to $249,816.98. About seventy per cent of the whole circulation, it is stated, has been effected by the ordinary facilities of the book trade, and for the support of such distribution no appeal is made to the benevolent. From donations and legacies the society has received during the year $111,951.73, and appropriated to benevolent work $85,651.73. Among the beneficiaries of its benevolent work were sailors, immigrants, inmates of the charitable institutions, missions and mission-schools.

The Death of the Rev. Samuel J. Wilson, D.D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the Western Theological Seminary of Allegheny City, occurred on August 17th. He was one of the most popular ministers in the Presbyterian Church in the United States, as highly esteemed by his ministerial brethren as by the students and laymen. He was Moderator of the General Assembly that met at St. Louis in 1874, and was appointed to represent the Presbyterian Church at home and abroad on many important occasions. In 1875 he was appointed by the General Assembly to deliver the discourse on the History of the Church from the time of the Adoption of the Presbyterian Form of Government, one of the series of discourses delivered during the Centennial year. Dr. Wilson was born in Washington County, Pa., in 1828, was graduated at Washington College, Pa., and had been connected with the Western Theological Seminary for twenty-five years.

Apprehensions of an Outbreak of Yellow fever were caused last week by the report of the death of United States Surgeon Owen, at Pensacola, Fla., and two deaths at Woolsey, all from that disease. There was a slight panic at Pensacola, and Lieutenant-Commander Welch telegraphed to the Acting Secretary of the Navy for assistance. Surgeon Guiteras was sent to his aid, and Commander Welch has been authorized to employ physicians and policemen. An inspection of the city resulted in the report that it was healthy, and few houses absolutely unclean. Three cases of yellow fever were, however, reported from the Navy Yard on Saturday.

The General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church is to be held in Philadelphia in October next. Preparations are already being made for it. This convention is anticipated with unusual interest, because an effort will be made there to alter the liturgy. The project has frequently been advocated, but has always been opposed on the ground that it may lead to dangerous innovations.

A Little Girl's Prayer that, if People were less hypocritical than they are, would be often offered, is mentioned by the Boston Commonwealth. It states that in a family residing at Palmer, Mass., there is a little girl who, having been detected in wrong-doing, was punished by her mother. The effect of the punishment on the child's mind may be inferred from the fact that she made the following prayer when she went to bed at night: "O God, please make me good; not real good, but just good enough so I won't have to be whipped." How many older people there are, who have no hatred of sin nor love of holiness, who, while professing to be Christians, never attain eminence or usefulness in the church—because in entering it they seek only safety from punishment (Acts 8 : 24).

A Curious Defence was made by a Prisoner in the Supreme Court of California recently. He was accused of the murder of a man named McIntyre and was brought into court from the jail at St. Quentin to answer. It appeared from his defence that he was serving a life sentence at St. Quentin, to which he had been subjected for murdering a man named Renowden, in Santa Clara County, in March last. He had been tried, convicted and sentenced for Renowden's murder, and he claimed that he was, in consequence, legally and civilly dead, and that, in bringing him up for trial on another charge the authorities have blundered. He claimed that being dead in law for the murder of Renowden he cannot be subject to prosecution on trial for any other crime. The plea is a novel one, but it seems probable that the court will pronounce it valid. The claim of being dead to the law while yet alive is that of the Christian, but in his case it is not his own death that he pleads, but that of his Divine Substitute (Rom. 6 : 11).

Misleading Portraits were Taken out of the Rogues' Gallery in New York last week. Superintendent Walling, of the city police, discovered that among the pictures in the Rogues' Gallery are the portraits of many honest men, taken years ago, and which have since been exhibited as thieves and evildoers. These pictures were placed in the gallery when it was the custom to photograph all persons arrested on suspicion, despite the fact that many of them subsequently proved their innocence. The superintendent has been weeding the gallery of these pictures, and in future none will be placed in it except those of convicts. This will make it a valuable auxiliary in the detection of criminals. It will not, however, make it perfect. There are probably in it some pictures of men wrongfully convicted, and there are many respected members of society whose portraits, if justice were done, would be placed there. But so it must be. The estimates men form of each other are often wrong, and it will be so until the last great day on which all wrongs will be righted (Matt. 13 : 41–43).

A Stage-Driver has been Playing a Practical joke on a Methodist elder. The Rev. John Peate recently told a reporter of the Titusville (Pa.) Herald that, while returning from his vacation, which he spent at Nantucket, Mass., to his duties in Pennsylvania, he had been made the victim of a practical joke. A friend of his happened to be at Truro, Mass., so Mr. Peate determined to pay him a visit on his way home. The elder ascertained the nearest railroad station to Truro, and arrived there at eleven o'clock at night. He says: "The gruff stage-driver informed me that Truro was a township, not a village, which left me in a dilemma, afterward solved by asking Jehu to take me to the most populous place in the township. We rumbled along for two hours through the fog and over the sandy roads, bothered by monstrous mosquitoes, chilled by the sea air, and otherwise uncomfortable, when suddenly the stage stopped, and the driver, throwing open the door, said laconically, 'Here's the most populous place.' And it certainly was, for he had landed me at a graveyard which had been in use two hundred years, and contained more tombstones than the town did inhabitants." The elder laughed good-humoredly at the joke, but it was only a poor one. The graveyard is not populous. If men would only realize how unimportant a part of themselves is laid there, they would be more in earnest in providing for the future of the soul than they now are in providing for their mortal bodies (Luke 12 : 20, 21).

A Bible was Used to Cure Delirium Tremens recently. A correspondent of the Boston Congregationalist states that a man was attacked while on board a crowded steamboat with the terrible Nemesis of intemperance. He beheld frightful visions, and suffered torture from the belief that devils were struggling to get at him. He raised frenzied cries for help, which rang through the ship and horrified every one. At last he suddenly turned to his attendant, sand begged piteously for a Bible. Immediately the inquiry was started for a copy, and one belonging to a passenger was carried to the state-room of the frantic sufferer, and eagerly seized by him. Then, laying it on the bed above his breast, with a wild laugh, he exclaimed: "There, devils! you are beaten now; you can't get over that book." A strange calm came over him as he lay protected by the Word of God. The man in his frenzy doubtless used the Bible as he would a fetish, and the belief in its efficacy calmed him by overcoming his belief in the existence of his imaginary assailants. If he had used the Bible as God intended it to be used, he would never have had occasion to use it as a fetish (Ps. 119 : 11).

A Despairing Man Committed Suicide at Corona, L. I., last week by throwing himself under the wheels of the steam cars. It was thought at first that he lost his life in an endeavor to board the train. That opinion, however, was contradicted by a slip of paper found in his pocket. On it the man had written: "I was forty years of age last 16th of June. Being out of employment so long is the reason of my poverty. I am a baker by trade. I leave a good, loving wife, and two dear, good daughters, twelve and sixteen years of age, whom I have left in great need. Because my clothes look shabby you need not take me for a tramp, for I have always been an honest workingman. The bad situations which I have had these last couple of years have ruined me and my family. If there is a God, I will, in the other world, do all the good I can for my family and friends." The last sentence affords the explanation of his sad and wicked end. Had he believed in God and earnestly sought Him, he would have been preserved from despair, for he would have been assured that his trials were permitted for a wise purpose, and would be ended when that purpose was accomplished (Isa. 26 : 3).

A Scheme to Aid Preachers and Public speakers has originated in the fertile brain of a Western inventor. In introducing his project to the public the inventor dwells upon the fact that "every public speaker must bring his audience into rapport with himself before he can impress them with his ideas; preachers encounter so much apathy that it takes all the fire and eloquence of a revivalist to make converts. Now, my invention does away with all this trouble," he says, "by the use of laughing gas. You are aware that the effect of inhaling nitrous oxide in a diluted form is mild exhilaration. You can understand, therefore, that if laughing gas could be thinly distributed through the air which an audience breathed, they would be kept in a mental condition to be easily convinced, agitated, or delighted. Thus half the work of winning or entertaining them would be accomplished by mechanical means. The enormousness of the fortune which I can make out of my invention is only equalled by the good which it will accomplish." We may leave the inventor and the public speakers to settle the value of the invention with each other, but preachers must be left out of the calculation. They do not make converts by eloquence nor power of mind, nor by human skill, but by the omnipotent power of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 2 : 4, 5),

ON HUMBLING OURSELVES BEFORE GOD.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you in due time."—1 Peter 5 : 6.

A Sin Hard to Kill—God Resists it—Especially in His Children—Humility to be Cultivated—I. In Church Life—Undertake Low Offices—Conscious of Incompetence—Willing to be Ignored—Never Arrogant—II. In Affliction—The Idol Generally Broken—Submit Entirely—III. In Daily Dealings with God—The Crucial Test of Little Trials—IV. In Seeking Forgiveness—A Prince among Galley-Slaves.

Pride is so natural to fallen man that it springs up in his heart like weeds in a watered garden, or rushes by a flowing brook. It is an all-pervading sin, and smothers all things like dust in the roads, or flour in the mill. Its every touch is evil as the breath of the cholera-fiend, or the blast of the simoom. Pride is as hard to get rid of as charlock from the furrows, or the American blight from the apple-trees. If killed it revives, if buried it bursts the tomb. You may hunt down this fox, and think you have destroyed it, and lo! your very

EXULTATION IS PRIDE.

None have more pride than those who dream that they have none. You may labor against vainglory till you conceive that you are humble, and the fond conceit of your humility will prove to be pride in full bloom. It apes humility full well, and is then most truly pride. Pride is a sin with a thousand lives; it seems impossible to kill it, it flourishes on that which should be its poison, glorying in its shame. It is a sin with a thousand shapes; by perpetual change it escapes capture. It seems impossible to hold it; the vapory imp slips from you, only to appear in another form and mock your fruitless pursuit. To die to pride and self one would need to die himself.

Let pride lodge where it may, it does its entertainer great mischief, for it bars out the favor of God, "God resisteth the proud." It must be sent adrift ere God can visit us with favor, for no grace comes to the proud, "but He giveth grace unto the humble." Humility is the grace that attracts more grace. As money makes money, so humility increases humility, and with it every other spiritual gift. If you would have much grace have much humility. God hath assistance for the humble, but resistance for the proud.

The more pride enters into the Christian's heart the less grace will enter there, and the more opposition from God will come there; for pride is never so hateful to God as when He sees it in His own people. If you see disease in a stranger you are very sorry, but if you discover its symptoms in your own child your grief is much more deep. A viper is loathsome anywhere; but how it would make you start if you saw the head of one of those creatures peeping out from the bosom of a beloved friend! So pride is detestable anywhere, but it is worst in those whom the Lord loves best.

All this I have given by way of preface, but I think it is also an argument which may run before the words of the text, and strengthen them, "Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God."

I. First, our text is evidently intended to bear upon us in our CHURCH LIFE.

We will use it in that respect. Observe that Peter has been speaking to the elders, and telling them how they should behave themselves in the flock over which they are set as overseers. Then he speaks to the younger members, and he says, "Submit yourselves unto the elder." He says to all church-members, "All of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility;" and it is in the same context that he writes, "Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God." I am, as a member of a church, not to seek honor to myself, but I am to walk humbly. I am not to make it in any respect the object of my Christian life to be esteemed among my fellow-Christians so as to have influence over them, and to take the lead among them. I am to have far humbler motives than that. I am to think very little of myself, and to think so much of others that I admire all that I see of God's grace in them, and am glad to learn from them as well as to help them in their progress to heaven.

Now, true humility in our church relationship will show itself in our being willing to undertake the very lowest offices for Christ. Some cannot do little things; they must be ordained to great offices, or they will sulk in indolence. Genuine humility makes a man think it a great honor to be a doorkeeper in the house of God, or to be allowed to speak a word to a little child about Jesus, or even to wash the saints' feet.

The next point of humility is, that we are conscious of our own incompetence to do anything aright. He who can do all things without Christ will end in doing nothing. The man who can preach without divine aid cannot preach at all. The woman who can teach a Bible-class cannot teach a Bible-class. Human ability without the grace of God is only puffed-up inability. Those of you who, apart from supernatural help, feel quite sufficient for any kind of holy service are miserably deluded. Self-sufficiency is inefficiency. The fulness of self is a double emptiness. He that has no sense of his weakness has a weakness in his sense. I believe, brethren and sisters, that any man whom God uses for a great purpose will be so emptied out that he will wonder that ever God uses him in the least degree; and he will be ready to hide his head, and long to get out of public notice, because he will feel himself to be utterly unworthy of the favor which God manifests toward him. I do not believe that God ever fills a cup which was not empty; or that He ever fills a man's mouth with His word while that man has his mouth full of his own words. Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God; if you desire that the Holy Spirit should bless you, be purged from your own spirit.

This humility will show itself, next, in this—that we shall be of men. There is a craving in the heart of many to have what they do written upon tablets, and set up in the market-places. I once heard a professing Christian complain bitterly that he had been ignored. He had been a Sunday-school teacher for years, and yet he had never been publicly mentioned by any one. Did he make that a complaint? He might far rather have rejoiced in his quietude. The fierce light of public notoriety is not much valued by those upon whom it falls. I wish some people would ignore me—at least, all next week, so much at least as not to call to see me, or write me a letter, or name me in the papers. I would be happy as all the birds in the air to be ignored, if I might be let alone, and allowed peacefully to work for God with His sweet smile to cheer me in my loneliness.

O brothers, do not let us care about its being known that we have done our part. Let it be done as to God, and in God's sight; and then, as to what our fellow-mortals shall say, let us have scant concern; for, if we live on human praise, we shall grow not only proud, but vain, which, if it be not more wicked, is certainly more silly. Serve God, and do not wish to have a trumpet blown before you. Never cry with Jehu, "Come, see my zeal for the Lord of hosts." Go on serving God year after year, though you be altogether unknown, feeling it quite sufficient that you have by the grace of God served your generation and honored your Redeemer. This would be a great attainment in our church life if we could reach to it.

Brethren, we want humility, all of us, in our church life, in the sense of never being rough, haughty, arrogant, hard, domineering, lordly; or, on the other hand, factious, unruly, quarrelsome, and unreasonable. We should endeavor to think very carefully of those who are poorest, for fear we should hurt their feelings; and very noticeably of those who are obscure, lest we should seem to despise them. It is ours never to take offence, and to be most cautious never to cause it even by inadvertence. He that is set as a leader in the church of God, let him be the person that is most ready to bear blame, and least ready to give offence; let him say, "You may think what you please of me, but I shall lay myself out to do you good, and to be your servant for Christ's sake." Even for your own sake it will be wise to occupy a humble place, for in the vales the streams of peace are flowing. The mountains are the playground of the storm, but in the quiet villages the dove finds her shelter. If you would escape from ill-will, and live peaceably with all men, practise the maxims of an influential man, who, when asked after the Revolution how he managed to escape the executioner's axe, replied, "I made myself of no reputation, and kept silence."

I am speaking to a number of young men who have begun to speak for Jesus Christ in the church; let me earnestly entreat them to take great notice of my text, "Humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God." Recollect, you cannot do any good except "the mighty hand of God" be with you; therefore be humble, and look to that hand for all success. If you are satisfied, young brother, to stand in the corner of the street and talk about Jesus Christ to a few rough folk, you shall find hundreds of hearers by-and-by. If you are willing to be nothing, God will make something of you. The way to the top of the ladder is to begin at the lowest round. In fact, in the church of God, the way up is to go down; but he that is ambitious to be at the top will find himself before long at the bottom.

II. And now, secondly, I will use the text in quite another way—in reference to our behavior

IN OUR AFFLICTIONS.

Certain of us are never long together without affliction and trial; like salamanders, we live in the flame, passing from fire to fire. As by a succession of shafts we descend into the heart of the earth, going down from woe to woe; we had need learn the way of these dark places. Frequently our heavenly Father's design in sending trial to His children is to make and keep them humble; let us remember this, and learn a lesson of wisdom. The advice of Peter is that we should humble ourselves.

Many people have been often humbled, and yet they have not become humble. There is a great difference between the two things. If God withdraws His grace and allows a Christian man to fall into sin, that fall humbles him in the esteem of all good men; and yet he may not be humble. He may never have a true sense of how evil his action has been; he may still persevere in his lofty spirit, and be far from humility. When this is the case the haughty spirit may expect a downfall. The rod will make blue wounds when pride abates not at gentler blows. The most hopeful way of avoiding the humbling affliction is to humble yourself.

And do this, first, by noticing whether you have been guilty of any special sin of pride. You are suffering; let the rod point out to you wherein you have erred through pride. I believe that David was afflicted in his children because he had been proud of his children, and had indulged them. When there is it is generally the idol that is broken. Usually our sins lie at the roots of our sorrows. If we will repent of the sin, the Lord will remove the sorrow. Have you been tried in your worldly possessions? Were you ever puffed up by them? Is your health failing? Did you never glory in your bodily strength? Are you deceived? Were you never boastful of your own wisdom? Are you mourning over a failure in character? Did you not once dream that you were past temptation? Look into your affliction till you see, as in a glass, what was the thing you were proud of, and then take the idol down from its pedestal, humble yourself before God, and henceforth worship Him alone.

But, more than that, humble yourself so as to submit entirely to God's will. Yield up your will so as to have no suit-in-law against the Lord, no difference as to His goodness, not even if the evil you dread should actually come, and come in the worst form. Submit to the Lord's will as the rush bends to the wind, or as the wax yields to the seal. Pray against the calamity which moves you to fear, but let your petition always end with "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt." Ask that you may not be obliged to drink the bitter draught, but do not upset the cup, or push it away. There let it stand, while you for the moment supplicate for its removal; and when there comes no answer to your prayer, then take it up meekly, put it to your lips resolutely, and drink right on, even as your Master drank His cup and drained it to the dregs.

Dear friend, what can be the use of striving against the hand of the Lord? It is a mighty hand; we cannot resist it, even if we are wicked enough to attempt rebellion. If affliction is to come it will come, and come with all the greater sharpness because we refuse to yield. If God appoints a trial, we cannot escape it. What can be the use of our striving against divine decrees? It will only make our sorrow the more severe. When the ox kicks out against the goad the iron enters the deeper into its flesh; but when the bullock hastens on its way, sensitive to the least touch, the driver scarcely urges it again. The tender, sensitive horse scarcely receives a stroke from the whip; he feels it too much; but the mule that will not move is struck again and again for his obstinacy. So will it be with us. A rebellious heart comes out of affliction worse rather than better. Submit, and you shall be so exalted by your affliction that you shall bless God for it, and feel that you would not have missed the trouble for ten thousand pounds if you could have done so. Heavy tribulation shall bring with it unspeakable preferment. You shall be exalted to a higher degree in the peerage of Christianity by battling with adversities. Therefore, I pray you, humble yourselves under the hand of God.

III. Thirdly, I am going to use the text in another way.

with God, whether in affliction or not, let us humble ourselves under His hand, for so only can we hope to be exalted.

It is a blessed thing whenever you come to God to come wondering that you are allowed to come, wondering that you have been led to come; marvelling at divine election, that the Lord should ever have chosen you to come; wondering at divine redemption, astonished that such a price should have been paid that you might be brought nigh to God. When you are doing this be very humble before God, because you have not made more improvement of the grace that He has given you. Next, humble yourself, dear brother, under the hand of God by feeling your own want of knowledge whenever you come to God. Do not think that you understand all divinity. There is only one body of divinity, and that is Christ Himself; and who knoweth Him to the full? When even His love, which is the plainest point about him, passeth knowledge, who shall know Christ in all His fulness? Come before God to be instructed in the knowledge of your God and Saviour. Do not think that you understand providence, for I am sure that none of us do.

One point concerning which I should like every one of us to humble ourselves under the hand of God is about our little enjoyment of divine things. The elder brother in the parable said, "Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment; and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends." So have I known certain sincere Christian men fall into a horribly legal state of mind. They have always been very regular in their living, constant in their religious observances, and persevering in their prayers, and yet they have never had much joy; but they see a poor soul, just saved from sin, full of delight, and they envy him, and cry out, "Why is a fuss made over such a sinner, when I have been all these years a Christian, and my brethren have never made any rejoicing over me? There is no music and dancing about me! Thou never gavest me a kid that I might make merry with my friends."

I do not know how we could make a fuss over some of

they would not bear it, they would be angry, and inquire, in hard and surly tones, what these things meant. Music and dancing are things too trivial for their solid souls. They stand outside and grumble, and we cannot warm them into a revival spirit. They are freezing outside the door of our happy home. Must they always stand there? How divinely sweet was the father's answer to that naughty elder brother! He said to him, "Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine." That is to say, "You live in my house. You are with me as my own dear son. Everything I have is yours by heirship. Your brother had his portion, and he spent it, but all that remains to me is yours." Hence his short commons had been of his own appointing. If he had not made merry with his friends it was his own fault.

Is it not much the same with us if we have been dull and melancholy; I mean those of us who are believers? Are not all things ours? Come, let us humble ourselves under the hand of God, because we have not made merry with our friends. You growling Christians—if you growl it is because you will growl; there is nothing to murmur at. You who never have a happy day, who never have any of the fervors and enthusiasms of young beginners; whose fault is that? It is your own. You might have anything in the Father's house. You have a right to rare music and dancing, for you are ever with God, and all that He has is yours. It is meet that we should make merry and be glad; and if we are dull at the business of holy merry-making, let us humble ourselves under the hand of God because of our despondencies and mistrusts. O my soul, if thy ceilings are painted with black instead of vermilion, blame thyself alone, and not thy God.

I am sure, dear friends, if any of us will go over our daily lives we shall find plenty of reasons for humbling ourselves under the hand of God. It is really dreadful how a man can serve God nobly and do great things, and yet in a certain matter he may fail sadly.

A GRAND OLD PROPHET

is that Jonah, going through the streets of Nineveh, and bravely delivering the Lord's warning. Whoever did the like? "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown" is the word which he hurls into the face of princes. Grand man! One, yet a conqueror of myriads! Yes! But look at him a day or two after! Call that a grand man, sitting there crying because the cucumber that grew up over his head is withered! fretting because a worm has devoured a gourd! He is angry, and he says that he does well to be angry about a bower of melon-leaves. Dear me, that a man can be so great in noble things and so little in a trifling matter!

How many have like cause to be humble before God! Observe that good man: he bore the loss of his property with holy resignation, but he lost his temper because a button was gone from his linen. Such a thing has often happened. Do I put it so that you smile at it? It would be better to weep over it. As you think about yourselves, my brethren, recollect the causes that you have to be humble under the hand of God because of the gross weakness by which you have shown the natural depravity of your heart, and the faultiness of your nature.

IV. I finish by using my text with all the earnestness my soul can feel in reference to the unconverted part of this audience as sinners.

The text was not originally meant for the ungodly, but it may fitly be applied to them. If you would find grace in God's sight and live, dear unconverted hearers, you must humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God. So you want to be saved, do you? The way of salvation is, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ." "But," you say, "I cannot understand it." Yet it is very simple; no hidden meaning lies in the words; you are simply bidden to trust Jesus. If, however, you feel as if you could not do that, let me urge you to go to God in secret and own the sin of this unbelief; for a great sin it is. Humble yourself. Do not try to make out that you are good. That will be fatal, for it will be a falsehood which will shut the gate of grace. Confess that you are guilty. When a man is clearly and manifestly guilty, it is of no use his standing before the judge and beginning to urge his own merit; his best course is to cast himself upon the mercy of the court. It is your only course, dear soul, the only one that can avail you.

Then, next, accept God's mercy in His own way. Do not be so vain as to dictate to God how you ought to be saved. Be willing to be saved by free grace through the blood of Jesus Christ; for that is God's way. Be willing to be saved by faith in Jesus Christ, for that also is God's way. If your unbelief begins to ask, "How can it be, and why should it be?" cease from such questions. Humble yourself and say, "God says it is so, and therefore it must be so;" if God says, "Believe, and be saved," I will believe and be saved; and if He says, "Trust Christ, and live," I will trust Christ and live.

If a man had forfeited his life, but should be told by the court that he shall have pardon freely given to him if he will freely accept it—he would be a fool if he began to inquire, "But is this according to law? Is this according to precedent? What may be the effect of this pardon?" and so on. These inquiries are for the court, not for the prisoner. My dear man, you do not want to hang yourself, do you? Yet some men argue against their own souls, and labor to find out reasons why they should not be saved. If this perverse ingenuity could but be taught right reason, and men would strive to find out why they should at once yield themselves to God's way of salvation, they might enter into comfort and rest much sooner.

Did I hear you say, "Alas, sir, I want to get comfort." Cease from that. Do not ask for comfort; ask for forgiveness, and that blessing may come through your greater discomfort. Sink lower down! Sink lower down! There is a point at which God will surely accept you, and that point is lower down. "Oh," you say, "I think I have a due sense of sin." That will not do. I want you to feel that you have not a due sense of sin, and come to Jesus just so. "Oh, but I do think that I have been broken-hearted." I should like to see you lower than that, till you cry, "I am afraid I never knew what it is to be brokenhearted." I want you to sink so low that you cannot say anything good of yourself; nay, nor see an atom of goodness in yourself.

A PRINCE AMONG GALLEY SLAVES.

Many years ago a certain prince visited the Spanish galleys, where a large number of convicts were confined, chained to their oars to toil on without relief—I think nearly all of them condemned to a life sentence. Being a great prince, the King of Spain told him that he might in honor of his visit set free any one of the galley-slaves he chose. He went down among them to choose his man. He said to one, "Man, how did you come here?" He replied that false witnesses swore away his character. "Ah!" said the prince and passed on. He went to the next, who stated that he had done something that was wrong, certainly, but not very much, and that he never ought to have been condemned. "Ah!" said the prince, and again passed on. He went the round, and found that they were all good fellows—all convicted by mistake.

At last he came to one who said, "You ask me why I came here. I am ashamed to say that I richly deserve it. I am guilty, I cannot for a moment say that I am not; and if I die at this oar, I thoroughly deserve the punishment. In fact, I think it a mercy that my life is spared me." The prince stopped and said, "It is a pity that such a bad fellow as you should be placed among such a number of innocent people. I will set you free." You smile at that; but let me make you smile again. My Lord Jesus Christ has come here at this time to set somebody free. He has come here at this time to pardon somebody's sins. You that have no sins shall have no pardon. You good people shall die in your sins. But, oh, you guilty ones, who humble yourselves under the hand of God, my Master thinks that it is a pity that you should be among these self-righteous people. So come right away, and trust your Saviour, and obtain life eternal through His precious blood; and to Him shall be glory forever and ever. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—1 Peter 4.]

THE REV. JACOB FRESHMAN,

Missionary to the Jews in New York.

REFERENCE to Mr. Freshman and his work among the Jews of New York has on several occasions been made in our remarks on Current Events. We now have pleasure in giving, on page 556, a portrait of Mr. Freshman.

He was born in Hungary on April 14th, 1844, and is, therefore, now in the thirty-ninth year of his age. His father, the late Dr. Freshman, was at one time the Rabbi of the Jewish Synagogue at Quebec, in Canada, a position to which he was transferred when his son Jacob was about twelve years of age. By a series of extraordinary providences he was led to embrace Christ as the true Messiah, and became a minister of the Gospel he previously despised, as the work of "the Nazarene."

His son Jacob, when a youth, was of a serious turn of mind, and of a studious disposition. At the age of thirteen he was confirmed, according to Jewish precedent, in the Synagogue at Quebec, his father being the officiating Rabbi. But when the Rabbi became a Christian, his most strenuous efforts were directed to leading the members of his household to become disciples of "Him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write." At first he encountered very serious opposition, but in the end the grace of God triumphed, and transformed opponents into sincere disciples and followers of Christ.

One of the first members of the family to follow in his father's footsteps was the lad Jacob, for, having diligently perused the Old Testament Scriptures, the Holy Spirit made him see clearly that Jesus is truly the Son of God. Subsequently he attended the evangelical preaching of the Rev. J. Elliott at the Wesleyan Church in Quebec, and it was through his instrumentality that he was led to see himself as a sinner. For a considerable time his experiences were most painful, and the future seemed to him without a ray of hope. One evening a friend was trying to point the young man to the Lamb of God, and invited him to a prayer-meeting, and it was then that he was able to throw himself upon the mercy of God in Christ. He felt the burden of his sin roll away, and he rejoiced in believing.

A love for the souls of the unsaved around him now filled Mr. Freshman with an intense enthusiasm. His first efforts were in the Sunday-school, but his qualifications clearly indicated that God had fitted and intended him for service in a wider field, and he was urged by his father to stand up in his pulpit at Hamilton, where Dr. Freshman was then located, to preach the Gospel. One day Dr. Freshman received a telegram from Montreal, summoning him to a missionary breakfast. His compliance necessitated his absence from home on the Sunday, and it was suggested to him that his son, Jacob, might perhaps occupy his pulpit on that day. "It is true," says the good Doctor, "he was only eighteen years of age; but I knew he had a mind equal to the emergency, notwithstanding his youth. When I mentioned the subject to him he thought I was beside myself. I continued to urge him until near midnight, and in a few hours I was to start on my journey. At length he reluctantly consented." Although he had been unable to make any preparation, the young man's ministrations gave gratification to the people, and were followed by the blessing of God.

He was afterward appointed a local preacher by the Rev. Dr. Rice, and at a later period entered the ministry, in which his experience has been very varied. He is now a minister in good standing of the Montreal Conference of the Methodist Church in Canada, but he has given up his ministerial charge to serve his brethren "according to the flesh," casting himself entirely upon the care of God. For more than twelve months he has been prosecuting his laudable mission among the Jews in New York, with a promising measure of success.

Mr. Freshman has travelled extensively and lectured with success on "The Manners and Customs of the Jewish People." A Hebrew-Christian Congregation has been organized by him in New York; preaching services and prayer-meetings are regularly held, and a number of conversions have taken place. The Gospel services have hitherto been held in Mr. Freshman's own house, 25 Seventh Street, but he is now endeavoring to raise funds for the extension of the work by erecting a Mission House in the city, at an estimated cost of $20,000, toward which the late Hon. W. E. Dodge contributed $1000, and Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P., has given $500. As a means of raising the fund for the mission Mr. Freshman is now engaged in a lecturing tour in Europe, where he is meeting with much success.

A LADY RESCUED FROM A BURNING HOUSE BY A BEFRIENDED BOY.

(See Illustration.)

Ragged, dirty, ugly. He had fallen in the muddy gutter; his hands and face were black, his mouth wide open, and sending forth sounds not the most musical. A rough hand lifted him up, and placed him against the wall. There he stood, his tears making little gutters down his begrimed cheeks. Men as they passed laughed at him, not caring for a moment to stop and inquire if he was really hurt. Boys halted a minute to jeer and load him with their insults. Poor boy! he hadn't a friend in the world that he knew of. Certainly he did not deserve one; but if none but the deserving had friends, how many would be friendless!

A lady is passing; her kindliness of heart prompts her to stay and say a word to the boys who are joking their companion, and laughing at his sorrow. Then she looks fixedly at the dirty, crouching lad against the wall. "Why, John, is it you?"

He removes one black fist from his eye and looks up. He recognizes her She has taught him at the ragged-school about the love of Jesus.

"Oh, ma'am, I'm so bad!"

She has him examined, then taken to the hospital. Afterward she visits him kindly and frequently.

Three years pass by.

There is a fire one night. A dwelling-house is in flames. The engines have not yet arrived. The inmates cannot be rescued. A boy has looked on. Suddenly he shouts, "Oh, she lives here!" Then he climbs up the heated, falling stairs. He fights against the suffocating smoke. He hunts about till he finds what he seeks. She has fainted—is dying perhaps. No! he will save her. Five minutes of agonizing suspense, and she is safe in the cool air.

The bystanders are struck with the intrepidity of the boy. He only walks away, muttering, "She didn't turn away from me when I was hurt."

O friends, the stone looks very rough at first sight, but it may be a diamond!

GEORGE GORDON'S STORY.

(See Illustration.)

A happy family circle surrounded the table in the dining-room of a Western farmer's home. The work of the day was finished, and six strong, healthy children, whose ages varied from seventeen to seven, were gathered at the evening meal. The appearance of the homestead within and without betokened prosperity and solid, substantial comfort.

The family at the supper-table seemed just such a family as one would expect to see in such a home. George Gordon, a man of about forty-five years, sat at the head of the table, a strong, well-built man, whose face told of exposure to sun and wind, but whose sparkling eye spoke of a heart soft enough yet and a disposition genial and kindly. His wife, a few years younger than her husband, was one of those large, blue-eyed, auburn-haired women, whose beauty never seems to arrive at maturity until they reach middle life and are surrounded by a troop of children. George Gordon could not have told her that she resembled a Madonna by one of the old masters; he never saw a Madonna, but if he had been asked what he thought of his wife, he would have said that King Lemuel's mother must have known just such a woman when she taught her son "the prophecy," which forms the thirty-first chapter of the book of Proverbs.

"Robert," said Helen, a full-grown girl of seventeen, the eldest of the family and the image of her mother, addressing her brother, a boy of fifteen, "I wish you had been at home this morning when the party of English tourists called. You ought to have seen a real live lord for once. There was a duke and his son, whom they said was a marquis, and there was an earl and ever so many great folks, just like you read in the old books of father's. They looked so grand and distinguished, I could fancy them wearing coronets and ermine robes. Of course they were not wearing them out here; they wore just ordinary clothes, but I suppose they wear their fancy robes at home. I wish you could have seen them. They stayed ever so long—while their horses were fed—and they talked quite sociably and pleasantly about the garden and the crops."

"I'm not a bit sorry I was away," Robert answered; "I would not give a button to see a lord. I've heard enough about them. I hate 'em."

"O Robert, don't say that," said his mother; "you have no reason to hate them, they never did you any harm."

"That's so, mother," he said, "but if they do harm to other folks, it's right to hate them just as I hate a snake, though it never struck me. I have heard plenty about English lords from O'Flaherty, and I don't like the breed. He says some of them have estates so big that they can walk above fifteen miles in a straight line without going off their own ground, and they just let great tracts lie wild for the hares and rabbits and pheasants to breed in, and thousands of acres are in their parks, and no crops grow on them, while poor creatures all around them are starving; and if any poor fellow snares a hare or knocks a pheasant over, he is clapped in jail and kept there for years. I don't like such selfish ways, and I say again I hate 'em, and it's right to do it."

"The lords who were here this morning," Helen said, "didn't look bad men, Robert, I don't think they are cruel and oppressive. You must not believe all that Irishman tells you."

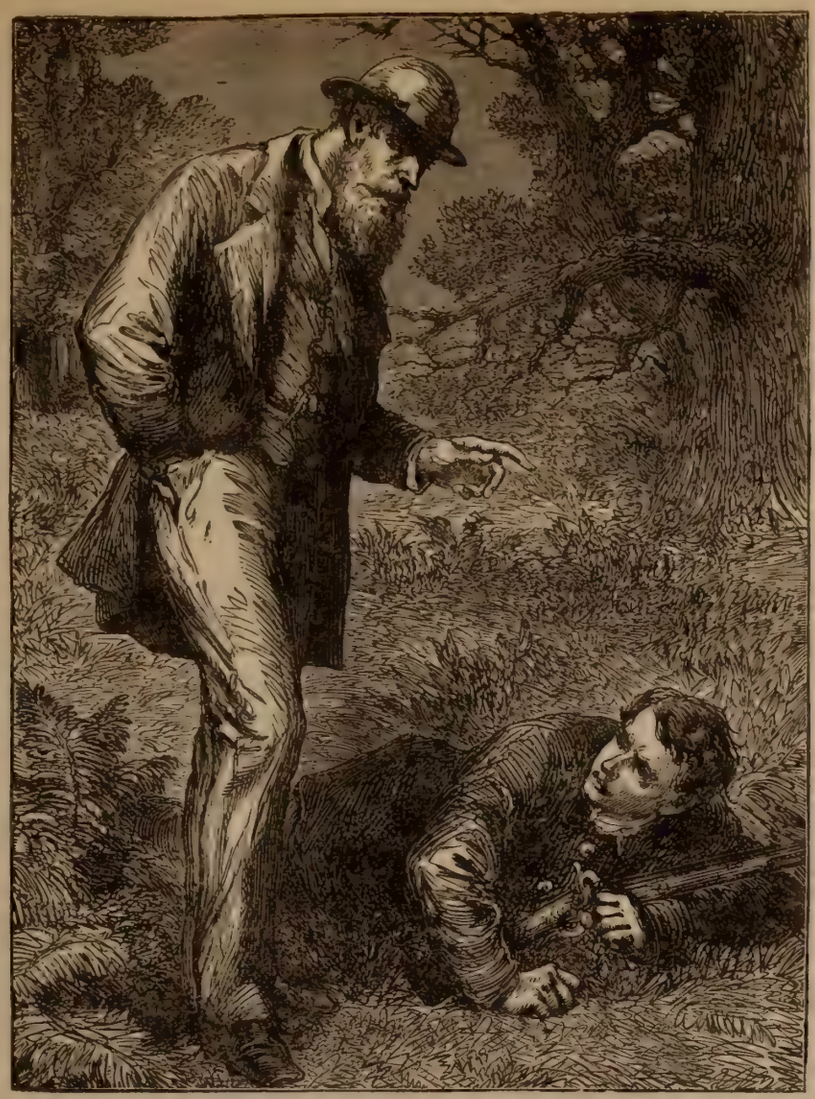
"Oh, they are all alike. They don't show in their true colors here, I dare say. You ought to see them among their poor dependents at home to understand what they are. But they had better make the best of their time; it is short. Some day the wretched, starving people will make them give up all the land that lies waste now, and they'll sow corn on it for the poor to eat. What do you say, father? You have lived among 'em, and you know whether they are a bad lot or not."

George Gordon had sat silent while this discussion was going on; he was listening, but seemed disinclined to say anything until Robert directly appealed to him. "Well, my boy," he said then, "I guess the candidate who came here when he was running for Congress was about right when he said I did not know anything about political and social economy. I don't. I never had much of an education, and these problems are too much for me. It don't seem right that these men should have such big estates that they don't cultivate, while their neighbors have no land and are starving; but if any man comes to me, and says somebody must be stripped of the land they honestly own, then I say no. I am against that; it isn't honest. I'm a law-abiding man, I am. Robbery is wrong, and no arguments can make it right. Things aren't just as they should be in the world, for one man to have so much and another nothing at all, but we can't make a wrong right by doing another wrong and calling it justice. But I can't argue about such things. I can't see my way. But I'll tell you a little story, if you like, about a lord, that happened in England when I was there."



A Crisis in George Gordon's Life.

"The events of this story," the farmer began, "happened in a village that was all the property of Lord Templeton, and close to it were his preserves full of game. The lord had been away from this property, living in Italy and Austria and other countries for twenty years, ever since he was thirty years old. Scarcely any one remembered him in the village except Mr. Lattimer, who kept the village inn and who had once been his butler.

"All the boys and men in the village knew Lattimer well, much too well; for with him the majority of the male part of the village spent their time and their few poor pence. There were some political economists among them, like Robert's friend O'Flaherty, who had schemes for setting the world right, and they would talk of the hard lot of the farm laborers and of the fine times Lord Templeton was having, till the men began to feel that somehow Lord Templeton was keeping them out of their rights and to have a grudge against him.

"One young man, who was considered rather a smart young fellow about a farm, was very much affected. He became discontented, disliked his work, had no heart in it, and finally was discharged by his employer for laziness.

"He began living by killing the game on Lord Templeton's land and selling it to game-dealers in the nearest town. He used to lay snares generally, but sometimes, when he knew the keepers would be at a distance, he would venture a shot or two.

"One day he knew this would occur, and he sauntered off to the preserve with his gun unscrewed and its parts concealed about his person. He was pretty successful, and was congratulating himself, when he heard a footstep, and saw a man, tall and well-dressed, passing. He knew all the keepers, so was sure this was not one, but was probably some passing stranger who had no business to interfere. He lay down among the fern, however, ready for another shot. But the stranger stopped and deliberately walked to the place where he lay, and demanded to know what he was doing. The young poacher partially raised himself, and insolently told the stranger to mind his own business. 'This is my business,' was the reply, 'I am Lord Templeton. You did not know I had returned.' The young man dropped his gun in terror. He had been caught in the very act, and Lord Templeton had only to say what he had seen to insure the poacher a term of imprisonment. 'How came you to take to so bad a business as this?' Lord Templeton asked. Then the young fellow began talking about the rights of man, the injustice of the great and wealthy, and the miseries of the poor. 'Ah!' said Lord Templeton, 'you have been at Lattimer's a little too much, I see. Now, if you had a chance to better yourself would you use it wisely?' 'That I would,' was the answer. 'Well, prove it, young man, by doing a year's steady work. If I hear in a year's time that you have done it, you shall have your chance.'

"The village soon saw the change in him, and approved, but thought keeping away from Lattimer's was carrying the point a little too far. But a pair of bright eyes, that the young fellow thought the most beautiful in all the world, shone brightly on him now, that had been full of tears very often as he stumbled down Lattimer's steps at closing time.

"The year passed away more pleasantly than the reformed poacher expected, and he worked very well without the beer. At the end of the year, twelve months to the day since Lord Templeton had caught him among the ferns, a footman in livery came to the cottage where he lived, with a message that his lordship would be glad to speak to him. He went to the Hall with a different feeling from the one he had when he entered it a year before. The interview was very satisfactory, too, for he came away with a beaming face. A month later the reformed poacher and the owner of the bright eyes were married, and sailed for America with money in hand to buy a farm of their own."

"Is that all, father?" said Robert. "Did he keep steady, did he get on?"

"Did he make a good husband?" inquired Helen.

"Ah!" said the farmer, "now I must stop. He had the best of wives, that I know, but as to himself, ask your mother, my dear, ask your mother."

But mother was crying silently, though apparently not very sorrowfully, for she rose, and throwing her arms around her husband's neck she kissed him tenderly, and then turned and smiled through her tears.

"Why, children," she said, "didn't you know? Father's been telling you his own story. The best father and husband that ever lived, but he won't join you, Robert, in hating the lords. One of them who might have made a convict of him, made a man of him instead."

"It is time for prayers now, my dears," said the farmer, his voice a little husky with a suspicion of tears in it. "Get me the Bible, Helen." Then he read of a heavenly home reserved for those who through Christ obtain mercy and the forgiveness of sins, and prayed that as he in the crisis of his life had profited by the mercy extended to him by human hands, so might all his dear ones accept that greater mercy won by Christ's sacrifice, and the happy home in which they were then gathered might be only a foretaste of that home in heaven, of which he had been reading, where they might all go, through the merits of the Saviour.

A SERIAL STORY.

Leaving Home.

THE death of Richard Holland might have had a salutary effect upon Sophy Chantrey, if it had not been for the shock of learning how deeply she had disgraced herself and her husband in the sight of his people. She felt that she could never again face those who had seen her on that Sunday morning. She shut herself up in her room, refusing to admit any one, except the servant who waited upon her, and steadily set herself against any communication with the world outside. Even her husband she would hardly speak to; and her child she would not see.

The strain and stress of her remorse was more than she could bear. Before the week was gone, she had fled for forgetfulness to the vice which bound her in so heavy a chain. All the cunning of her nature, so strangely perverted, was put into action to procure a supply of the stimulants she craved; and she escaped from her misery for a little while by losing herself in suicidal lethargy and stupefaction.

Mr. Chantrey himself felt it to be impossible to meet the gaze of his usual congregation; he shrank even from walking through the streets of his own town, while his shame was fresh upon him. He exchanged duties with fellow-clergymen, and so evaded the immediate difficulty. But he knew that this could not go on for long. He could not conscientiously retain a position such as he held, if he had not the moral and mental strength necessary for the discharge of its obligations. Strength of all kinds seemed to fail him. His physical vitality was low; the health he had gained in Madeira had been too severely taxed since his return.

He had fought bravely against the mental feebleness that was creeping gradually over him with a paralyzing languor; but he knew he could not bear the conflict much longer. Everything was telling against him. He would fain have proved to his people that a man can live out a noble, useful, Christ-like life, under crushing sorrows, and shame that was worse than sorrow. But it was not in him to do it. He found himself feeble and crippled, in the very thick of life's battle; and it appeared to him that his position as rector of the parish rendered his feebleness tenfold disastrous.

But this decay of power came slowly, though surely. By the close of his second winter in England he felt within himself that he must quit his country again, if he wished to live only a few years longer. There had been no bright sunny spot of gladness for him, no gleam of hope throughout the whole winter. He had been compelled to send his boy away again to school, to shield him from seeing the disgrace of his mother. His friends had almost ceased to come to his house, and he had no heart to go to theirs. It was only now and then that he accepted his aunt's invitations to dine alone with her.

"Aunt," he said one evening, when they two were alone together in her fantastic drawing-room, "I have resigned my living."

"Resigned your living!" she repeated in utter amazement, "resigned Upton Rectory!"

She could hardly pronounce the words; and she gazed at him with an air of bewilderment which brought a smile to his careworn face.

"Yes," he answered, "life has grown intolerable to me here."

"And what do you mean to do?" she asked.

"I am going out to my friend Warden," he replied, "who has a charge in New Zealand; he promises me a curacy under him, if I can get nothing better. But I am sure of a charge of my own very soon."

"A curate to Warden! a curate in New Zealand!" ejaculated Mrs. Bolton. "David, are you mad?"

"Not mad, but in most sober sadness," he said. "Life is impossible to me here, and under my circumstances; and I wish to live a few years longer for Sophy's sake, and my boy's. New Zealand is the very place for me."

"But you can go away again for a year or two," said his aunt, "and come back when your health is restored. The bishop will give you permission readily. You must not give up your living because your health fails."

"The bishop has my resignation, and my reasons for it," answered Mr. Chantrey, "and he has accepted it kindly and regretfully, he says; but he fully approves of it. All there is to be done now is to sell our household goods, and sail for a new home, in a new world."

"And Sophy?" gasped Mrs. Bolton; "what do you mean to do with her? Where shall you leave her?"

"She must come with me," he said; "I shall never leave her again. It will be a new chance for her; and with God's help she may yet conquer. Even if she cannot, it will be easier for me to bear my burden among strangers than here, where every one knows all about us. A missionary curate in New Zealand will be a very different personage from the rector of Upton."

He looked at his aunt with a smile, and an expression of hope, such as had not lit up his gray face for many a month. This new life opening before him, with all its social disadvantages, and many privations, would give his wife such an opportunity for recovery as the conventionalities of society at home could not furnish. Hope had visited him again, and he cherished it as a most welcome visitant.

"Good heavens!" cried Mrs. Bolton, lost in astonishment, "David, you must not throw yourself away in this manner! I will see the bishop myself, and recall to his memory his old friendship for the archdeacon. He cannot have promised the living yet to any one. What would become of me, here in Upton, settled as I am, with a stranger in the rectory? Why did you not ask my advice before taking such a rash step?"

"Because I should not have followed your advice," he answered. "I settled the whole matter in my own mind before I broached it even to Warden. It is the only chance for us both. I am a broken, defeated man."

"O my boy!" she exclaimed, with tears in her eyes, "I cannot consent to your going away. You have always been my favorite nephew; and I could not endure to see a stranger in your place. It is all Sophy's fault. And why should you sacrifice your life, and Charlie's, for her? Let some place at a distance be found for her; no one will blame you, and you will not suffer so much from the disgrace, if you do not witness it. Only stay in Upton, and all I have shall be yours. It will be a happy place to you again, if you will only wait patiently for brighter days."

"No," he said, sorrowfully; "it has been a pleasant place to me, but it can never be so again. I must go for Sophy's sake. There is no hope for her here; there is hope for her among new scenes and fresh influences. I have spoken to her about it, and she is eager to go; she feels that there would be a chance for her. To turn away from my purpose now would be to doom her to her sin without hope of deliverance. It would be impossible for me to do that."

It was a terrible blow to Mrs. Bolton. She foresaw endless mortifications and heartburnings for herself in the presence, and under the rule, of a strange rector at Upton, over whom she would have no more authority or influence than any other parishioner. Besides, she was really fond of her nephew, and anxious to make his life smooth and agreeable to him. No one could be blind to the fact that his health was giving way again, and she thought with some apprehension of the life of hardship and poverty he was choosing. That he should throw away all that was desirable and advantageous for the sake of his wife, who was merely a trouble and dishonor to him, was an infatuation that she could not understand. He pointed out to her that he was also losing his influence over his people, and she maintained that even this was no reason why he should give up a suitable living and a pleasant rectory. At last, angry with him, and apprehensive for her future position in the parish, she refused to listen any longer to his representations, and spent the few weeks that intervened before their departure in a state of offended estrangement.

All Upton was thrown into a ferment by the unexpected news that their rector had resigned his living, and was about to emigrate to New Zealand. At first it was declared too strange to be true. Then in a few of the lower class taverns it was said to be too good to be true; but in the Upton Arms, where the landlady considered it her duty to be regular at church, and even the landlord thought it the thing to go there pretty often, a civil amount of regret was expressed. It was the fault of his wife, said most of the respectable parishioners, who unfortunately did not know when she had had enough of a good thing. Even those who were in the same plight with herself threw a stone at poor Sophy when they heard that their pleasant-spoken, affable, popular rector, as he used to be, was about to flee his country. Very few sympathized with him. He was taking an unheard-of, preposterous, fanatical course. How could a man in his senses give up a living of $1600 a year, with a pretty rectory and glebe-land, for a colonial curacy?

But there was one person who heard the news, and brooded over it silently, with very different feelings. The last few months had been very tranquil ones for Ann Holland. The one anxiety of her quiet life had been removed, and after the first sorrow was passed she had found her home a very peaceful place without her brother. Her old neighbors could come in now to take tea with her without any dread of being rudely disturbed. The business did not suffer; it was rather increasing, and she had had some thoughts of employing a second journeyman. But to hear that Mr. Chantrey was going to leave Upton, and that very soon she should see neither him nor Charlie, who made her house so merry whenever he ran in, was as great a blow to her as to Mrs. Bolton.

Ann Holland had been born in the house she lived in, and had never dwelt anywhere else. All her world lay within the compass of a few miles from it, among the farm-houses where her business or her early friendships had made her acquainted with the inhabitants. The people of Upton only were her fellow-countrymen; all others were foreigners, and to her, lawful objects of mistrust. Every other land save her own seemed a strange and perilous place. Of New Zealand she had not even any vague ideas, for it was nothing but a name to her. She had far clearer views of heaven, of that other world into which she had seen so many of her childhood's friends pass away. To lie down upon her bed and die would have been a familiar journey to her compared with that strange voyage across boundless seas to a country of which she knew nothing but the name.

Yet they were going—Mr. Chantrey, with his failing health; Mrs. Chantrey, a victim to a miserable vice; and Charlie, the young, inexperienced boy. What a helpless set! She tried to picture them passing through the discomforts and dangers of a savage life, as she supposed it to be; Mr. Chantrey ill, poor, friendless, and homeless. Upon her screen were the announcements of his coming to the living, of his marriage, the birth of both children, and the death of one. She read them over word for word, with eyes fast filling and growing dim with tears. Very soon there would be another column in the newspaper telling of his resignation and departure—perhaps shortly afterward of his death. He would die in that far-off country, with no one to care for him or nurse him except his unhappy wife. She could not bear to think of it. She must go with them.

But how could she ever bear to quit Upton? All her own people were buried in the churchyard there, and she kept their graves green with turf, and their headstones free from moss. She had no memories or associations anywhere else, and she clung to all such memories and cherished them fondly. There was no one in Upton who knew the pedigrees of every family as she did. Even her household goods, old and quaint as they were, had a halo from the light of other days about them. How many persons, dead and gone now, had she seen sit opposite to her in that old arm-chair! How often had childish faces looked laughingly at themselves in her pewter plates?

Her mother's chairs and sofa, worked in tent-stitch, which only saw the daylight twice a year—what would become of them, and what common uses would they be put to in any other house? Her heart failed her when she thought of leaving these things. It was not, moreover, simply leaving them, as she would have to do when she died, but she must see them sold and scattered before her eyes, and behold the vacant places empty and forlorn, without their old belongings. Could she bear to be so uprooted?

RUTH AND NAOMI.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 9, Ruth 1 : 14-22. Golden Text, 1 : 16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Elimelech's Care for Himself — His Miserable Failure—Naomi's Plight—Her Warning to her Daughters-in-law—Their Choice—The Test of Discipleship—The Question of Service—Entering the Harvest-Field—The True Bride-Spirit—Claiming Union—The Nearer Kinsman—The Dead Self.

The book of Ruth is a beautiful picture as well as history. It represents God's training of the bride of Christ. Ruth was by birth a Moabitess, and became united in marriage to the son of a man who had practically lost his faith in God. Elimelech, her father-in-law, had left his own land to do the best for himself in a time of famine, and miserable was his success. He was away from the land of promise, the sons whom he was seeking to benefit disobeyed God in their marriage with heathen wives, then both died, and he soon afterward died himself. Had he thrown himself upon the Lord and trusted the maintenance of his family to Him, he might have lived on in the Lord's land under His blessing and His smile. As it was, the result of his own caretaking was to leave his wife a widow and childless, with two heathen daughters-in-law.

But our loving heavenly Father met the lonely widow, and brought to her knowledge that the Lord had "visited His people in giving them bread." The good news was not kept to herself, she shared it with her daughters-in-law, and their first impulse was to return with her to the Lord's chosen land. The new discovery of His love seems to have inspired her with a fresh zeal, and, without doubt, she had told them, not only of the land, but of the Lord who had given it. It is when we are filled with a consciousness of God's love to us that our lips are opened to tell others of His goodness, and we long to make them sharers in our joy and peace.

But every revelation of God involves responsibility, and calls for self-surrender. Naomi set before her daughters-in-law how much was involved in the step they were about to take; it was to renounce forever all self-made happiness. And this test it was which brought out in Ruth the true spirit of the bride. Orpah, who had not calculated on any such thing as real self-surrender, kissed her mother-in-law, and returned "unto her people and

UNTO HER GODS."

Not so Ruth: God had made Himself known to her, and her response was a full one. She said to Naomi, "Entreat me not to leave thee, nor to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: God do so to me, and more also, if ought but death part thee and me." Here was a distinct choice which involved the most complete self-surrender: any lot with Naomi was better than the most prosperous without her; domestic happiness separate from Naomi and Naomi's God had no charms for Ruth.

It is just in this way that an awakened soul is brought to choose Jesus, and to follow Him at whatever cost. Simply accepting His salvation is not TRUE DISCIPLESHIP.

To be a disciple is to choose Him before friends, before comfort, before domestic happiness, before all else, because the heart sets a priceless value on Him. The best of all things becomes simply this, "Do they separate me from Jesus? will they involve my leaving Jesus?" "Entreat me not to leave Thee." The question ceases to be one of obligation, "What is my duty? what ought I to do?" Himself absorbs the soul, and gives color to all else. This is true discipleship. Following Jesus may be at the cost of separation, either morally or in point of fact, from father, mother, wife, child, brother or sister, but the one who chooses them before Jesus cannot be His disciple, for "whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after Me, cannot be My disciple . . . whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be My disciple" (Luke 14 : 26, 27-33).

Once the question of discipleship settled, whether is it to be the world or Christ, there arises the question of service. Naomi had been to Ruth a saviour from the land of her birth with all its heathen associations. By her she was brought into the land of promise and came to Bethlehem (the house of bread). Once there Ruth sought, not from any stern sense of duty, but impelled by love, to manifest her gratitude by loving service. It was harvest time; and she said to her mother-in-law, "Let me now go to the field, and glean ears of corn after him in whose sight I shall find grace." She went, and the first words which fell upon her ear from the lips of the lord of the harvest-field were these, "The Lord be with you." Here Ruth was at home, the God of Naomi was known here.

It is a happy thing when a truly consecrated child of God enters and becomes a gleaner, if not a reaper, of precious, immortal souls, and our harvest work always takes its tone from our experience. If we ourselves are in a constant struggling and striving, we shall lead our spiritual children into the same experience; if we know the blessed truth of rest in the Lord, they will speedily enter into the same and be kept as others are not, from the power and dominion of sin.

Ruth was hardly in the harvest-field before Boaz took notice of her, and soon he came and spoke to her. Jesus makes precious revelations to our souls, sometimes through some Christian drawing us away from the far land to His own house of bread, shining through that friend or through the representations of such an one as to win us into a position of nearness and of devoted consecration, even when our knowledge of His Person is very indistinct. But when He speaks right into our souls and claims relationship, surprising us by His unsuspected love, then it seems as though our heart must go out in full return of love to Him. "Hearest thou not, my daughter?" Ruth was overpowered, she fell on her face, and bowed herself to the ground, and said unto him, "Why have I found grace in thine eyes, that thou shouldest take knowledge of me, seeing I am a stranger?" This is the true bride-spirit, self-emptiness, crushed to nothingness by the love of Jesus.

There are some who boastfully blaze abroad any little communication which the Lord may make to them, in such a way as to lead others to think that there is some special virtue in them, and that the Lord is rewarding them for some great faithfulness on their part. Not so those who have the true the love of Jesus swallows up with them all thought of self; the more He blesses the smaller they get, and the lower down. The answer of Boaz was most precious; he knew, for he had been fully shown, how much Ruth had given up for her mother-in-law, and how she had voluntarily exiled herself for her sake, and he said, "The Lord recompense thy work, and a full reward be given thee of the Lord God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust."

Ruth had dreamed of no reward; the service itself was reward to her. This, again, is a characteristic of the true bride soul. All thought of bargaining with God is absent, all thought of laying God under obligation and compelling Him by the earnestness of prayer or fasting, or by the strictness of our consecration, is entirely absent when His love fills our hearts. On the contrary, we see Him more than willing to bless us, not needing to be forced, and we see with surprise and humiliation how little we understand the love which longs and waits its moment to bless us. The soul which pants for union with Christ sees Him, not herself, and sees His side of everything. Boaz himself provided food for her when meal-time came, and she took the parched corn from his hand.

When Ruth returned to her mother-in-law and told her how she had been gleaning in the field of Boaz and how graciously he had spoken to her, Naomi blessed the Lord, and said, "The man is of near kin to us, one that hath a right to redeem." Patiently and steadily throughout the harvest season, Ruth worked on, she did not grow tired; knowing she was held in favor it was no burden to her. That we may work with gladness, we need the constant consciousness that we please God. When the harvest was over, Naomi instructed Ruth in the law of Israel, which requires that the next of kin shall take the childless widow to raise up unto his brother a name in Israel (Deut. 25 : 5-10), and told Ruth how she was to proceed that she might to which the near kinship of Boaz entitled her. It is a blessed light which dawns upon us when we see union with Christ to be our eternal portion, it elevates our thoughts and inspirations, and makes the world in comparison seem doubly insipid. But when the Spirit of God leads us on to claim such union now, to appeal for oneness with Jesus as our right now by reason of His own relationship and His Word (John 17 : 23), then there can be no second object in our minds.

But Ruth must first wash herself, precious type of the cleansing from all sin, then followed the anointing, type of the unction of the Holy Ghost, then she was clad in fitting raiment, and so presented herself. Boaz did not repudiate her claim, but the very claim itself caused a discovery; there was a kinsman nearer than he. There can be no real experimental union with Jesus until He is the very nearest, the very dearest of all. If in seeking complete union with Christ, that near kinsman, our own self-life turns up, what shall we do? How put him out of the way? Thank God, that is the Lord's business. Naomi said, "The man will not be in rest until he have finished the thing this day." Thank God, Jesus who undertakes our case will not be in rest until He Himself has fully dealt with every hindrance to our full union with Him. Naomi said, "Sit still, my daughter;" and this is our true position, sitting at the feet of Jesus. "In returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and confidence shall be your strength." Isa. 30 : 15. If we believe that the Lord Jesus has really undertaken the matter and we count Him equal to the work, then all which is left us is quiet confidence, sure that He cannot, will not fail. When we begin to worry and get discouraged, then Jesus stands by until we are quiet; He can do nothing until we cease from our own works and enter into His rest (Heb. 4 : 10).

Boaz undertook to deal with the kinsman, and lost no time. He sat in the gate where he could see all the incomers and outgoers, and it was not long before the kinsman appeared. Boaz called him in the presence of ten men of the elders of the city, and told him that Naomi sold a parcel of land belonging to her husband Elimelech, and said, "I thought to advertise thee, saying, . . . If thou wilt redeem it, redeem it; but if thou wilt not redeem it, then tell me, that I may know: for there is none to redeem it beside thee; and I am after thee." The kinsman was quite open to personal advantage, and answered, "I will redeem it." But when Boaz added that such redemption involved the taking Ruth the Moabitess, to wife, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, then the kinsman drew back and said, "I cannot redeem it for myself, lest I mar my own inheritance." Boaz called upon the elders to bear witness to the transaction. Jesus would have our union with Him to be so full, so real, so blessed, that all around us shall see that self's claim upon us is dead and exists no more, and that union with Him is present now. Amen.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Count de Chambord, the Last Descendant of the Bourbon Kings of France, died at Frohsdorf, in Austria, on August 24th. He was sixty-three years of age. The autopsy revealed the fact that the eminent physician who was called in consultation on his case was in error in saying that no cancer existed. The surgeon who made the autopsy found that the count died of cancer of the stomach and atrophy of the kidneys. His sufferings must have been fearful, but he bore them with fortitude. The Count de Paris, the head of the Orleans branch of the family, succeeds the deceased prince in his aspirations to the throne of France. The prospects of the monarchical party are improved by the death of the Count de Chambord. The two sections of the party are now for the first time in a century united, the legitimists being released from their allegiance by the death, without issue, of their leader. The Count de Paris is also a more enlightened, energetic, and capable man than the Count de Chambord, and would in all respects command more completely than he, the confidence of the French people. It is not expected, however, that the count will make any move at present toward the assertion of his pretensions. He is forty-five years of age. He served under McClellan in the Northern army during the early campaigns of our war.

Severe Fighting is Reported from Tonquin. The French army, in the attempt to occupy the Red River Delta, met with a series of repulses. They found one fortress in the rear of another on their line of march. These were shelled by the gunboats, and afterward stormed by the French troops. They were stubbornly defended, and the French, after fourteen hours' hard fighting, were compelled to fall back. The Black Flag warriors, aided by Chinese refugees, were well armed and disciplined, and fought with unexpected valor. The losses on both sides are not known, as the French account that the loss on their side was only eighteen killed, is obviously untrue. The fortress so stubbornly defended was evacuated by the Chinese the day following the battle, but they retired in good order, and it is expected they will contest every step of the French advance.

Mr. Shaw, the English Missionary whom the French seized and imprisoned in Madagascar, has been released. The charge made against him was that of harboring in his house two officials of the Hova Government. It appears that Mr. Shaw was a trusted adviser of the Queen of Madagascar, who, recognizing the fact that the progress made in civilization in the island has been mainly the result of the labors of the English missionaries, has in her recent difficulties applied to them for counsel. Mr. Shaw's knowledge of the Malagasy language enabled him to act as interpreter for the court. He, in common with the other missionaries, perfectly understood the fraudulent character of the claims made by the French Government, and sympathized with the Queen of Madagascar. It is supposed that his attitude was known to the French admiral, who took advantage of the visit of the two Malagese officials to Mr. Shaw's house to arrest the missionary. The incident has occasioned a coolness, between the two nations, which the missionary's release will not altogether dispel.

The British Parliament was Prorogued on Saturday last, and unless some unexpected emergency arises, will not reassemble until next February. The Queen's speech, delivered on the occasion by her commissioners confirms the report that the withdrawal of English troops from Egypt will soon be completed. Of Egyptian affairs she said: "The administrative reorganization of Egypt, though retarded at important points by the visitation of cholera, has steadily advanced. The aim of the temporary occupation of Egypt by my military forces, the considerations which must govern its duration and the constant direction of my efforts to the maintenance of established rights to tranquillity in the East and to the welfare of the Egyptian people, have been more than once explained to you, and they remain unchanged." The view taken of Irish affairs is roseate, and it may be hoped that the government, by its more intimate acquaintance with the condition of the country than that enjoyed by the general public, is justified in the language it puts into the Queen's mouth as to that unhappy country. She said: "I can refer with greater satisfaction than on some former occasions to the condition of Ireland. The late combination against the fulfilment of contracts, especially for the payment of rent, has been in a great degree broken up. There is a marked diminution in agrarian crime. Associations having murder for their object have been checked by the detection and punishment of the offenders."

Notice of a Motion to Grant Home Rule to Ireland has been given in the British House of Commons. On August 22d, amid loud cheers, Mr. Jesse Collings, liberal, member for Ipswich, gave notice that at the next session of Parliament he would offer a resolution declaring that "it is desirable to grant a measure of home rule to Ireland as the best means of securing permanent peace to the Irish." The significance of this step consists in the fact that Mr. Collings is a fellow-townsman and an intimate friend of Mr. Chamberlain, one of the most influential members of Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet, and it is well known that Mr. Collings and Mr. Chamberlain are in accord in their views on all political questions. Mr. Chamberlain is regarded by the advanced wing of the Liberal party as its leader, and in the event of Mr. Gladstone's death or retirement, Mr. Chamberlain would be the radical candidate for the Premiership. If, therefore, he sympathizes with his friend Mr. Collings on this subject, the prospects of Home Rule for Ireland may be considered to have materially improved.

A Disastrous Collision Occurred in the English Channel on Sunday last. The French steamer St. Germain, bound from Havre to New York, was approaching the Eddystone Lighthouse about three o'clock in the morning, when she collided with the steamer Woodburn, from Madras, India, bound for London. The Woodburn sank within five minutes, taking all hands down, of whom only eleven were saved by the tug Recovery, which at the time was towing the Woodburn into port. Accounts differ as to the manner of the collision. One says that the St. Germain passed close on the starboard of the Recovery, when some hailing took place. This appears to have been misunderstood on board the French vessel. She was hailed to starboard her helm, but, instead of doing that, she ported her helm. At the same time the Recovery starboarded her helm with the view of getting away, and the result was to haul the Woodburn's head over to port and cause her to move across the course which the St. Germain was taking. The St. Germain was running at a speed of twelve knots. She ran right over the Woodburn. The Woodburn's shaft was carried away by the collision, causing her to sink immediately. The captain, sixteen of the crew, and one passenger were lost. The St. Germain had on board six hundred passengers, who were transferred for safety to the, Recovery and landed at Plymouth.

A Spirit of Dangerous Agitation has been aroused in India by the proposal to give native judges, in some cases, jurisdiction over Europeans. The Europeans naturally protest against the natives sitting in judgment over them, and their friends in England are endeavoring to prevent the act being carried into execution. They have presented to the government a memorial, setting forth their objections to the bill, and affirming their conviction that such a measure was required neither by the necessities of administration nor by the expediencies of policy. "It is certain," the memorialists observe, "that this bill, if it is persisted in, will keep alive in the future those mischievous antipathies which its introduction has revived, and thereby will add seriously to the difficulties, already sufficiently great, of Indian administration." However this may be, Mr. John Bright gave expression to convictions of another character. Speaking at a recent public meeting, he said: "The bill is in accordance with the principles set forth in a proclamation of the queen at the close of the mutiny. India is not committed to our control to be held as a field for English ambition and greed." British rule in India is, according to many students of prophecy, foredoomed, and at best sustained only by principles and agencies of the most imperfect and precarious operation. This opinion appears in a strong light since the commencement of the excitement.

Dr. Ziemann's Evangelistic Labors in Germany have aroused the enmity of the rationalists. Many neological pastors are in arms against him. In Dortmund they sent him a letter forbidding him to hold meetings, but the doctor held them. Over 3000 people crowded the hall. In Hagen the enemy had boasted that the doctor would get no hall, they had bribed the landlords; but a woman of high rank, and with a warm heart in the cause, went personally to secure the hall, which was not refused her—and though a plot had been arranged to disturb the meeting, the power of God secured deep attention.

A Socialist Demonstration at Geneva Took place recently. The mass of those who attended were discontented workmen, not of the greatest intelligence or respectability, and speeches of undisguised hostility to constituted authority were made, and a demand was made upon the State to provide them with employment. The workmen afterward proceeded to the Hotel de Ville, and on the refusal of the authorities to receive a deputation from their body, several of them harangued their comrades before the building. A man named Heritici, the chief organizer of the demonstration, unfurled a red flag, but was seized at that moment by the police, who also arrested several other ringleaders. The place was afterward cleared, the public warmly applauding the action of the authorities. The spirit of anarchic confusion displayed at Geneva is common to all large centres, and its spread in recent years by all sorts of pretences and under all kinds of disguises, only further illustrates the fact that slowly but surely the forces of evil are being massed in preparation for the terrible conflict with law and righteousnes which must characterize the death-throes of the dispensation.

The Influence of the Aristocracy in France has been waning during the past quarter of a century, and continues decreasing. The Paris correspondent of the London Record furnishes an explanation of the fact. He says the Legitimists have neither the force of character nor the comprehension of things which might save them from obscurity and inaction. For the present they are organizing processions, pilgrimages, masses, acts of contrition, to obtain the Duke of Chambord's restoration to health. The great efforts of the intercession are directed to the "sacred heart of Jesus." A Jesuit, the Rev. Father de la Colombière, who died a few years ago, is proposed for beatification. "Let us then," says the Univers, "pray to Father de la Colombière, who will intercede on behalf of our prince. His interest in the matter is identified with ours, for if a great miracle is accomplished through his intercession, it will greatly forward the cause of his beatification." The coarse trading notion conveyed in the suggestion disgusts the masses as much as its superstition.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman for August contains: "The Church in Resurrection," by Mrs. Fielder; "The Second Advent and Glorious Epiphany," by Rev. W. Frith; "Fallen Angels," by Rev. T. J. Malyon, LL.B., and other papers on unfulfilled prophecy, with a summary of passing events from a prophetic standpoint. Price six cents, annual subscription seventy cents. HUMBERT I., KING OF ITALY—Casamiccioli Destroyed by an Earthquake on July 28, 1883.

KING HUMBERT OF ITALY.

Birth in 1844 — His Father's Dominion—His Patriotic Services—Marriage in 1868—Succeeds to the Throne in 1878—An Attempt to Assassinate Him—Liberal Characteristics.

THE attention of the world has recently been directed to Italy in an especial manner, on account of the terribly fatal earthquake which occurred there on Saturday, July 28th, causing the utter destruction of the beautiful town of Casamicciola (a picture of which appears on our front page), and occasioning considerable damage to the adjacent villages of Lacceameno and Forio. Prominent among those who visited the scene of death and desolation, for the purpose of cheering the survivors, comforting the wounded, and endeavoring by sympathy and appropriate agencies to mitigate the horrors of the catastrophe, was the King of Italy, and this week we avail ourselves of the opportunity to give his portrait and a brief sketch of his career.

BIRTH AND PARENTAGE.

King Humbert is the eldest son and second child of the late King Victor Emmanuel, his sister, Princess Clotilde, the wife of Prince Napoleon Jerome Bonaparte, being one year older. He was born on March 14th, 1844, and is therefore now in the fortieth year of his age. His mother was before her marriage Archduchess Adelaide of Austria.

The kingdom of Sardinia, including the Principality of Piedmont, with the territory of Genoa and the hereditary Duchy of Savoy, as well as the Island of Sardinia, was ruled by Charles Albert, who abdicated in 1849, after the defeat at Novara, in favor of his son, the late King Victor Emmanuel, who was enabled, by the extraordinary events of 1859 to 1870, recently described in connection with the life of Guiseppe Garibaldi, to annex to his dominion all the other parts of Italy. He was proclaimed King of Italy in March, 1861, by a vote of the Italian Parliament at Turin, representing every province and capital except Rome and Venice, which were joined to the kingdom, respectively, in 1866 and 1870. But the work of reorganizing the ancient Kingdom of the two Sicilies devolved in large measure on the Present King, Humbert.

HIS SERVICES.

In July, 1862, Prince Humbert visited Naples and Palermo, while Garibaldi was at the very zenith of his fame, and shared the popularity of the great Liberator. When, three or four years later, the war between Prussia and Austria was imminent, Prince Humbert was despatched to Paris to ascertain the sentiments of the French Government in reference to the alliance between Italy and Prussia. On the outbreak of hostilities he hastened to take the field, obtained the command of a division of General Cialdini's army with the title of Lieutenant-General, and was present at the disastrous battle of Custozza on June 23d, 1866, where, it is said, he performed prodigies of valor.

On April 28th, 1868, Prince Humbert married, at Turin, his first cousin, the Princess Marguerite Marie Thérèse Jeanne of Savoy. After the seizure of Rome by the Italian troops in 1870, Prince Humbert and the Princess Marguerite took up their residence in Rome, which at this time became at last the Capital of a United Italy. Formerly the kingdom was composed of the separate Kingdoms of Sardinia, the two Sicilies, the Pontifical States, the Lombardo-Venetian provinces of the Austrian Empire, the Grand Duchy of Tuscany, the Duchies of Parma and Modena, and the Republic of San Marino.

KING OF ITALY.

Humbert succeeded to the throne of Italy on the death of his father, on January 9th, 1878, and on the nineteenth day of the same month took the oath of fidelity to the Constitution before the united Senators and Deputies, and subsequently delivered an address in which he declared it to be the "faith of his House and his own strength, that the religious observance of free institutions is the best safeguard against all dangers," and that his only aspiration was to deserve the praise, "He was worthy of his father."

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE HIM.

As King Humbert was making a State entry into Naples, on November 17th, 1878, a man named Giovanni Passanante approached the royal carriage and attempted to assassinate his Majesty with a poniard. The king fortunately escaped with a slight scratch, but Signor Cairoli, the Prime Minister, who was riding with him, was wounded seriously in the thigh.

King Humbert, although a Roman Catholic, is liberal toward Protestants, and free from any persecuting or intolerant spirit. Under his rule, Protestant missions are freely carried on in Italy. In permitting the efforts of the evangelists, the king has incurred the enmity of the Pope, who, though residing in the same city, holds no communication with him.

THE RECENT EARTHQUAKE IN ISCHIA.

THE terrible catastrophe at Ischia has been already described in these columns (see page 496), and it is not necessary, therefore, to do more than furnish a few supplemental incidents to those previously given. It will be remembered that the calamity took place on the night of Saturday, July 28th. There was no sign whatever at Ischia giving warning of the fearful catastrophe impending. The evening is described as lovely and peaceful. The Gulf of Naples was like a mirror; not a breath of air was stirring; not a sail was to be seen. As darkness came on, the canopy of heaven was brilliantly studded with stars. The many visitors with which Casamicciola was crowded were enjoying the balmy Italian night. Many had gone to the theatre, where, by a singular coincidence, the play was a burlesque, which opened with a scene representing an earthquake. Others were enjoying a concert given in one of the hotels, called the Piccola Sentinella, and there, as if with prophetic irony, a pianist was playing Chopin's "Funeral March." In less than a quarter of a minute Death with one stroke laid his hand on thousands, and this scene of happy, careless enjoyment was changed to one of desolation, while the sound of gay laughter gave place to the shrieks of the dying.

ONE WHOLE FAMILY

fortunately escaped by having taken boat half an hour before to enjoy the evening on the water near the shore. They suddenly heard a roaring noise; the water became agitated; Casamicciola was instantly wrapped in a dense cloud; they heard the shrieks and groans from within the cloud, and, terrified, laid hands to the oars and rowed out as far as they could.

A NIGHT OF INTENSE HORROR.

The night passed by the survivors amid the ruins was one of intense horror; parents wandering about in misery seeking their children, and others calling in vain for lost relatives. When assistance arrived on Sunday morning there was not a single house standing, except a little church which had been unroofed, near the harbor, and three cottages, in which it was impossible to obtain shelter.

As soon as the extent of the catastrophe became known, steamers were sent with troops to rescue the survivors and bring off the wounded. They worked with great zeal, despite the danger by which they were surrounded from the crumbling ruins. The authorities, military and civil, vied with each other in the double task of saving the wounded and drawing the dead from their temporary tomb. This latter task was especially dreadful, the bodies of the victims in the course of a few hours being swollen and discolored to a frightful degree. The danger of the work, too, was considerable. At one time there were no less than thirty Bersaglieri and several guards and workmen severely wounded from unavoidable

ACCIDENTS AMONG THE RUINS.

The poor fellows were spurred on in their exertions by the faint cries and lamentations of the entombed and helpless people, which came forth from the fissures of the appalling masses of broken masonry which they were everywhere trying to penetrate—and when these ceased, by knockings and other faint appeals for help. On the Sunday the worst cases had to be taken down to the little piazza, the only open space away from the crumbling ruins and tottering walls, and while wooden sheds were being hastily erected, the surgeons commenced their work there in the open air. No less than five amputations were being proceeded with at one time. Planks, tents, bedding, and appliances, however, soon poured in, and the wounded were despatched to Naples, where they soon filled to overflowing all the available space in the numerous hospitals.

SEVERAL WONDERFUL RESCUES

were made. Two young women were found on the following Tuesday afternoon who could only make their whereabouts known by means of a faint tapping, hardly audible to their rescuers. The masonry of their room had fallen so as to form an arch over the bed in which they lay. The mother of the younger lay dead at a few yards distance, and they had remained helpless in the neighborhood of the putrefying corpse from Saturday until Tuesday afternoon, with no nourishment but one plum and one pear which they found near them.

A volume could easily be filled with the incidents of this memorable catastrophe. The salon of the Hotel Piccola Sentinella was fuller than usual, owing to the attraction of an English amateur pianist, who until that night had always refused to play. A small roll of music was between the knees of the corpse, while on the piano were Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise" and a small volume of "The Beauties of Shakespeare." One lady, finding the stairs of her house gone, although the walls stood, tied her infant between two pillows and threw it into the road, where it was found unhurt; but in attempting to lower herself by means of sheets she fell and broke her leg. In another house, two young children found fragments of masonry falling on the bed on which they lay; the little boy of five managed to extricate his baby sister, and then both children went to sleep again and were so found quite unharmed by the Carbineers. On the Monday an entire family were got out alive from a cellar in which they had remained buried thirty-six hours. Another exploring party found a farmhouse of which only two walls were left standing. On the top of these were an aged couple, who had sat perched up there opposite each other since Saturday night, unable to help themselves or each other.

FLIGHT OF THE INHABITANTS.

Many of the terror-stricken inhabitants, flying shrieking to the shore, were overwhelmed in their flight and buried by the falling tenements or the tremendous quantities of débris flung about. The violence of the shock once subsided, nothing could be heard but the shrieks of the wounded and terrified people. Every light had been extinguished. A dense cloud of dust, blinding and suffocating to the survivors, hung over the scene, and to add to the horrors of the situation, houses half shaken continued to fall upon the miserable people seeking for shelter from the general ruin. For hours there was little or no relief for the poor sufferers. Those who had escaped were at the outset too panic-stricken to render assistance, and when the attempt was made the efforts and appliances were entirely inadequate to cope with the disaster.

VISIT OF THE KING.

King Humbert visited the island on Wednesday, August 1st. He reached Casamicciola shortly before six o'clock in the morning. He was accompanied by the Premier, Signor Depretis, and two others. He displayed the deepest sympathy with the terrible distress of the people, making a careful examination of the ruins, and, being especially impressed with the awful and most extraordinary havoc that had been wrought by the shock in the upper town, broke forth several times into exclamations of astonishment and grief. The Minister of Public Works urged him to turn back, owing to the difficulty of the ascent, but he replied, "Where my people can go, there I can go. We are all on a level in such a calamity as this. Sorrow makes us all equal." All of the English and Americans in Naples felt a deep interest in the fate of Miss Moore, an elderly, pious, benevolent English lady, who has done so much for the spiritual and bodily welfare of the poor of Ischia for many years past. Her life is spared, though she is badly wounded and her home is one mass of ruins. The king, who remained some time on the scene, listened patiently to the story of all who approached him, and replied with kindly and benevolent words to hysterical complaints of the groups of old people and women and children who remained among the ruins, as if unable to quit the place of their former dwellings. He visited the tents of the Red Cross Society, and thanked the members of that gallant band for their philanthropic labors. From Lacco the king returned to Naples.

TOM TIT.

By Rev. Charles Courtenay.

ON the Tuesday afternoon following Miss Earnshaw found herself in the neighborhood of Tom Tit's abode. A very dreary place it was. But the house itself was the most dreary of all. Broken windows stuffed with rags, gate off its hinges, door black and grimy with dirt, and, indeed, every well-known accompaniment of poverty, degradation, and sin.

She had heard high voices when she entered the court, but, of course, knew not from whence they proceeded. And it was in a very disagreeable manner that she was to obtain the information, for no sooner did she approach the door than it flew violently open, and she found herself most unpleasantly, not to say painfully, butted by Tom Tit's flying form. From what she could gather in the confusion of the moment—for she could see a raised leg in the doorway—he must have been most unceremoniously kicked out.

Plucking up her courage and followed closely by the little refugee—I think he must have laid hold of a part of her dress with his dirty little hands by the marks she afterward found on it—the lady approached the formidable couple.

They had been drinking freely, she could see at once. Their faces were flushed, their hair dishevelled, and their clothing in great disorder.

"I have come to inquire about Tom Tit," she said, gently and persuasively.

"The little warmint!" said the woman.

"He's a little limb o' Satan," said the man.

"Oh, then, we must try to make him better." This was said conciliatingly and gently, for she was not altogether satisfied with the welcome of the two.

"You can't. Nobody can't."

"I think if we all tried very hard we might," she continued, but all the while feeling she was breasting a very swollen stream indeed.

"I tell yer, yer can't. Ain't me and my man tried? Ain't we both done our werry best? Ain't we a-lectured him, and a-wolloped him, both on us?"

"Would you mind his taking a situation if I could secure one for him?" Miss Earnshaw now asked.

At this both pricked up their ears. They saw a chance to throw off a troublesome burden.

Ay, that they wouldn't. Good riddance to bad rubbish. She'd make a present of him to anybody. And the father was for giving him away to the questioner on the spot. It could easily be seen that they loved the drink far more than their boy.

Telling them she would make inquiries and do her best, Miss Earnshaw wished them a polite good afternoon, to which she heard no reply whatever, unless the violent slamming of the door was one.

"Ain't they two old codgers?" inquired Tom Tit after the door was closed. "Wot lies they did crack, to be sure."

And when she told him that he must not speak disrespectfully of his parents, he bluntly replied that he "didn't believe they wos his parents, that he must have been changed when a baby, and that some duke or other was enjoying his property" and carrying out the thought further, that "when he came into his property he would present her with something werry 'andsome."

"Now, Tom Tit," his teacher said, "I am going to write to a friend of mine about you—I shall ask him to give you some work to do. Will you like that?"

"I'll work like a nigger," he replied.

"Will you mind going a great many miles away?"

"The fudder away the better from that ole pair; I don't want to see 'em no more."

"And you'll be a good lad?"

"I'll try to be like you, miss."

In due time there came a satisfactory reply. Her friend would try the lad.

Tom Tit's delight was unbounded. He turned somersaults without end.

"Now, Tom Tit," said his friend, "you must say good-by to your mother and father, and come to me to-morrow morning by ten o'clock and be properly clothed."

Punctually to the moment he arrived.

You should have seen Tom Tit with his face washed and his hair combed. And you should have seen him, too, without his rags, dressed in clean, wholesome, and entire jacket, waistcoat, collar, and trousers. You would hardly have known him again. To tell the truth, he scarcely knew himself when they took him to a glass, to judge by his astonished look and long-drawn, "Well, now, who'd a' thought it?" To see him smoothing himself down was a treat in itself.

Perhaps I ought to have said, before this, that of all Miss Earnshaw's little ragged boys, Tom Tit was the most satisfactory, morally. Although till so recently quite ignorant of the great truths of the Gospel, none seemed to take them in so intelligently as he, and none were so thoroughly interested. He delighted to hear of the love of Jesus to him, and seemed to realize it a little, for by his questions and answers she could see that the subject was working much in his sharp little mind. For the first time, too, he had learned to pray.

And so he quite understood her parting advice to him, to remember that he must trust Jesus as his Saviour and Friend, and that he must try to please Him. And when they knelt down and prayed together, his bright eyes were dimmed with the most hopeful of tears.

"Not a drop. Them swipes I won't touch as long as I live. I'll be like yer blessed self, a teetotaler!" And he set his mark to it on the spot.

Now if I were going to make a long book I should picture Tom Tit's course in detail, and show how he kept up his quick-march step to the end. But as I am writing his life in brief, a few facts only must suffice.

Of course Miss Earnshaw heard a great deal about him from her friends. In fact, for a long time Tom Tit occupied a most disproportionate share of their letters. He was so sharp, so ready, so active, so willing, so funny, that in less than a week he had become a thorough favorite.

And what an influence he had! And all for good, for he was getting more and more light every day in spiritual things, and could soon say, with full assurance, that he believed in the Lord Jesus Christ as his own personal Saviour.

One way in which his influence was felt for good was in the matter of total abstinence. Indeed, it was the very first subject on which he pronounced his opinion. It happened that the very day after his arrival Tom Tit was seated at the bottom of the table in the servants' hall, quietly eating his dinner—I am afraid rather neglected by the rest of the company, who were indeed quite indignant that such a boy should be admitted even to the lowest place in the house—when Thomas, the footman, deeming the opportunity a good one for displaying his better breeding, loftily said,

"Boy, have you ever tasted bitter beer? I'll give you a glass if you won't ask for any more."

It was passed down and placed in front of Tom Tit.

Tom Tit held it up to the light, turned it round, and smelt it with the utmost coolness, every eye being fixed upon him. Then he placed it in front of him, and looked very attentively into its amber depth with one eye.

"What a low, vulgar boy!" said Thomas to the general public. "Well, boy, perhaps you will tell us what you see there."

Tom Tit looked round on the assembled company and winked. Then he said to the lofty Thomas,

"What do I see? Why, a werry ugly sight—I sees a tall feller with a fiery waistcoat, and a fiery phiz, an' he's a-drinkin' bitter beer. What do I see? Why, I sees this werry tall feller, out of the perpendic'lar like, a-tryin' to open the door with his penknife. What do I see? Why, I sees this werry gent a-biddin' the eight-day clock a werry good-night. What do I see? Why, I sees him a throwin' his werry long body into bed with his boots on. What do I see? Why I sees the gent's name, and a werry uncommon name it is, and it's—Thomas."

Now all this was really true of the footman, and was so well known that Tom Tit's picture was read from the first. Of course there was a general titter, which was none the less enjoyable from the fact that Thomas was a favorite with none.

In can easily be imagined how such onslaughts on the drink, and there were many more direct even than this one, would affect the general feeling. Indeed, Tom Tit's sly fun and cool home-thrusts made beer-drinking a very trying thing. Of course it took time. But he lived to see the day when nearly every servant had signed the pledge.

How Tom Tit rose in position, I should much like to tell had space permitted. It must not be supposed that he broke off all connection with the old past, for many a letter did his old teacher receive from him, and well-written and well-expressed letters they were. They were mostly concerning his spiritual difficulties and experiences, and about his spiritual work, for after a while he became a teacher in the Sunday School of the village.

Neither had he forgotten his poor father and mother, for often there came little remittances to her to spend for them as she thought best. They were not long needed, however, for both killed themselves with the drink.

* * * * *

One day there was a great sensation in the neighborhood of Tom Tit's old home, for there walked up the court a fine young man, well-dressed. He was seen to stop before Tom Tit's old home, and even to peer into the window, for the room was empty now. And when the inhabitants crowded round him, eager to know what he wanted there, a thrill was sent through many a grown-up man and woman among them by his answer—"I'm Tom Tit."

And when volley after volley of questions was poured in upon him, and he found it impossible to answer them all, he considerably startled the people by jumping upon an empty barrel and making a speech:

"It's a long time since I left you all, my friends, and you see what a change has come over me since I ran about this court as ragged an urchin as you'd see anywhere. And what's made the difference? Well, for one thing I gave up the drink, the drink that killed my poor father and mother, and that's killing some of you, I fear. But I did more than that. I took the Lord Jesus Christ for my Saviour and Master, and a good Saviour and Master I have found Him. My friends, take an old friend's advice. Give up the drink, and see to it that you look after your precious souls, for which the blessed Lord bled and died."

THE CAROUSAL.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

BIBLE pictures, like the works of the old masters, improve by age. Like Raphael's Transfiguration or Da Vinci's Last Supper, they are worth more now than ever before.

A GAY CITY.

Night was about to come down upon Babylon. The shadows of her two hundred and fifty towers began to lengthen. The Euphrates rolled on, touched by the fiery splendors of the setting sun and gates of brass, burnished and glittering, opened and shut like doors of flame. The hanging gardens of Babylon, wet with the heavy dew, began to pour from starlit flowers and dripping leaf, a fragrance for many miles around. The streets and squares were lighted for dance and frolic and promenade. The theatres and galleries of art invited the wealth and pomp and grandeur of the city to rare entertainments. Scenes of riot and wassail were mingled in every street, and godless mirth and outrageous excess and splendid wickedness came to the king's palace to do their mightiest deeds of darkness.

A ROYAL ENTERTAINMENT.

A royal feast to-night at the king's palace. Rushing up to the gates are chariots upholstered with precious cloth from Dedan and drawn by fire-eyed horses from Togarmah, that rear and neigh in the grass by the charioteers, while a thousand lords dismount and women dressed in all the splendor of Syrian emerald and the color blending of agate and chasteness of coral and the sombre glory of Tyrian purple and princely embroideries brought from afar by camels across the desert and by ships of Tarshish across the sea. Open wide the gates and let the guests come in. The chamberlains and cupbearers are all ready. Hark to the rustle of the silks and to the carol of the music. See the blaze of the jewels. Lift the banners. Fill the cups. Clap the cymbals. Blow the trumpets. Let the night go by with song and dance and ovation, and let that Babylonish tongue be palsied that will not say, "O King Belshazzar, live forever."

ORIENTAL MAGNIFICENCE.

Ah, my friends, it was not any common banquet to which these great people came. All parts of the earth had sent their richest viands to that table. Brackets and chandeliers flashed their light upon tankards of burnished gold. Fruits, ripe and luscious, in baskets of silver entwined with leaves, plucked from the royal conservatory. Vases inlaid with emerald and ridged with exquisite traceries, filled with nuts that were thrashed from forests of different lands. Wine brought from the royal vats foaming in the decanters and bubbling in the chalices. Tufts of cassia and frankincense wafting their sweetness from wall and table. Gorgeous banners unfolding in the breeze that came through the opening window bewitched with the perfume of hanging gardens.

Fountains rising up from inclosures of ivory in jets of crystal to fall in flattering rain of diamonds and pearls. Statues of mighty men looking down from niches in the wall upon crowns and shields brought from subdued empires. Idols of wonderful work standing on pedestals of precious stones. Embroidery stooping about the windows and wrapping pillars of cedar and drifting on floor inlaid with ivory and agate. Music mingling the thrum of harps and the clash of cymbals and the blast of trumpets in one wave of transport that went rippling along the wall and breathing among the garlands and pouring down the corridors and thrilling the souls of a thousand banqueters.

THE TOAST.

The signal is given, and the lords and ladies, the mighty men and women of the land, come around the table. Pour out the wine. Let foam and bubble kiss the rim. Hoist every one his cup and drink to the sentiment: "O King Belshazzar, live forever!" Be-starred headband and coronet of royal beauty gleam to the uplifted chalices as again and again and again they are emptied. Away with care from the palace! Tear royal dignity to tatters! Pour out more wine! Give us more light, wilder music, sweeter perfume! Lord shouts to lord, captain ogles to captain. Goblets clash; decanters rattle. There come in the obscene song and the drunken hiccough and the slavering lip and the guffaw of idiotic laughter, bursting from the lips of princes, flushed, reeling, bloodshot, and while mingling with it all I hear, "huzza, huzza, for great Belshazzar!"

CONSTERNATION.

What is that on the plastering of the wall? Is it a spirit? Is it a phantom? Is it God? The music stops. The goblets fall from the nerveless grasp. There is a thrill. There is a start. There is a thousand-voiced shriek of horror. Let Daniel be brought in to read that writing. He comes in. He reads it. "Weighed in the balances and found wanting."

Meanwhile the Assyrians who for two years had been laying a siege to that city took advantage of that carousal and came in. I hear the feet of the conquerors on the palace stairs. Massacre rushes in with a thousand gleaming knives. Death bursts upon the scene; and I shut the door of that banqueting-hall, for I do not want to look. There is nothing there but torn banners and broken wreaths and the slush of upset tankards and the blood of murdered women and the kicked and tumbled carcase of a dead king. "For in that night was Belshazzar the King of the Chaldeans slain."

GOD'S WRITING.

I go on to learn some lessons from all this, as on former occasions I learned certain lessons. I learn that when God writes anything on the wall a man had better read it as it is. Daniel did not misinterpret or modify the handwriting on the wall. It is all foolishness to expect a minister of the Gospel to preach always things that people like or that people choose. Young men, what shall I preach to you? Shall I tell you of the dignity of human nature? Shall I tell you of the wonders that our race has accomplished? "Oh, no," you say, "tell me the message that came from God." I will.

If there is any handwriting on the wall, it is this lesson: "Repent! Accept of Christ and be saved!" I might talk of a great many other things, but that is the message, and so I declare it. Jesus never flattered those to whom He preached. He said to those who did wrong and who were offensive in His sight: "Ye generation of vipers! Ye whited sepulchres! How can ye escape the damnation of hell!" Paul the Apostle preached before a man who was not ready to hear him preach. What subject did he take? Did he say: "Oh, you are a good man, a very fine man, a very noble man"? No; he preached of righteousness to a man who was unrighteous; of temperance to a man who was the victim of bad appetites; of the judgment to come to a man who was unfit for it. So we must always declare the message that happens to come to us. Daniel must read it as it is.

A minister preached before James I. of England, who was also James VI. of Scotland. What subject did he take? The king was noted all over the world for being unsettled and wavering in his ideas. What did the minister preach about to this man, who was James I. of England and James VI. of Scotland? He took for his text James 1 : 6: "He that wavereth is like a wave of the seas, driven with the wind and tossed." Hugh Latimer offended the king by a sermon he preached, and the king said: "Hugh Latimer, come and apologize." "I will," said Hugh Latimer. So the day was appointed, and the king's chapel was full of lords and dukes and the mighty men and women of the country, for Hugh Latimer was to apologize. He began his sermon by saying, "Hugh Latimer, bethink thee! Thou art in the presence of thine earthly king who can destroy thy body. But bethink thee, Hugh Latimer, that thou art in the presence of the King of heaven and earth who can destroy both body and soul in hell fire." Then he preached with appalling directness at the king's crimes.

THE END OF THE BANQUET.

Another lesson that comes to us: There is a great difference between the opening of the banquet and of sin at its close. Young man, if you had looked in upon the banquet in the first few hours you would have wished you had been invited there and could sit at the feast. "Oh, the grandeur of Belshazzar's feast!" you would have said. But you look in at the close of the banquet, and your blood curdles with horror. The king of terrors has there a ghastlier banquet. Human blood is the wine, and dying groans are the music.

Sin has made itself a king in the earth. It has crowned itself. It has spread a banquet. It invites all the world to come to it. It has hung in its banqueting hall the spoils of all kingdoms and the banners of all nations. It has gathered from all music. It has strewn from its wealth the tables and the floors and the arches. And yet how often is that banquet broken up and how terrible is its end; ever and anon there is a handwriting on the wall. A king falls. A great culprit is arrested. The knees of wickedness knock together. God's judgment like an armed host breaks in upon the banquet; and that night is Belshazzar the King of the Chaldeans slain.

DISSIPATION.

Here is a young man who says: "I cannot see why they make such a fuss about the intoxicating cup. Why, it is exhilarating. It makes me feel well. I can talk better, think better, feel better. I cannot see why people have such a prejudice against it." A few years pass on, and he wakes up and finds himself in the clutches of an evil habit which he tries to break but cannot; and he cries out: "O Lord God, help me." It seems as though God would not hear his prayer, and in an agony of body and soul he cries out: "It biteth like a serpent and it stingeth like an adder." How bright it was at the start! How black it was at the last!

Here is a man who begins to read French novels. "They are so charming," he says, "I will go out and see for myself whether these things are so." He opens the gate of a sinful life. He goes in. A sinful sprite meets him with her wand. She waves her wand, and it is all enchantment. Why, it seems as if the angels of God had poured out vials of perfume in the atmosphere. As he walks on he finds the hills becoming more radiant with foliage and the ravines more resonant with the falling water. Oh, what a charming landscape he sees!

But that sinful sprite with her wand meets him again. But now she reverses the wand, and all the enchantment is gone. The cup is full of poison. The fruit turns to ashes. All the leaves of the bower are forked tongues of hissing serpents. The flowing fountains fall back into a dead pool, stenchful with corruption. The luring songs become curses and screams of demoniac laughter. Lost spirits gather about him and feel for his heart, and beckon him on with "Hail, brother! hail, blasted spirit, hail!" He tries to get out. He tries to get out. He comes to the front door where he entered and tries to push it back, but the door turns against him, and in the jar of that shutting door he hears these words: "This night is Belshazzar the King of the Chaldeans slain." Sin may open bright as the morning. It ends dark as the night!

AN UNINVITED GUEST.

I learn further from this subject that death sometimes breaks in upon a banquet. Why did he not go down to the prisons in Babylon? There were people there that would like to have died. I suppose there were men and women in torture in that city who would have welcomed death. But he comes to the palace; and just at the time when the mirth is dashing to the tip-top pitch, death breaks in at the banquet. We have often seen the same thing illustrated. Here is a young man just come from college. He is kind. He is loving. He is enthusiastic. He is eloquent. By one spring he may bound to heights toward which many men have been struggling for years. A profession opens before him. He is established in the law. His friends cheer him. Eminent men encourage him. After a while you may see him standing in the American Senate or moving a popular assemblage by his eloquence as trees are moved in a whirlwind. Some night he retires early. A fever is on him. Delirium like a reckless charioteer seizes the reins of his intellect. Father and mother stand by and see the tides of his life going out to the great ocean. The banquet is coming to an end. The lights of thought and mirth and eloquence are being extinguished. The garlands are snatched from the brow. The vision is gone. Death at the banquet!

A NATIONAL BANQUET BROKEN UP.

We saw the same thing on a larger scale illustrated at the last war in this country. Our whole nation had been sitting at a national banquet—North, South, East and West. What grain was there but we grew it on our hills. What invention was there but our rivers must turn the new wheel and rattle the strange shuttle. What warm furs but our traders must bring them from the Arctic. What fish but our nets must sweep them for the markets. What music but it must sing in our halls. What eloquence but it must speak in our Senates. Ho to the national banquet reaching from mountain to mountain and from sea to sea! To prepare that banquet the sheep folds and the aviaries of the country sent their best treasures. The orchards piled up on the table their fruits. The presses burst out with new wines. To sit at that table came the yeomanry of New Hampshire and the lumbermen of Maine and the tanned Carolinian from the rice-swamps and the Western emigrant from the pines of Oregon, and we were all brothers—brothers at a banquet.

Suddenly the feast ended. What meant those mounds thrown up at Chicahominy, Shiloh, Atlanta, Gettysburg, South Mountain? What meant those golden grain-fields turned into a pasturing-ground for cavalry horses? What meant the corn-fields gullied with the wheels of the heavy supply train? Why those rivers of tears—those lakes of blood? God was angry! Justice must come. A handwriting on the wall! The nation has been weighed and found wanting. Darkness! Darkness! Woe to the North! Woe to the South! Woe to the East! Woe to the West! Death at the banquet!

SUDDEN END TO THE VICIOUS.

I have also to learn from the subject that the destruction of the vicious and of those who despise God will be very sudden. The wave of mirth had dashed to the highest point when that Assyrian army broke through. It was unexpected. Suddenly, almost always, comes the doom of those who despise God and defy the laws of men. How was it at the deluge? Do you suppose it came through a long north-east storm, so that people for days before were sure it was coming? No; I suppose the morning was bright; that calmness brooded on the waters; that beauty sat enthroned on the hills; when suddenly the heavens burst and the mountains sank like anchors into the sea that dashed clear over the Andes and the Himalayas.

The Red Sea was divided. The Egyptians tried to cross it. There could be no danger. The Israelites had just gone through; where they had gone why not the Egyptians? Oh, it was such a beautiful walking-place! A pavement of tinged shells and pearls, and on either side two great walls of water—solid. There can be no danger. Forward, great host of the Egyptians! Clap the cymbals and blow the trumpets of victory! After them! We will catch them yet, and they shall be destroyed. But the walls begin to tremble. They rock! They fall! The rushing waters! The shriek of drowning men! The swimming of the war-horses in vain for the shore! The strewing of the great host on the bottom of the sea, or pitched by the angry wave on the beach—a battered, bruised and loathsome wreck! Suddenly destruction came. One half-hour before they could not have believed it. Destroyed; and without remedy. I am just setting forth a fact which you have noticed as well as I.

Ananias comes to the Apostle. The Apostle says: "Did you sell the land for so much?" He says, "Yes." It was a lie. Dead! As quick as that! Sapphira, his wife, comes in. "Did you sell the land for so much?" "Yes." It was a lie, and quick as that she was dead! God's judgments are upon those who despise Him and defy Him. They come suddenly. The destroying angel went through Egypt. Do you suppose that any of the people knew that he was coming? Did they hear the flap of his great wing? No! no! Suddenly, unexpectedly, he came. Skilled sportsmen do not like to shoot a bird standing on a sprig near by. If they are skilled, they pride themselves on taking it on the wing, and they wait till it starts. Death is an old sportsman, and he loves to take men flying under the very sun. He loves to take them on the wing.

THE LAST CHANCE.

Are there any here who are unprepared for the eternal world? Are there any here who have been living without God and without hope? Let me say to you that you had better accept of the Lord Jesus Christ, lest suddenly your last chance be gone. The lungs will cease to breathe; the heart will stop. The time will come when you shall go no more to the office or to the store or to the shop. Nothing will be left but death and judgment and eternity. Oh, flee to God this night! If there be one in this presence who has wandered far away from Christ, though he may not have heard the call of the Gospel for many a year, I invite him now to come and be saved. Flee from thy sin! Flee to the stronghold of the Gospel! Now is the accepted time! Now is the day of salvation.

Good-night, my young friends! May you have rosy sleep, guarded by Him who never slumbers! May you awake in the morning strong and well! But oh, art thou a despiser of God? Is this thy last night on earth? Shouldst thou be awakened in the night by something, thou knowest not what, and there be shadows floating in the room, and a handwriting on the wall, and you feel that your last hour has come, and there be a fainting at the heart and a tremor in the limb and a catching of the breath—then thy doom would be but an echo of the words of the text: "In that night was Belshazzar the King of the Chaldeans slain."

REFUGEE JEWS IN JERUSALEM.

MR. OCZERET, of the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, thus writes of the wonderful door of entrance just open among the Jewish refugees in Jerusalem: "When I call to mind former years, and contemplate the situation of the Mission six or seven years ago and compare it with the present state, it appears to me almost like 'life from the dead.' The Lord has indeed given the increase, and has remarkably blessed the efforts of His servants. Now, scores of people, and among them some very respectable families, cleave to the Mission with an attachment of no ordinary kind. The days when the messenger of the Gospel was obliged to go into the streets and lanes in search of Jews willing to listen to his message, which he often delivered under a shower of abuse, are gone by. Opportunities need not be any longer sought for; they are at our very doors, from early in the morning till late at night.

"Some 70 to 75 Jews are daily employed on the large plot of ground belonging to our Society. To watch such a number of Jews, varying in age and in former station of life, earn their bread in the truest sense of 'the sweat of the face'—I say, to watch some of the refugees who are bowed down by age, suffering, and infirmities, digging, planting, and watering in the land once given to their fathers, would cheer the heart of many a Christian well-wisher of Israel. Those who lift up holy hands, praying for the peace of Jerusalem, and the restoration of the Jews to the Promised Land, would be encouraged to pray more fervently, seeing that God's own time to favor Zion is fast approaching.

"Indeed, to watch these people labor with the spade and mattock is a spectacle which must be seen, but cannot be described. It does away with many a wrong notion as to the physical incapacities of the Jew; it successfully refutes the erroneous idea of some, that the Jews are not fit to cultivate the soil, and it is a strong protest against the enemies of the nation, who maintain that Jews have grown indolent in the dispersion, that they are wholly given to usury, despising 'working with their own hands.'

"A night or two after our removal to the Sanatorium, I happened to enter the shed adjoining the house in which eight to ten unmarried men are accommodated. I was not a little surprised to find some of the inmates seated around the table with open Bibles. I did not stay more than a few minutes, but from a question or two put to me, I could gather that they had just been discussing the claims of Jesus to the Messiahship. Likewise during their dinner-hours I accidentally came across some of the laborers reading tracts, or repeating what they had heard in church. It is a great marvel that Jews of strict orthodox principles and of sincere piety should enter our church and remain during the service, watching the devotions of their brethren who are believers in Christ. Some of them, I have been told, follow the services in the Hebrew prayer-book. Nor is this wonderful change confined to the refugees alone. It has spread to the Jerusalemites, and even to the Jews in the country.

"A few Sundays ago a blind Jew and his friend, both natives of Saphet, were noticed in church during the German service. On being asked what had induced them to come, their reply was, 'We are on a visit to Jerusalem, and came to hear Mr. Friedlander preach.'

"In my daily intercourse with the people, it is gratifying to find that almost all are more or less acquainted with the New Testament. Whatever their reasons for reading the New Testament may be, we cannot but rejoice at its being read, for it is the same Word of God which once fastened itself on our own hearts, and brought us to the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ. With scarcely an exception, the Russian refugees who have been benefited by the missionaries cannot forget the labor of love bestowed upon them."

A Peaceful Bonaparte!—Prince Lucien Bonaparte has been awarded a good service pension of £250 a year by the Prime Minister on behalf of the Crown. Mr. Gladstone explained that the Prince, who is naturalized in England, has devoted his time and his fortune to the promotion of philosophical research, and he therefore felt it to be a privilege to award him the pension referred to. Mr. Gladstone further stated that not only in the collection of books, but largely in the printing and gratuitous distribution of books to all students of philology and to every great institution connected with it, the funds which Prince Lucien possessed were largely and liberally expended. There are no less than one hundred and sixty of these operations of printing, which the Prince has executed in other and happier days at his own expense. Among them he has printed the Gospel of St. Matthew in twenty-nine dialects and languages.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Mealtime in a Dungeon.—At a Noonday prayer-meeting the Rev. J. L. Murray said: "A Christian was kept in a dark dungeon for the sake of his faith. The place was so dark that he could not read the Bible; but at his mealtimes, when the door was left open for a few minutes to let him see to eat his food, he read while the light streamed into the dark room. 'For,' said he, 'I can easily find my mouth in the dark and feed my body then.'"

A Good Rule in the House.—Mr. Scott said: "I was struck not long ago with a remark made by a servant-girl. She was speaking about her master's and her mistress's life, and said, 'They don't need to talk or dispute over any difficulty, they just take it to the Lord in prayer as a matter of course.' These Christian people were practical, and their daily life proclaimed that the love of Jesus ruled their every action. It should be so in all cases."

A New Banner to Fight Under.—"A Man was found by one of his companions, who looked with contempt upon all religious things, reading the Bible. With a strong expression of disdain, he said, 'What! are you turning Methodist?' The firm, decided reply was, 'From this time forth, God helping me, this is my banner, and I want to be true to it all my life.' The secret of spiritual power and work is decision and confession on the part of all who receive Christ as their Saviour."

A Young Wife's Anxiety Ended.—Mr. Jack told the following cheering incident. He said: "At the Kelvin Street meeting, an earnest worker stopped a bright young man at the door, and beckoned me to come and speak with him. I did so, and am glad to say that after a short conversation he decided to give himself to Christ. He was newly married, and his young wife was hovering about the door in great anxiety about him, praying the Lord that her dear husband might give himself to Jesus, and that very night her prayers were answered."

An Old Whiskey-Drinker Saved.—Mr. Simpson related a case of a thirty-year-old drunkard, hopelessly given to drink, who six weeks ago left his house on the Sabbath morning to endeavor to get a glass of whiskey to quench his thirst, and to soothe his nervous irritation. As God willed it, he could not get the whiskey, and so he wandered into the tent, in which he heard the Gospel preached. He accepted Christ as his Saviour, and got immediate deliverance. On a recent Friday night he told his story to a Christian worker, testifying that he had not now the least desire for drink. He is anxious about his wife's salvation, for she has been a hard drinker for the last thirty years."

A Thief Out of his Misery.—The Rev. Mr. Williams said: "A gentleman told me to-day that in his place of business in Australia one of his employés was detected in robbing the firm. When charged with the crime, the man said, 'It is true; I am now out of my misery. For years and years I have been burdened with this load of guilt, but now that it has come to the worst I am out of misery. Do with me—punish me just as you like.' The devil is a hard taskmaster. Change at once to the service of One whose yoke is easy and whose burden is light. 'If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness,' but 'whoso covereth his sins shall not prosper.'"

The Remainder of the Pipe-light.—Councillor Miller said: "A sailor in the China seas was badly off for something to read. He went to his chest and found a bit of a tract which he had thrown into his chest after lighting his pipe with the rest of it. He read the little bit, and by-and-by the truth it contained was blessed by the Holy Spirit, and the man was touched and melted to tears; then he searched for his Bible and read that. The sword of the Spirit pierced his heart, and he was converted to Christ. I learned that the tract, a piece of which had been blessed to the sailor, was written by the Rev. Dr. Horatius Bonar, and wrote, telling him of the circumstance I have just narrated, and asked if he had heard of it before. He replied that he had not, and thanked me for the information."

Mistake of a Postmistress.—At Cowcaddens the Rev. Mr. Wallace said: "A woman in a certain village took it into her head that the parish minister hated her. The consequence was that she hated him most heartily. Some of her neighbors wished to get her removed from the position she held as postmistress, and got up a petition to the Postmaster-General against her to which they required the minister's signature. When they asked him to sign it, he replied, 'No, I cannot accede to your request. I think she performs her duty fairly well, and it would be unjust to remove her.' Some one told her the minister's answer, and the poor woman's heart was completely changed by the power of kindness. If sinners would only understand the glad message of salvation, I am sure their heart would be broken and changed toward God who loves them."

How Peters are Made.—Mr. Oatts Said at one of the meetings: "Experience shows us that the cause of the declension of religious life among young men is neglect of God's Word. When I landed in New York, on my recent visit to America, I attended a meeting of young men, and afterward had some conversation with several. One told me that he left Glasgow with a letter of introduction from Mr. Moody, and thus had every chance of success in the land of his adoption. For a time he went on well, but soon the cares of this world and its enjoyments took up all his time, and he stopped reading the Bible "for want of time." Then his love for Christian work died out, and he became a backslider from Christ who had redeemed him with His most precious blood. There is reason, however, to believe that he is now 'doing his first works,' and has returned to the Shepherd and Bishop of his soul."

A Better Year than Ever.—A Member of the Mizpah Band said: "Twelve months ago I was an outcast on the streets of Glasgow. My family were houseless, their clothing was rags, and their bones bare of flesh, and there was a far-away look in their eyes. Desolate and forlorn, they were indeed the drunkard's children. It was I who had brought them to this state, and I wandered in the streets despised by all men. I often went into a quiet place longing to die there, and that my worthless body might be found by no one. I was in this condition when I entered a meeting and heard them speaking about peace in Christ. 'That is what I want,' I said, and that is what I got that very night by believing on the Lord Jesus Christ. My family are now comfortable, happy, well housed, clad respectably, and my neighbors respect us all. That is what Jesus has done for us in this world, and we are journeying toward heaven. I cannot describe the happiness of this last year."

Afraid of Awaking in Hell.—Mr. Galloway remarked at the same meeting: "I have just returned from Norway, where I spoke to a young lady who was anxious about her soul. She decided to trust simply to Jesus, and introduced me to a number of other ladies, one of whom told me her experience. For years she had been in great trouble, and feared when she retired to rest that she would only awake in hell! All this time she could not pray; her friends feared that self-destruction was to be her fate, and watched her night and day. One day she went to see a friend. While in his house a lady fell back in her seat dead. In terror at the sight, my friend fell on her knees in an agony of prayer. To her astonishment she got instant relief from the burden of anxiety and sin through the sight of a crucified Redeemer. I pressed upon her the necessity of daily study of the Bible, and of working for Jesus, and to-day I have received a letter telling me that her hired girl is extremely anxious about her soul."

A Sceptic Becomes a Preacher.—Mr. Simpson said: "There is a series of meetings going on just now in a little watering-place at which blessing has been realized. How were they started? An open-handed sceptic used to sit at his door on the Sabbath mornings, reading his newspaper, and scoffing at the people going to church. Mr. Moody visited the place, and this man heard him, and thought in his heart, 'What a fine thing it would be if that fanatic had the knowledge I have!' But, by-and-by, as Mr. Moody went on in the work, the thought changed into, 'That man's preaching is blessing others as well as himself;' and this idea awakened the question, 'What am I doing for my fellow-men?' 'Nothing,' was the reply, and this so worked upon him that he sought and found Jesus, who has given him power to work for Him, and thus bring a blessing to all around him. It is this man who has started these meetings, and it is to be hoped means will be found to continue them."

A Greek Athlete's Last Wrestle.—The Rev. Hector Hall said: "When I saw Major Colquhoun standing before me as he read the words in Isaiah 40, 'Even the youths shall faint and grow weary,' I thought, looking at his big, well-knit frame, 'Surely he is a man who does not know what faintness or weariness is.' Then I remembered an ancient Greek story of an old wrestler, who was so skilful, strong, and vigorous that he defeated every opponent. None could stand before him. One morning he felt faint and weary, and the doctor came and told him that Death was come to wrestle with him. The wrestler with raised hand and evil eye said, 'O Death! If thou wast a man I would strangle thee well.' He only thought of one way of conquering death, and that way he knew was futile against the adversary, but the weakest Christian can say, 'O Death, where is thy sting? and where, O grave, thy victory?' 'Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.'"

"THAT BLESSED HOPE."

By H. M. Barnett, B.A.

The Grace of Hope—The Supremacy Assigned by God to the "Blessed Hope"—The Propriety of the Epithet "Blessed"—In Millennial Blessedness—I. Christ will Assume Universal Sovereignty—A Delightful Contrast—The Divine Purpose Foreshown as to the Career and Triumph of the King of the Jews—The Inscription on the Cross—II. The Reign of Christ's Saints—The "Recompense of the Reward" as Shown in the Old and New Testaments—The Saints' Reign with Christ—The Sublime Conquest—The Thousand Years, and their Unspeakable Blessedness.

To hope is to expect what we desire. The apostle says, in Romans 8 : 25, "If we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it." In Hebrews 11 : 1, hope is declared to be involved in faith, with respect to its relations to the future. Now, although there is a hope—that of the hypocrite—which maketh ashamed, we are only concerned at present with a true hope. "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick; but when the desire cometh, it is a tree of life." (Prov. 13 : 12.) And all experience amply bears out this divine representation of the highly important influence which this fundamental factor in history is ever very effectively exerting. In Romans 15 : 13, Paul sets forth the mighty efficacy of hope in the weighty sentence: "Now the God of Hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost."

THE HIGH PLACE ASSIGNED TO IT BY GOD.

But we are here concerned with an object of desire of so supremely exalted a description as that the blessed God actually characterizes it by the very term that He has again and again applied to Himself—viz., the adjective "blessed." It—i.e., the desired object anticipated in this case—is "the glorious appearing of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ." (Titus 2 : 13, Greek.) So that God Himself makes very much indeed of the Second Advent, alias the future Coming and Kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ. Accordingly, we, too, ought to assign an exceedingly prominent place to "that blessed hope;" as also the primitive Christian writers—and, especially, the inspired penmen of God's Sacred Word—are well known to have done. It is not, however, our present purpose to prove from the New Testament how very large a place this subject occupies in the revelation of Christ Jesus enshrined in the twenty-seven books composing the second volume of the sacred canon.

THE EPITHET "BLESSED."

Let us consider the traceable propriety of the application of the uniquely exalted epithet, "blessed," to our hope of the rapidly-nearing Second Advent of our forever-to-be-adored Lord and Saviour Christ Jesus. The presentment of the facts—of which Holy Scripture is known to make very much indeed—which will to a great extent characterize the glorious Millennial reign of our coming Lord, will suffice for the accomplishment of our present object. One remark, however, must be made here before the coast can be clear for us to fairly commence the work of adducing the features of Millennial blessedness. It is that the word for "appearing" in our passage (Titus 2 : 13) being "epiphany" (επιφανεια), we are taught that it is not the Rapture, or coming for the saints, with which we have here to do, but the subsequent "Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all His saints"—as Paul puts it. Of course, too, our blessed hope comprises our blessedness in reigning with Christ in eternity. But it is to Millennial glories that we propose to confine our regard in the present inquiry.

CHRIST'S ASSUMPTION OF SOVEREIGNTY.

1. The long-rejected Christ of God, whom Ezekiel (21 : 27) had termed "The Coming One, whose right it is to reign," will then have "taken to Himself His great power," and made His oft-predicted and long-anticipated reign the soul-animating theme of all the prophets of God since man cast off his allegiance to Him, an accomplished fact at last. The very soul of bliss is evidently involved in this stupendously glorious event—the succession to God-empowered rule, of Jehovah's Divinely-anointed King, on God's holy hill of Zion. How long has this sin-stricken and sorrowful world been groaning—more or less—under gross misrule, and longing for the inestimably precious boon of righteous and beneficent government! A seventh millenary (after 6000 years of perverted rule and bitter woe) blessed by perfect administration under the sceptre of God's "Heir of all things," will be a blessed fact; rich in untold fruits of creaturely blessedness, replete with beneficial effects upon all orders of beings, and redolent of the fragrant incense of adoring praises from millions of gladdened and thankful hearts.

A DELIGHTFUL CONTRAST.

Oh, how gratefully does this sublimely ennobled order of mundane things contrast with the most monstrously abominable state of anti-Christian *devil*ment, which it will have happily replaced, as a sweetly satisfactory result of the triumphant descent of the "Stone cut out without hands"! (Dan. 2 : 34.) How delightful will it be when "the Prince of the kings of the earth" shall have been manifested "in His times!" the magnificent fulfilment of Melchizedec, as the "King of Righteousness," and King of Salem; and of Solomon, as "the Prince of Peace," in all His glory—incomparably grander than David's mortal son's. How splendid, when, before the august majesty of the long-foretold "Governor among the nations," "all kings shall fall down prostrate and all nations shall serve" right loyally (see Psalm 72 : 11, and throughout). For "of the increase of His government, and of peace there shall be no end; upon the throne of David, and upon His kingdom, to order it and to establish it, with judgment and with justice from henceforth, even forever. The zeal of the Lord of Hosts will perform this." (Isaiah 9 : 7.)

THE DIVINE PURPOSE FORESHOWN.

And this testimony of the prophet foreshows—as do many hundreds of other such also in the Sacred Volume—the Divine purpose for the expression of which even Pontius Pilate was made the vehicle, that "Jesus of Nazareth" must yet triumphantly become "the King of the Jews." Yes, this most remarkable superscription of an accusation which the ungodly Roman judge steadily refused to alter, did serve the wonderful Divine purpose, in employing the three representative languages of the world to declare what shall be blessedly brought to pass in the bright day of Immanuel's glorious supremacy. For as the Hebrew tongue represents the conscience, or moral sense and religiousness of the human creature; the Greek, the literature—poetic and prosaic—of philosophy and art of Gentilehood; and the Latin—or ancient Roman—the sciences of political economy, jurisprudence, etc., we learn that all the gifts of mankind in regard to the regulation and supply of needs—moral, intellectual, and physical, will be brought to sweetly contribute each its quota of instrumental influence to the glorification of the lowly Nazarene, the crucified and risen Saviour; when God, the supreme Father, shall have made Him to be recognized as His "Firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth." (Psalm 89 : 27.)

THE REIGN OF CHRIST'S SAINTS.

2. A second fact of the blessed "golden age" of our adorable Lord's supremacy—the Millennium—will be the splendid reign of the resurrected and transfigured saints, in consorted—though subordinated—heavenly regency with the glorified "Head over all things," the "Desire of all nations"—Immanuel, over "the kingdoms of this world," according to Revelation 11 : 15. This sweetly consolatory aspect of truth—as a due "recompense of reward" for sufferers of "the reproach of Christ"—is frequently taught—thank the Lord—in both the Old and the New Testaments. But before adducing the proofs of this position, it is well that it should be explained that what is even better than kingdoms of glory and crowns of light—viz., the blessedness of seeing, being like unto, and forever being with "the Chief among ten thousand and altogether lovely One"—is omitted from the present treatment of "That Blessed Hope," because it is hoped that it may be elaborated on a future occasion (the Lord enabling the writer) in connection with the Rapture, or the "Purifying Hope," of 1 John 3 : 3, and because the "epiphany of the glory," being an admissible translation of the words immediately following those composing our subject (viz., that Blessed, or Happy Hope), it is felt that prominence is here given to the display, or objective aspect of

"THE RECOMPENSE OF THE REWARD."

To proceed with proof texts then: "The righteous or upright shall have domination or dominion over them in the morning" (of the resurrection and Millennial reign). See Ps. 49 : 14. "Behold, a King shall reign in righteousness, and princes (mark this) shall rule in judgment" wrote Isaiah (32 : 1), over 2500 years ago. Daniel, a little later, predicted the glorious Millennial reign of the saints of the most high (places), [as, it is thought, this phrase—"the most high"—might be properly rendered; answering to the heavenly places of Ephesians 1 : 3]. For in Daniel 7 : 18 the saints are absolutely assured that they shall take the kingdom which is said, a few verses farther on, to extend "under the whole heaven," which proves it to be an earthly kingdom, as to its sphere or locality. In Zechariah 14, too, just before the magnificent statement of verse 9, "The Lord shall be King over all the earth:" it is foretold that the Lord (his) God shall come, and it is added, "and all Thy saints with Thee." And this, furthermore, is the chapter, in the sixteenth verse of which, the annual celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles (the memorial of the accomplished effects, or fruits of redemption), where the Lord of hosts is to be worshipped by the assembled nations, is most vividly foreshown.

THE SAINTS' REIGN WITH CHRIST.

So that where God says most about the exaltation that is in store for Immanuel, as "King of kings and Lord of lords," over this renovated and emancipated earth, there do we repeatedly find the clearest evidence of the Divine purpose to bless the saints with a subordinate share of Christ's magnificent imperial rule over Daniel's fifth monarchy, the only absolutely universal one of all the five great kingdoms upon earth. (See Daniel 2 and 7.)

NEW TESTAMENT AFFIRMATIONS.

But the New Testament also furnishes evidence to the same effect. Thus in Luke 12 : 32, Jesus our Lord says, "Fear not, little flock; for it is your father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Again, in ch. 19, we have our adorable Lord Christ appointing His "faithful servants," on His "return" from the "far country" (heaven), to their respective provinces of royal administration, as His sacred political executive, with the enrapturing words, "Have thou authority over ten cities," and "Be thou also over five cities," respectively. (Luke 19 : 17 and 19.)

St. Paul, moreover, repeatedly brings out this rich consolatory truth of the glorious reign of the raised and "changed" saints with "the Christ of God," after His Second Advent—e.g., "And if children, then heirs; heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with Him, that we may be also glorified together." (Rom. 8 : 17.) And then comes the eloquent description of the glowing glories which will irradiate the entire terrestrial scene. Likewise he writes to Timothy (II Tim. 2 : 12), "If we suffer, we shall also reign with Him." And similarly he appeals to the Corinthian believers in 1 Cor. 6 : 2, thus, "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world?" In Hebrews 12, at the end of the chapter, too, we are said to "receive a kingdom that cannot be removed." The references to the coming and kingdom of our blessed Lord in the Epistles to the Thessalonians abound most remarkably, and this was an especially fruitful Church, which "waited for the Son of God from heaven" (1 Thess. 1 : 10); and appeared to appreciate the magnificently of their part in the majestically imposing revelation of the Lord Jesus at His descent from heaven, when, as the destroyer of them that know not God, and of them that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, He shall come to be glorified in His saints, and to be admired in all them that believe. (II Thess. 1 : 7–8, R. V.)

St. John also, in Revelation, lays extraordinarily emphatic stress upon the regal (and priestly) glories with which the blessed Lord will graciously reward His tried saints when they shall have been blessed with their deathless and celestial resurrected bodies. In Rev. 2 : 26, 27, R. V., to wit, we find—"And he that overcometh, and he that keepeth My works unto the end, to him will I give authority over the nations; and he shall rule them with a rod of iron . . . ; as I also have received of My Father." Again, "He that overcometh, I will give to him to sit down with Me in My throne, as I also overcame, and sat down with My Father in His throne." (Rev. 3 : 21, R. V.) And, passing over some similar proof-texts (because we are but giving sample evidences out of both Testaments), we come to Rev. 20 : 4, in which the raised and transfigured servants of the blessed Lord and Saviour there brought before us are said to live and

REIGN WITH CHRIST 1000 YEARS.

There is, however, one other verse, in the Revised Version of Rev. 10 : 7, which demands special attention in the present connection. It runs as follows: "But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he is about to sound, then is finished the mystery of God, according to the good tidings which He declared to His servants the Prophets." And when the seventh angel shall have sounded, the kingdom of the world is to become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ. (See Rev. 11 : 15, R. V.) So that the "good tidings" comprise this truth about the coming kingdom.

NOTICE.

Many subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who are laboring to extend the sphere of its usefulness, wish us to afford them the same facilities as were placed at their disposal last year. It appears that the concession in price then made, enabled them to introduce the journal to persons and families to whom it proved a blessing. God used it as a means of conversion in not a few cases; in others it gave comfort and encouragement to tried and afflicted believers; and ministers and lay preachers, to whom our friends sent it, acknowledged their indebtedness for help in their labors to the hints and suggestions contained in its pages.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has no higher object than that which its friends thus state was achieved last year. The same opportunity is therefore cheerfully given this year. Any subscriber wishing to introduce THE CHRISTIAN HERALD where it may do good, may send to THE MANAGER, 63 Bible House, New York, for which sum the paper will be mailed to any address in the United States or in Canada every week from the date on which the money is received, until the end of 1883. Will our friends pray that God will use each number for the advancement of Christ's Kingdom?

CURRENT EVENTS.

The First Appointment under the New Civil Service rules in the Post Office was made last week. The successful man was Mr. Ovington E. Weller, of Granite, Baltimore County, Md. The department called for a clerk to fill a vacancy, and, under the rules, was given the names of four persons who were eligible for appointment. Judge Gresham directed the highest in rank to be selected, and Mr. Weller was found to be the man. Three departments have now called for clerks—the Treasury, War, and Post Office. In each case, so far, the letter and spirit of the new rules have been complied with, and Postmaster-General Gresham states that so far as he knew, there was no disposition on the part of department officers to evade the law. A question has arisen as to the extent of the law. There is a doubt whether competitive examinations will be needed for promotions or only for original appointments.

A General Free-Trade Conference of an Informal character is summoned to meet at St. Louis on October 2d. The call is addressed to all who, "believing that protection is wrong, desire to take active steps to secure its overthrow." It is issued by the Missouri Free-Trade League, one of the most energetic leagues in the country. One of the most significant features of the political situation at the present time is the growing favor of free-trade doctrines among the working classes, many of whom, notably the cotton spinners, contend that the high tariff has injured rather than benefited them. The immense surplus which Congress had to deal with last year they mention as a proof that so high a tariff is not needed for revenue, and they are now arguing that it is useless on other grounds. They have hitherto believed that it enabled the home manufacturer to charge higher rates for his goods, thus also enabling him to pay his operatives higher wages; but now complaint is made that, whether he realizes the profit or not, wages are gradually sinking, and therefore the operatives are taxed by the tariff to no purpose. Many signs indicate that this belief is rapidly spreading, and will lead to important political results. It is possible that one of those results may be the disintegration of both political parties, as there are many Democrats who are protectionists and many Republicans who are advocating a further reduction of the tariff.

The Downing Temperance Law in Missouri has been pronounced "inoperative" by Judge Noonan. The result is a disappointment of temperance people in the State, but it is thought that the failure may lead to the enactment of a more radical measure. The extremely moderate demand that the grog-shops should be closed on Sundays might, if it had been conceded, have satisfied the people for some time, but now that so bitter a fight has been waged against it by the liquor dealers, there is a call for more stringent measures. Governor Crittenden, who is not a Prohibitionist, has already uttered a significant warning. In the course of a lengthy interview on the subject, he said: "Now that the Downing law has been spurned and set aside, the saloon men will have to take the consequences. I am an anti-Prohibitionist from the sole of my feet to the crown of my head, but I feel, with the State, that if the law is to be defied in St. Louis, and I have to choose between lawlessness and prohibition, I am a Prohibitionist. Under such a provocation prohibition will carry the State by 50,000 majority."

An Internal Revenue Office Report Affords material for forming an opinion of the efficiency of the liquor law in the State of Maine. The report states that 813 persons in Maine paid the United States tax as dealers in liquors in 1882. This covers about 200 druggists, also every low seller, who, having been convicted of violating the State law, has paid the United States tax to escape the severe penalties imposed for unauthorized selling by the national Government. But counting the whole as dealers, the ratio is as one to 800 inhabitants. In 1850 there was one licensed dealer to ever 225 people. In the license States generally there is one to 210; in New York and New Jersey, one to 180; in California, one to 95. The average for the whole Union is one to 300.

A Terrible Indictment is Brought against the city officials of New Orleans by the Grand Jury of that city. The following are a few out of many charges made by this outspoken jury: "In June the moral condition of our city was terrible. The papers teemed with details of the most diabolical acts which ever disgraced our criminal record. Hoodlums had possession of the city. The police could not make arrests of the principal leaders. Juries and witnesses were intimidated. We regret to state in this connection that a large percentage of those convicted of acts of ruffianism during one term have been in the employ of the city. Out of the many haunts of vice with which the city is infested, we will take as an illustration two squares in the heart of the city, on Royal, between Canal and Bienville Streets. Here, under the license, sanction, and patronage of city officials, are concentrated drinking dens, gambling houses, and low resorts, where prostitutes take in and swindle or drug strangers. There is no effort at concealment about this saturnalia of crime, for the brightness of electric lights lends a glamor to the scene." It is evident that in New Orleans, as in New York and all the great cities of the Union, there is urgent need for Christian people to unite, and act vigorously for the suppression of vice, or the vengeance of God may fall on our beloved land. In spite of increased educational facilities, the country is becoming increasingly immoral.

The Effort of the Citizens' League, of Chicago, to prevent the large issue of cheap liquor licenses by the mayor, has failed. The Chicago correspondent of the New York Tribune reports that the long war between the city authorities and the Citizens' League may be considered at an end, and the temporary victory rests with the former. No decision can now be obtained from the Supreme Court in time to affect the current cheap licenses which have been issued by the mayor, and which run to the end of the municipal year. The victory gives the liquor-sellers that much more leeway, and defrauds the city of about $1,000,000 of revenue.

At the Convention of Freethinkers held at Rochester, N. Y., last week, a minister was permitted to deliver an address. The Rev. Thomas Mitchell, of Brooklyn, spoke for two hours on August 30th in defence of Christianity, and was attentively heard. The freethinkers are not likely to be readers of The Christian Herald, so it is useless to say anything in these columns to them; but there may be others who have read the report of Mr. Mitchell's speech, to whom a word of caution will do good. Young people not yet decided for Christ, who have listened to the arguments of sceptics, and are in danger of rejecting Christianity altogether, must not suppose that Mr. Mitchell was a delegated champion of religion. In discussing the questions at issue between religion and science, he stated his own views, in which many eminent Christians coincide; but there are other Christians equally devout who do not hold those views, and who believe that the antagonism between religion and science in the matters discussed is apparent, not real. Christianity must not be rejected on the assumption that the Rochester exposition is authoritative.

The Garfield Memorial Hospital in Washington is soon to be established. Mr. Thomas Fisher, of the Hospital Board, said in reply to inquiries last week: "The board has purchased the L. H. Schneider property, at the head of Tenth Street, on the elevation overlooking the city, for $38,000, and obtained possession of it August 1st. There is a fine double brick house on the place, with outbuildings and nearly seven acres of grounds. It is the intention of the board to begin the erection of a wing to the house to cost $15,000, and Dr. J. S. Billings will superintend the work. The hospital will be open for the reception of patients very soon. The board has the money in bank to pay for these improvements, and they are in earnest about this matter." This statement disposes of the rumor extensively circulated that the scheme had failed for lack of adequate support.

Back Numbers.—Requests are Often Received at this office for numbers or volumes of The Christian Herald of the years 1879 and 1880. We have no copy for sale of either year. Any subscriber who possesses a file of the paper or a volume of either date, and desires to dispose of it, may hear of a purchaser by writing to the office, No. 63 Bible House, New York, N. Y.

Five Dollars in Aid of the Fund for Sending The Christian Herald to colored ministers in the South, have been received from William Armstrong, Manchester, N. H., and we gladly add to our mail-list five more of the names kindly sent to us by Southern friends. It is gratifying to learn that through this fund, not only the colored ministers are deriving benefit, but their congregations share in the blessing their ministers enjoy. Thus the contributors to the fund have the satisfaction of knowing that their money is expended in a very wide-reaching circle of good.

An Affrighted Wife's Mistake will Probably result in the death of her husband. She was often left alone at night, as her husband, who is a travelling salesman, residing in Minnesota, frequently goes too far away from home to return the same day. As she was somewhat apprehensive of burglarious attacks, he advised her to shoot anybody she saw prowling about the premises. One night recently the husband came in on a late train, and, failing to awaken his wife by knocking on the door, climbed a shade tree to gain admittance through the window. The noise aroused the wife, who jumped out of bed, got the revolver, and fired at the supposed burglar. The husband made his way to the ground with a ball in his side, and is now in a critical condition. His wife is nearly distracted over her mistake. The fierce denunciations hurled by Christians of one branch of Christ's Church against those of another branch, and often by ministers against each other, will doubtless end in such grief as that of this mistaken wife. When the darkness and mists of prejudice clear away, they will recognize in the faces of their antagonists the features of a brother (1 Cor. 4 : 5, 6).

A New Patent Life Preserver was Tested by the inventor at Philadelphia on August 29th. The apparatus consists of a larger circular rubber cushion, in the centre of which is a hole for the body of the wearer. After it is put on the cushion is inflated by means of an ingeniously constructed air-pump. Attached to the harness are webbed gloves of oiled silk, which may be used to propel and steer the operator. On Wednesday the professor, who invented it, invited his friends to see it in action. He put the thing on, and went down to the Delaware River. There he stood on the pier, flung himself overboard, and disappeared. An instant later, however, his head, shoulders, and breast were above water, but owing to the size of the air cushion and the way it was jammed up under his armpits, he was unable to reach the water with his webbed gloves. The tide was running up, and before the crowd realized his predicament the professor was sailing out in the channel as helpless a bit of flotsam as floated on the Delaware. Half a dozen small boats put off to rescue him, and he was taken out of the water and escorted back by a great crowd. Happily for this inventor his apparatus was tested when its failure did not involve disaster. It has not been so with the various preservers men have devised to prevent themselves sinking in the flood tide of sin. Education, culture, refinement, philosophy, and "the inherent nobility of human nature" have been tried, and in their failure have carried those who trusted them to their doom (Ps. 119 : 9).

Two Children Playing with a Rattlesnake were discovered by the mother of one of them a few days ago in a village near Stroudsburg, Pa. The children were about three years old, and were neighbors and playfellows. They were sitting on the grass in the rear of the house in which one of them lived, while the mother sat on the piazza watching their gambols. She noticed that while they were sitting side by side in the grass, her little one was occasionally lightly striking in front of her, with a short stick she had in her hand, and after each stroke both children would laugh loudly. The other child at intervals would bend forward, with her face close to the ground, and apparently stroke something with her hand. After this had continued for a few minutes, the mother thought she would go to ascertain what they were playing with. She was struck speechless and motionless with horror to see that their plaything was a large rattlesnake, which lay at full length, making no hostile demonstrations, simply raising its head when it was touched, opening its mouth, and darting its tongue out and in. It was this performance of the snake which caused the children's mirth. Finally she took a step or two forward, and the snake discovered her. Instantly its whole appearance changed. As quick as lightning it threw itself into the coil which gives it the power to make its deadly spring, and sounded its rattle. The children then became alarmed and ran away, and the reptile was quickly killed with a club. The mother's promptitude in rescuing the children from the danger they, in their innocence, were braving, is not always equalled by parents who see their offspring threatened by spiritual danger far more deadly (1 Samuel 3 : 13; Prov. 29 : 15).

A Drunken Man on a Revolving Belt at Lawrence, Mass., on August 11th, was tortured for four hours before death ended his sufferings. He was forty years of age and a habitual drunkard. On the last day of his life, while intoxicated, he entered the belt and boiler house of the Webster & Dustin building, at Lawrence. He doubtless went into the boiler-house with the intention of sleeping there, and in his dazed condition did not notice the belt, and fell upon it, being drawn by it against a pulley, where he was held fast. When found he was dead, and in two parts of his body the belt had eaten its way to the depth of three or four inches, showing that the man must have suffered terribly before death came to his relief. In his pockets was found his revolver, which was loaded, and twenty dollars in money, which showed that he had not been driven by poverty to sleep in so dangerous a place. There is a proverb current about a special providence watching over drunken men, but this incident does not illustrate it; it rather illustrates the scriptural warning (Prov. 23 : 29, 30).

The Marriage and Death of a Lady were recently announced together in a Brooklyn journal. The lady was the victim of consumption. When travelling in Illinois two years ago she made the acquaintance of a physician. Her many attractions made a deep impression on his mind, which culminated in a declaration of love. The two were engaged, and the young lady went to Florida for her health. Recently she became worse, and at her earnest entreaty was brought back to the North to die. On her arrival, her lover was sent for. He at once endeavored to persuade her to marry him, in order that he might more fittingly do all in his power to make her last moments comfortable. She finally consented, and the ceremony was performed. In spite of constant attention and medical care she died in forty-eight hours afterward. The funeral of the bride of two days, attended by the bereaved bridegroom, was a touching sight. The marriage relation is used in the Bible to typify the connection between Christ and His people. As in this sad case, the union is one formed for the sole benefit of the bride, but, unlike it, death means, not separation, but closer union (Eph. 5 : 25–27).

A $75,000 Mausoleum has been Erected at Cuttingsville, Vt., by a citizen who has therein deposited the remains of his beloved wife and daughter. It is twenty feet high, seventeen wide, and twenty long, and is believed to be the most magnificent modern tomb in the world. The interior is finished entirely in statuary and Brocadilla marbles. It contains exquisitely finished busts of the owner, his wife, and daughter. On either side of the mausoleum are posed in an angular juxtaposition, two immense French plate mirrors in elaborately engraved marble frames, which by their position produce a wonderful and dazzling optical illusion, presenting to the astonished observer vast marble halls and corridors stretching away in every direction as far as the eye can reach, peopled by a grand concourse of snow-white figures, while here and there on every hand a landscape greets the eye of mountain, vale, and stream, reflected from the portal at the front. We may hope that the souls of those whose bodies repose amid such splendor may now be moving amid much more glorious scenes. A man who so loved them as to build that magnificent habitation for their bodies, would surely labor and pray that their souls might be admitted into the glorious city John saw with its gates of pearl and foundations of jewels (Rev. 21 : 10–27).

A GOSPEL WORTH DYING FOR.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"To testify the gospel of the grace of God."—Acts 20 : 24.

Paul's Value of Life—Something still more Important—A Sacred Deposit—True Heroism—Death of Epaminondas—Paul's Readiness to Die for the Gospel—I. What the Gospel was—A Gospel of Grace—Of Promise—Within Reach of All—II. How to Live for the Gospel—A Non-Progressive Theology—A Boy on a Burning Deck—Making the Gospel Known—Testifying to it—III. Why the Gospel Should be made Known—The Only Gospel—The Vision John Saw.

PAUL says that, in comparison with his great object of preaching the Gospel, he did not count even his life to be dear to himself; yet we are sure Paul highly valued life. He had the same love of life as other men, and he knew besides that his own life was of great consequence to the churches, and to the cause of Christ. In another place he said, "To abide in the flesh is more needful for you." He was not weary of life, nor was he a vain person who could treat life as though it were a thing to fling away in sport. He valued life, for he prized time, which is the stuff that life is made of, and he turned to practical account each day and hour, "redeeming the time because the days are evil." Yet he soberly said to the elders of the church at Ephesus that he did not regard his life as a dear thing in comparison with bearing testimony to the Gospel of the grace of God.

According to the verse before us the apostle regarded life as a race which he had to run. Now, the more quickly a race is run the better; certainly, length is not the object of desire. The one thought of a runner is how he can most speedily reach the winning-post. He spurns the ground beneath him; he cares not for the course he traverses except so far as it is the way over which he must run to reach his desired end. Such was life to Paul: all the energies of his spirit were consecrated to the pursuit of one object—namely, that he might everywhere bear testimony to the Gospel of the grace of God; and the life which he lived here below was only valued by him as a means to that end.

He also regarded the Gospel, and his ministry in witnessing to it, as

which had been committed to him by the Lord Himself. He looked upon himself "as put in trust with the Gospel;" and he resolved to be faithful though it should cost him his life. All believers occupy a somewhat similar place. We are none of us called to the apostleship, and we may not all have been called to the public preaching of the Word of God; but we are all charged to be valiant for the truth upon the earth, and to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. Oh, to do this in the spirit of the apostle of the Gentiles!

Paul was a true hero; a hero of even a nobler stamp than those brave Greeks whose stories still stir the blood and fire the soul. Their heroism to a large extent depended upon public note, the present approval of their fellow-citizens, or upon the animal excitement of the battle-field; but Paul's heroism, so far as man was concerned, was self-contained, deliberate, and as sure to display itself in the solitude of a dungeon as in the assembly of the faithful. He was parting with his weeping friends, and going forward to trials of unknown intensity, but he was altogether unmoved by fear, and advanced on his way without a question.

His leave-taking of the elders irresistibly reminds me of the old historian's record of Epaminondas the Theban general who, when he was mortally wounded by a Spartan spear, the head of which remained in his flesh, bade his friends leave it alone a little, "for," said he, "I have lived long enough if I die unconquered;" and when they told him that the battle was won, and that his comrades were victorious, he bade them draw out the head of the spear, that his life might end. One observed to him that he had fallen, but that he had not lost his shield, and that the victory was won; to which he replied with his last breath, "Your Epaminondas thus dying doth not die." So Paul has lived long enough if the Gospel is prospering in its course, and though he lays down his life he does not die if his ministry is fulfilled.

We shall this morning first of all inquire, what was this gospel which Paul judged to be worth dying for?—"the Gospel of the grace of God." When we have made that inquiry, I think we shall be prepared for another; if we cannot die for it, how can we live for it? and then, thirdly, I shall press this consecration upon you by answering the question—Why should we? Oh, that the Holy Spirit may work in us the holy devotion and self-sacrifice of Paul!

I. First, then, our inquiry this morning is, for which Paul would die? It is not everything called "gospel" which would produce such enthusiasm, or deserve it. For, my brethren, we have gospels nowadays which I would not die for, nor recommend any one of you to live for, inasmuch as they are gospels that will be snuffed out within a few years. It is never worth while to die for a doctrine which will itself die out. I have lived long enough to see half a dozen new gospels rise, flourish, and decay. They told me long ago that my old Calvinistic doctrine was far behind the age, and was an exploded thing; and next I heard that evangelical teaching in any form was a thing of the past, to be supplanted by "advanced thought." I have heard of one improvement upon the old faith and then of another; and the philosophical divines are still improving their theology. They have gone on advancing and advancing, till heaven knows and perhaps hell knows what next they will advance to; but I am sure I do not. I would not die for any one of all the modern systems.

What is this gospel which Paul valued before his own life? It was called by him "the Gospel of the grace of God." That which most forcibly struck the apostle in the Gospel was that it was and of grace alone. Amid the music of the glad tidings one note rang out above all others and charmed the apostle's ear; that note was grace—the grace of God. That note he regarded as characteristic of the whole strain: the gospel was "the Gospel of the grace of God." In these days that word "grace" is not often heard; we hear of moral duties, and scientific adjustments, and human progress; but who tells us of "the grace of God" except a few old-fashioned people who will soon be gone? As one of those antiquated folk I am here this morning, and I shall try to sound out that word "GRACE" so that those who know its joyful sound shall be glad, and those who despise it shall be cut to the heart. Grace is the essence of the Gospel. Grace is the one hope of this fallen world! Grace is the sole comfort of saints looking forward for glory! Let me try to explain in a brief manner how the Gospel is the good news of grace.

The Gospel is an announcement that God is prepared to deal with guilty man on the ground of free favor and pure mercy. There would be no good news in saying that God is just; for, in the first place, that is not news, we know that God is just; the natural conscience teaches man that. That God will punish sin and reward righteousness is not news at all; and if it were news, yet it would not be good news, for we have all sinned, and upon the ground of justice we must perish. But it is news, and news of the best kind, that the Judge of all is prepared to pardon transgression, and to justify the ungodly. Ah, Paul, I can understand your getting into a holy excitement over such a revelation as that of free grace. I can understand your being willing to throw your life away that you might tell to your fellow-sinners that grace reigns through righteousness unto eternal life.

But the Gospel tells us much more than this, namely, that in order to His dealing with men upon the ground of free favor, God the Father has Himself removed the grand obstacle which stood in

THE WAY OF MERCY.

God is just; that is a truth most sure; man's conscience knows it to be so, and man's conscience will never rest content unless it can see that the justice of God is vindicated. Therefore, in order that God might justly deal in a way of pure mercy with men, He gave His only-begotten Son, that by His death the law might receive its due, and the eternal principles of His government might be maintained. Jesus was appointed to stand in man's stead, to bear man's sin, and endure the chastisement of man's guilt.

In the Gospel there is also revealed a motive for mercy which is in agreement with the grace of God. There is always needed in the action of every wise man a competent motive; men do not act without reason if they are reasonable men. The same is true with God, the highest of all intelligences; He acts upon the highest reasons. His motive for dealing with men on the footing of free grace is the revealing of His own glorious character.

In order to the accomplishment of the designs of grace it was necessary further that a Gospel message should be issued encouragement, and blessing; and truly that message has been delivered to us; for that Gospel which we preach to-day is full of grace to the very brim. It speaks on this wise: Sinner, just as you are, return unto the Lord, and He will receive you graciously and love you freely. God hath said, "I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." For Christ's sake, and not because of any agonies, or tears, or sorrows on your part, He will remove your sins as far from you as the east is from the west. The Gospel message is of grace, because it is directed to those whose only claim is their need. The whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick. Christ came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance. Come, therefore, ye morally sick; ye whose brows are white with the leprosy of sin; come and welcome, for to you is this free Gospel proclaimed by divine authority. Assuredly such a message as this is worth any exertion for its spreading, and it is so blessed, so divine, that we may gladly pour out our blood to proclaim it.

Further, brethren: that this Gospel blessing might come within the reach of men, God's grace has adopted a method suitable to their condition. "How can I be forgiven?" saith one, "tell me truly and quickly!" "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." God asks of you no good works, nor good feelings either, but that you be willing to accept what He most freely gives. He saves upon believing. This is faith; that thou believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and that thou trust thyself with Him.

Dost thou say, "But faith itself seems beyond my reach"? Then, in the Gospel of the grace of God we are told that even and that He works it in men by His Holy Spirit; for apart from that Spirit they lie dead in trespasses and sins. Oh, what grace is this, that the faith which is commanded is also conferred! "But," saith one, "if I were to believe in Christ and have my past sins forgiven, yet I fear I should go back to sin; for I have no strength by which to keep myself for the future." Hearken! the Gospel of the grace of God is this, that He will keep thee to the end. Dost thou hear this, thou guilty one—thou who hast no claim upon God's grace whatever? His free grace comes to thee, even to thee; and if thou art made willing to receive it, thou art this day a saved man, and saved forever beyond all question. I do say it again, this is a Gospel so well worth the preaching that I can understand Paul saying, "Neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God."

I read in an old book

of one who was under concern of soul. He fell asleep and dreamed that he was out in the wilds in a terrible storm. The lightnings flamed around him, and the voice of the thunder made the earth to rock beneath him. He looked eagerly around for a shelter. He ran to the first house before him, but he was denied admittance. He that dwelt there was named Justice, and he said in angry tones, "Get thee gone—I cannot shelter a criminal, a traitor to his King and God!" He fled to the next house, and it turned out to be the mansion of Truth. Truth came to the door with calm but stern countenance, and said, "Thou art full of falsehood, thou canst not sojourn here." He fled to the home of Peace, which stood near, and hoped that there perhaps he might be housed from the storm; but Peace said, "Begone! there is no peace, saith my God, unto the wicked." He could not then tell what to do, for the storm waxed yet more furious; when lo! he saw a portal over which was written "Mercy." "Ay," said he, "this is the place for me, for I am guilty." The door was open and he was welcomed there. To that house I invite you. Come in and be at rest. You who cannot as yet be harbored by justice, or peace, or truth, may come to mercy, and receive abundant grace.

This is the Gospel of the grace of God, and I know that it touches the heart of many of you. It often stirs my soul like the sound of martial music, to think of my Lord's grace from old eternity, a grace that is constant to its choice, and will be constant to it when all these visible things shall disappear as sparks that fly from the chimney. My heart is glad within me to have to preach free grace and dying love; I can understand why crowds met at dead of night to hear of the grace of God. I can understand the Covenanters on the bleak hills listening, with sparkling eyes, as Cameron preached of the grace of the great King! There is something in a free-grace Gospel worth preaching, worth listening to, worth living for, and worth dying for!

II. This brings me to the second head; you and I are not called to die for it just yet; let us see to-day that we live for it. How can we of the grace of God?

I answer, first, if anybody here is to live for this Gospel, he must have received it from God, and he must have received a call to minister or serve for it. He must feel himself under bonds to hold and keep this Gospel; not so much because he has chosen it, but because it has chosen him. I forget who it was, but a quaint old minister was once told that he could not preach in a certain pulpit if he held the doctrines of grace. "Well," said he, "I think I might be allowed to preach there, for I can truly say that I do not hold the doctrines of grace, the doctrines of grace hold me." That might be rather a quibble, but there is a grand truth in it. When a man picks and selects his creed, the probabilities are that by-and-by he will pick again, and will select another next time.

There is about the love which constitutes our domestic bliss a something of necessity; our beloved one was chosen by us, but yet we could not help it, we were carried away and overborne, and so our marriage came to pass. It was not altogether choice, there was a mystic power that enchained our hearts; and I am sure it is so with the doctrines of grace if we believe them—we chose them with a willing soul, but yet we were under constraint, and could do no other. To me there is but one form of doctrine; I know no other. Brethren, I cannot be of any other faith than that which I preached nearly twenty-nine years ago on this platform.*

I think I have read as much as most men, and

* This sermon was preached in Exeter Hall, where Mr. Spurgeon's congregation is now worshipping, while the Tabernacle is being renovated.

I know most of the maunderings of advanced thinkers; but I have never come into their secret, and I never can. I abhor the very idea of an advance upon the Gospel which Paul preached. I am to-day what I was when, as a youth, I preached to crowds in this Hall. I have progressed in my theology not so much as the tithe of an inch. I hope I preach better and with more experimental knowledge of the truth; but that which I preached thirty-three years ago I preach to-day.

You know the story of the boy who stood upon the burning deck because his father said, "Stand you there;" and I desire to imitate his steadfastness. Other boys might be much wiser than he was, but his wisdom was obedience. I prefer obeying God to being wise with my own wisdom. The Gospel which the Bible has revealed, and the Holy Ghost has taught me, I must preach, and no other. I am incapable of believing the novelties of the hour. I must abide in my old faith. I would say with Luther, "I cannot help it, so help me God!" You shall leave this rock, if you like, my brother, for you may be able to swim; but I must stop where I am, for I should drown. When the crack of doom shall be heard, I shall be here, God helping me, believing the Gospel of the grace of God and none other creed. Steadfastness at this particular time has a special value, and I urge you to it; to the Gospel which ye have received, to the Gospel of the grace of God, I implore you to stand fast so long as you live.

But the next thing Paul did was to MAKE IT KNOWN.

Wherever he went he published the Gospel. This is what we must do. "Oh," says one, "I cannot make it known." Why not? "I could not tell out the Gospel." Why not? "Why, I am a person of mean appearance, and I do not suppose people would pay me any respect." Just what they said about Paul—"his personal presence is weak." "Oh, but I am no speaker." Just so, that also is what they said of Paul—"His speech is contemptible." "Oh, but if I were to say anything, I could not adorn it with a figure of speech, or illustrate it with a simile; I could not even quote a bit of poetry, to make it fine." Paul also used home-spun. He says, "We use great plainness of speech." Many of the other teachers were great orators, but Paul always fought shy of oratory; he stood up and allowed the truth to flow out of his mouth freely, in its own way; and I do believe at the present moment we want a race of preachers who will not be fine, or scholarly, or rhetorical, or sensational; men of whom you will say when you have heard them—"I cannot make out why people flock to hear such a ministry. All that they can go for is what the man says; for he does not say it grandly, he does not seem as if he wanted to do so, he appears only concerned to get his message out of his own heart, and get it into the people's hearts." That is just what Paul did.

Do you not think that you could tell the Gospel out in his fashion? "Oh, but I have so many infirmities." Yes, Paul said he gloried in infirmities because the power of Christ the more clearly rested on him. When he had done preaching the people could not say, "Oh, we understand why we felt it so; you see Paul practises all the graces of manner. We quite understand why his speech penetrated our hearts; he has such a melodious, bell-like voice. We can understand why we like to hear him; he has such expressive eyes, they look into our souls." Now, Paul, in all probability, had weak eyes; according to his name he was a short man; and it is likely that he spoke very plainly. Yet he never felt sorry that it was so; on the contrary, he believed that in his weakness he was strong, for the power of Christ rested upon him. He hoped also that for this very reason their faith would not stand in the wisdom of man, but in the power of God. Brothers and sisters, we are all qualified, to go and tell to others the Gospel of the grace of God.

Yet further, Paul desired to testify to the Gospel. Now, to testify is something more than to proclaim; it means to bear personal witness to the truth. Paul was specially was he not? When he preached he frequently told that story about the fierce persecutor who was on the way to Damascus, and was suddenly struck down—a persecutor who had never asked to be saved by grace, who had no free-will toward Christ, but who had a very strong will against Him, and was haling men and women to prison, and compelling them to blaspheme, being exceeding mad against them. Oh, how sweetly Paul told out the Gospel of the grace of God when he said, "The Lord appeared to me by the way." "I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might show forth all long-suffering for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting." Friend, cannot you tell of your conversion, and let men know how free grace came to you when you looked not for it?

Nor would Paul end there; for he would often tell his consolations, how the Gospel had comforted him when he had been stoned, and tried by false brethren, and yet had been upheld by the grace of God. My friend, if the Gospel has done nothing for you, hold your tongue or speak against it; but if the Gospel has done for you what it has done for some of us, if it has changed the current of your life, if it has lifted you up from the dunghill and made you to sit as on a throne, if it is to-day your meat and your drink, if to your life it is the very centre and sun—then bear constant witness to it.

III. My time is gone, but yet I must detain you a minute while I remind you of reasons why we, my brethren, should live to make known the Gospel of the grace of God.

First, because it is the only Gospel in the world, after all. These

of the hour, which come and go like a penny newspaper, which has its day and then is thrown aside, have no claim on any man's zeal. These changing moons of doctrine, what are they doing for England? They are doing much evil in this city—they are alienating the mass of the people from going to any place of worship at all. Why should they come to hear uncertainties? Why should they come merely to be taught their duty, and to be moralized, and so on? Men are not led to assemble in multitudes by such poor attractions. I do not know that I should go across the street Sunday after Sunday merely to hear a moral essay. I might as well stay at home and read the paper. But to hear the Gospel of the grace of God is worth many a mile's walk, and if it were plainly set forth in all our churches and chapels I warrant we should see very few empty pews; the people would come and hear it, for they always have done so.

It is your graceless Gospel which starves the flock till they forsake the pasture; it is your Socinian reasoning which leads men to treat ministry and public worship with contempt. The old Gospel is a sweet savor which attracts the masses. When Whitefield sounded it forth, what common was big enough to hold the thousands? Man wants something that shall cheer his heart in the midst of his labor, and give him hope under a sense of sin. As the thirsty need water, so does man want the Gospel of the grace of God. And there are no two Gospels in the world any more than there are two suns in the heavens. There is but one atmosphere for us to breathe, and one Gospel for us to live by. "Other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, Jesus Christ the righteous." Therefore tell out the Gospel, lest men die for lack of the knowledge of it.

Now, if you and I arouse ourselves this day, and God's Holy Spirit shall help us so to do, and we begin to proclaim the Gospel of the grace of God, do you know what I think is sure to happen? I prophesy the best results. They tell us that all sorts of evils are growing strong, and brethren, darkly prophetic, tell us that awful times are coming—I cannot tell you how dreadful they are to be. Popery is to come back according to some, and once again the harlot of the Seven Hills is to dominate over all the earth. Is she? We shall see. If you boldly proclaim the Gospel I tell you it will not be so. If the Gospel of the grace of God be fully and fairly preached it cannot be so.

Listen to what John saw—"I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, fear God and give glory to Him." Do you see that angel? Observe what follows! Close behind him flies another celestial herald. "And there followed another angel, saying, Babylon is fallen, that great city, because she made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication." Fly, angel of the everlasting Gospel! Fly, for as surely as thou dost speed thy flight, that other angel will follow who shall proclaim the downfall of Babylon, and of every other system that opposeth itself to the grace of the Lord God Almighty! The Lord stir you up for His name's sake. Amen.

THE ISLAND OF ISCHIA.

ON page 572 and on the first page of this number are views of different parts of the Island of Ischia as they existed previous to the awful calamity of July 28th.

The island has been noted for its health-restoring baths for centuries. It lies off the southwest coast of Italy, fifteen miles from Naples, and during the summer tourists and invalids can take any one of several steamers which run from Naples to the island daily. In the winter communication is less frequent.

In its general shape the island resembles an egg. It is sixteen miles in circumference, and lies directly west of the Bay of Naples. The inhabitants all told number over 28,000. The leading towns are Casamicciola, where the greatest number of lives was lost, situated something over a mile from the landing place for steamers on the north shore; Forio, on the west coast, and Ischia, on the northeast coast. Ischia is nearer Naples than either of the other towns, but the landing place is not good, and hence Casamicciola is the terminus of the steamers' trips. Casamicciola lies at the foot and north of Mount Epomeo, which rises to a height of 2700 feet and commands a beautiful view of the Bay of Naples and Mount Vesuvius. The general direction of the elevation is east and west—with the island. Both Forio and Ischia are north of the mountains, and Lacceameno is a small village near by.

Casamicciola consisted of a row or two of houses, and a little piazza on the shore level, the rest of the town rising abruptly on the hillside, on which it scattered itself in a capricious and irregular manner, which gave it a singularly picturesque and agreeable aspect, as seen from the sea. Hotels, pensions, and private houses seemed to have perched themselves capriciously here and there among their gardens and orange-groves, and some of the streets in the upper town ran in the same way along the edges of natural terraces in the hill-side. This conformation of the town certainly added to the horrors of its situation. In some cases houses falling bodily from above crushed others standing on a lower level. In others, as, for instance, near the little church, whole buildings toppled from the little coign of vantage on which they stood, into the adjacent valley, forming masses of masonry, dislodged earth, and half-uprooted trees, which rendered the task of regular excavation and search for the bodies of almost superhuman difficulty.

The town of Ischia, of which a representation is given above, is at the north-eastern part of the island, and appears to have escaped the destruction which overwhelmed its more prosperous rival city, Casamicciola. Ischia is the more ancient city.

The Rev. J. C. Fletcher, in a letter to The Evangelist, written three days after the calamity, thus speaks of the Island of Ischia which he passed in a small steamer forty-eight hours before the earthquake occurred: "On the 26th of July—Thursday last—I had to leave Naples to go to Genoa to preach in the Presbyterian Church for the Rev. Donald Miller. I embarked with my wife on a steamer which plies between Palermo, Naples, Leghorn, Genoa, and Marseilles. The day was exquisite; the Bay of Naples, with Vesuvius sending up its graceful column of vapor, now seemed more beautiful and attractive than ever. By some whim of our captain, the steamer, instead of passing through the channel between Ischia and the mainland, took us around three sides of the island, and thus, though I knew Ischia well, I was enabled to comprehend its size better than before, and to see every town and hamlet upon its sides or down on the margin of the sea. It has an area of twenty-four square miles (that is two square miles more than Manhattan Island), and has a population, by the last census, of 30,000.

"The scene was lovely and impressive in the highest degree, and when I at last lost sight of the fading towns and villas of Ischia, I thought that no landscape could be sweeter and more full of repose. A little more than forty-eight hours after this, while the islanders were surrounded in their pretty homes by their families, talking of the week's work done, suddenly a tremendous shock was felt, and a sound was heard which sounded as if an express train at greatest speed were thundering over an iron bridge. Two other shocks rapidly succeeded, and the terrible work was done."

THE COMING GREAT EARTHQUAKE.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

THE earthquake in Ischia with its terrible destruction of life has horrified the whole civilized world. To the student of prophecy, however, it speaks with a voice, not only solemn, but premonitory. To him its lessons are obvious. Though on a small scale compared with the destruction which overwhelmed the cities of Herculaneum and Pompeii, or with the ruin caused by the earthquake at Lisbon in 1755, it is a sufficient reminder to us of what is predicted in Holy Writ as marking the final end of the drama of the present dispensation of the world, when there shall be "Earthquakes in divers places" (Matthew 24 : 7). The Ischian episode bears only a faint resemblance to what one day will be enacted on a scale as awful [as it will be sudden when, as a modern poet says, will be heard

"A universal crash
As if the very ribs of Nature broke
And all her dark foundations failed."

Latter-day scoffers ask with an air of cynical unbelief, "Where is the promise of His coming? for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning of the Creation"—a statement which is manifestly contradicted by such results as those which the recent earthquake reveals to us. But the Apostle, with the strongest emphasis, declares that "the day of the Lord will come," and, what is equally certain, just as we have seen in the mysterious and terrible convulsion at Ischia, it will come when men least suspect it. That day "will come as a thief in the night"—"the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with a fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burned."

Several hundred commentators agree that we are living at the end of the Sixth Vial mentioned in the sixteenth chapter of Revelation, and are consequently standing on the threshold of the Seventh and Last Vial, on the outpouring of which there is to be "a great since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake and so great, and the cities of the nations shall fall." Therefore, undoubtedly within a few years from now the cities of the nations, a term which appears to embrace the chief cities of every nation, will be shaken down by this coming unparalleled earthquake (Rev. 16 : 17, 18).

This Coming Great Earthquake is also foretold in Ezekiel 38 : 20, where it is predicted to cause "every wall to fall to the ground."

The Rock, a prominent English journal, in its comments upon the catastrophe, says:

"The final dissolution of the present framework of our globe—not its annihilation—will be the precursor to a state of things which will be evolved out of the present world by a process not altogether dissimilar from that which has just taken place in the south of Europe. When men shall be wholly absorbed in their schemes of avarice or ambition; when worldliness in all its fascination shall be at its height; when the long process of repose, and the regularity of nature's laws will suggest the idea of the continuity and stability of 'the earth and the works that are therein;' when the sneer of the sceptic and the ribaldry of the profane will urge men to inquire 'where is the promise of His coming?'—then, in the very midst of the gay scenes of the world's revelry, when all around wears the face of festivity and careless glee, in a moment, without warning, will come upon the unthinking inhabitants of this planet. The tremendous forces of nature, now held in reserve, will then be let loose, and the world of that period will be made to feel that the Apostolic warning was not a cunningly-devised fable, but a terrible reality, far outweighing in its results anything which the inventive faculty of man could possibly have devised."

SUDDEN DESTRUCTION

A HUSBAND'S PAINFUL DISCOVERY.

(See Illustration.)

"ALICE, will you come for a walk?" said a man of some thirty years of age, apparently a respectable clerk, addressing his wife, to whom he had been married about a year.

"Yes, dear, with great pleasure," she answered, and hurried away to dress.

"This is a glorious evening," she said, as they strolled through the shady paths of a large public park. "I think this Indian summer is the most beautiful time of the whole year. I looked forward to this time all through those bitter cold winter days."

"Yes," he said, "this is much better, but I was very happy in the winter. It was so nice to come home through the snow, expecting all the way the warm room and the loving welcome I always had. It was worth all the discomfort outside. You have made me very happy, Alice. This last year is the golden year of my life. It seems almost too good to last."

"Oh, don't say that, Robert. I trust we shall have many such. I only need one thing to complete my happiness; I long to see you a Christian. You cannot think how earnestly I pray for that."

"Well, well, all in good time, my love. You have done wonders already. I am a very different man from the wretch I was before you knew me. Why, I do not know myself. I never spent an evening innocently like this or like the evenings we had last winter. Every night it was either the theatre or the saloon, sometimes one, sometimes the other. And always rum and bad company. I should surely have been murdered or done murder if you had not saved me. Now I go to church regularly with you, and there is no knowing what you will do for me in time."

"Robert saw her packing and started with a gesture of dismay."

"Don't say that, Robert, it is not I who can do that. I am weak enough, but God can save you and keep you safe. You must not trust in me. O Robert, do pray God to give you a new heart! I do not like to think of you attributing your better life to my influence. If that were all, you would go back to your sin if I were to die."

"Do not speak of such a thing, Alice; if I were to lose you it would kill me. If I did live, the memory of you would keep me safe, I think. I never knew what life really meant till I had you. You are my heaven."

"Ah, Robert, when you talk so you break my heart. It is very blessed to know you love me so much, but I cannot think of that when you call me your heaven. It grieves me; unless you seek the heaven above, you will never know real happiness. I want you to love Jesus, then you will be kept safely, and will know how good He is."

"There, there, do not fret, my love, I will do as you wish, but I feel too wicked to pray. Do you think God would hear a man who has led so bad a life as I? It is worse than your dear innocent soul can conceive."

Then Alice told him of the unutterable love of Christ, of His receiving the worst of sinners and forgiving them, and her husband was melted almost to tears as he listened. They walked around the park until it grew dark, and then entered the brightly-lighted streets of the city on their way to their happy home.

They met crowds of people hastening to the various places of amusement, and more than once as they passed buildings resplendent in electric lights and with huge posters at the doors, Robert told his wife their names, and pressing the hand that rested lovingly on his arm hurried on as if he thought the very sight of them a profanation to the gentle Christian woman at his side.

As they passed one such place Alice noticed a showily dressed woman with hard, bold face, the livid tints of which told of habitual intoxication, looking earnestly, it seemed angrily, at herself and her husband. She was about to mention this strange manner to him, when she lost sight of the woman in the crowd and thought no more of it. A few moments afterward, however, she was nearly thrown to the ground by a rough push that separated her from her husband with a wrench which almost broke her arm. As she recovered her balance and turned to ascertain the cause, she saw the woman she had seen in the crowd standing face to face with Robert, and glaring at him wildly.

"So," she was saying, "I have found you at last, have I? You thought I was dead, I suppose. But I ain't; I'm very much alive, as you'll find. You are not rid of me yet. You'd have killed me if you could. But I had friends as took care of me. I've been earning my own living since then, but I don't mean to do it any longer. What's the use of a husband if he don't keep you. Say, Robert, aren't you glad to have found your long-lost wife?"

Robert made no reply to this torrent of words. A ghastly pallor spread itself over his features, which turned to a look of abject misery as he looked helplessly at Alice. The woman followed the direction of his glance, and said: "Ah! that is the young woman you had with you. Come here, my dear, let me introduce you. This is my husband. I expect he's been fooling you. He left me sick in hospital. I was run over one night when I had been having a good time, and they carried me there, and they told him I was dead and buried in Potter's Field, but it wasn't me. But he didn't care; he was glad to hear I was dead. But I am a pretty lively corpse, ain't I?"

At last Alice found her voice. "It is not true, Robert. Oh, you can surely deny it?"

"Heaven help me, my poor child, I cannot," he said. "It is quite true, but I never knew it until this moment. Go home now," he added, in a lower tone, "I will come to you soon."

Alice turned away with such desolation at her heart as she had never known before. She was sick—stunned by the terrible revelation. She went home, to her a home no longer, and for hours sat there motionless in a stupor of grief and horror. Robert did not come, until at last as morning was breaking she heard his step. She was then on her knees before a trunk she was packing with her wearing apparel preparatory to the journey she knew she must take. Her heart bled for her husband, but there was no question in her mind as to her duty.

As Robert entered and saw what she was doing, he started back with an exclamation of dismay. "You surely will not leave me to that woman," he cried in a voice of anguish. "It will be my ruin, body and soul. I cannot give you up, my poor, wronged wife."

"You must, Robert. I cannot do wrong even for your sake, dearly as I love you. I am going away now, but I shall never cease to pray for you. But O Robert, do pray for yourself and that miserable woman."

"But I cannot let you go. Do listen to reason, Alice," he said. "My marriage with that woman was no marriage. There is no union where there is no union of soul. Your duty as a Christian is to stay with me lest you undo all the good you have done for me."

Alice shook her head; such sophistries were of no avail with her. "I am going, Robert. I am doing right. God help you, my poor fellow, to bear the burden bravely and faithfully."

Robert continued pleading with her for some time, but to no purpose. She continued her packing until all was done, and then went to the chair in which he had flung himself in an agony of remorse, which shook his frame with sobs. "Good-by," she said, "God will help you if you will ask Him. May He bless and keep you," and gently kissing his forehead she went out of her once happy home to earn her bread.

It was many years before the two met again. During that time Robert drained to the dregs the cup of remorse his own sin had prepared. Degraded in reputation, and pauperized in pocket by the woman who bore his name, he still strove to be patient, and even labored hard for her reformation. But his efforts were futile, and she ultimately drank herself to death. When Alice and he at last met, after a long search on Robert's part, they were nearer in heart than when they had parted. Sorrow and remorse had done their chastening work, and Robert had sought and found the Saviour of sinners.

A SERIAL STORY.

Ann Holland's Self-sacrifice.

"SIR," Ann said one evening, when Mr. Chantrey, worn out with the conflict of his own parting with his people, was sitting depressed and silent by her fireside, "Mr. Chantrey, are you thinking of taking out a servant with you?"

"No," he answered; "the cost would be too much. You forget we are going to be poor folks out yonder, Ann. Don't you remember telling me it might have been better for my wife if she had had to work hard for Charlie and me?"

"That was long ago," she replied; "it's different now. Who's to mind you if you are ill?

and who's to see Master Charlie kept nice, like a gentleman's son? I've been thinking it would break my heart to sit at home thinking of you all. There is nothing to keep me here, now my poor brother's gone. Take me with you, sir."

"No, no!" he exclaimed, vehemently—so vehemently that she knew how his heart leaped at the thought of it; "you must not sacrifice yourself for us. What! give up this pleasant home of yours, and all your old friends? No; it cannot be."

"There'd be trouble in it," she said; "but it would be a harder trouble to think of you in foreign parts, with none but savages about you, and no roof over your head, and wild beasts marauding about."

"Not so bad as that," he interrupted, smiling so cheerfully that her own face brightened. "There are no wild beasts, and not many natives, and I shall have a home of my own somewhere."

"I could never sleep at nights," she went on, "or eat my bread in comfort, for wondering about you. I don't want to be a cost to you; and when I've sold all, I shall have a little sum of money in hand that will keep me a year or two after my passage is paid. I'm not too old for work yet. If it's too bad a place for me to go to, what must it be for you? And you're not as strong as you ought to be, sir. If anything should happen to you out there you'd like to know I was with them you love, taking care of them."

"It would be a greater comfort than I can tell," said Mr. Chantrey, in a tremulous voice. "Now and then the thought crosses my mind that I might die yonder; and what would become of Sophy and Charlie, left so desolate? There's Warden; but he is too austere and harsh, good as he is. But, Ann, I ought not to let you come."

"There's no duty to keep me at home," she answered. "If my poor brother was alive, I could never forsake him, you know; but that is all over now. And I could have patience with her, poor lady! Ay, I'd have patience for her own sake as well as yours. She could never try me as I've been tried. And I've great hopes of her. Maybe if James, poor fellow, could have broken off all his old ways, and begun again fresh, turning over a new leaf where folks hadn't seen the old one, he might have been saved. I've great hopes of Mrs. Chantrey; and nobody could help her as I could. It seems almost as if our blessed Lord laid this thing before me, and asked me to do it for His sake. Sure if He asked me to go all round the world for Him, I couldn't say no. To go to New Zealand with folks I love will be nothing to Him leaving heaven, with His Father and the holy angels there, to live and work like a poor man in this world, and to die on the cross at the end of all."

Her voice fell into its lowest and tenderest key as she spoke these last words, and the tears stood in her eyes, as if the thought of Christ's life, so long familiar, had started into a new meaning for her. The opportunity for copying Him more literally than she had ever done before was granted to her, and her spirit sprang forward eagerly to seize it. Mr. Chantrey sat silent, yet with a lighter heart than he had had for months. He felt that if Ann Holland went out with them half his load would be gone. There was a brighter hope for Sophy, and there would be a sure friend for his boy, whatever his own fate might be. Yet he shrank from accepting such a sacrifice, and could only see the selfishness of doing so at the first moment.

"You must take another week to think of it," he said.

But when the week was ended, Ann Holland was more confirmed in her wish than before. The news that she was going out with Mr. Chantrey's family caused as great a stir in the town as that of the rector's resignation. The Hollands had always been saddlers in Upton, and all the true old Upton people had faithfully adhered to them, never being tempted away by interlopers from London or other places, who professed to do better work at lower prices. To be sure the last male Holland was gone, but every one knew that his only share in the business for many years had been the spending of the money it brought in. That Ann Holland should give up her good trade and go out as servant to the Chantreys—for so it was represented by the news-bearers—was an unheard-of, incredible thing. Many were the remonstrances she had to listen to, and to answer as best she could.

It was a bitter day for Ann Holland when she saw her treasured household furniture sold by auction and scattered to the four winds. Many of her old neighbors bought for themselves some mementoes of the place they knew so well, but the bulk of the larger articles were sold without sentiment or feeling. It was a pang to part with each one of them, as they were carried off to some strange or hostile house to be put to common uses. The bare walls and empty rooms that were left, which she had never seen bare and empty before, seemed terribly new, yet familiar to her. She wandered through them for a few minutes, loitering in each one as she thought of all that had happened to her during her monotonous life; and then, with a sorrowful yet brave heart, she walked along the street to the rectory, which was already dismantled and bare like the home she had just left.

During these busy weeks Mrs. Bolton had looked on in almost sullen silence, except when now and then she had broken out into a passionate invective of her nephew's madness. He had never been indifferent to the luxuries and refinements that give a charm to life, and her nature could not comprehend how all these were poisoned at their source for him. He was eager to exchange them for a chance of a true home, however lowly that home might be. He would willingly have gone to the wilds of Siberia, if by so doing he could secure his wife's reformation. An almost feverish haste possessed him. To carry her away from Upton, from England, and to enter upon a quite new career in a strange place, and to accomplish this plan quickly, absorbed him nearly to the exclusion of any other thought. Mrs. Bolton felt herself very much neglected and greatly aggrieved. Her plans were frustrated and her comforts threatened, yet her nephew hardly seemed to think of her—he for whom she had done so much, who would not have been even rector of Upton but for the late archdeacon.

Yet she relented a little from her displeasure as the day for parting came. She was as fond of him and his boy as her nature would allow. Sophy had never been otherwise than an object of her jealousy, and now she positively detested her. But when Mr. Chantrey came on the last evening to sit an hour or two with her, and she saw, as with newly-opened eyes, his care-worn face and wearied, feeble frame, her heart quite melted toward him.

"Remember," she said, eagerly, "you can come back again whenever you choose, as soon as you grow sure how useless this mad scheme is. I wish I could have persuaded you to keep on your living, but you are too wilful. You are welcome to draw upon me for funds to return at any time, and I shall supply them gladly, and give you a home here. If you find your expectations fail, promise me to come back."

"And bring Sophy with me?" he asked, with almost a smile.

"No, no," she answered, shrinking involuntarily from the idea of having her in her house. "O my poor boy! what can you do?"

"I can only bear the burden sin lays upon me," he said. "It is not permitted to us to shake off the iniquities of others. All of us, more or less, must share in the sufferings of Christ, bearing our portion of the sins of the world, which He bore, even unto death. I am ready to die, if that will save my poor Sophy from her sin.

"But all that makes a Christian life so miserable!" exclaimed Mrs. Bolton.

"If in this life only we have hoped in Christ, then are we of all men men most miserable," he answered.

"And you would teach that we must give up everything," she cried, "all advantages, and blessings, and innocent indulgences, and pleasures of every kind?"

"If the sins or temptations of those about call for such a sacrifice, we must give them up, every one," he replied; "they are no longer blessings or innocent indulgences. If God calls upon us to make some sacrifice, and we refuse to do it, do you think He will yield like some weak parent, who will suffer his child to run the risk of serious injury rather than give him present pain? The whole law of our life is sacrifice, as it was the law of Christ's life. It is possible that some small self-denial at the right moment may spare us some costly expiation later on. Christianity must perish if it loses sight of this law."

Mrs. Bolton did not answer him. Was he thinking of her own refusal to remove temptation out of the way of his wife when she first began to fall into her fatal habit? He was not in reality thinking of her at all, but her conscience pricked her, though her pride kept her silent. It was such an unheard-of course for a person in her station, that none but fanatics could expect her to take it. Quixotic, irrational, eccentric, visionary, were words that flitted incoherently through her brain; but her tongue refused to utter them. Was Christ then so prudent, so cautious, so anxious to secure innocent indulgences and to grasp worldly advantages? Could she think of Him making life easy and comfortable to Himself while hundreds of thousands, nay, millions of unhappy souls were hurrying each year into misery and ruin?

There was not much conversation between her and her nephew; for as a parting draws very near, our memories refuse to serve us, and we forget to say the many, many things we may perhaps never again have any season for saying. They bade one another farewell tenderly and sorrowfully; and he went out, under the tranquil, starry sky, to wander once more beside the grave of his little child, and under the old gray walls of his church. He had not known till now how hard the trial would be.

Up to this time he had been kept incessantly occupied with the numberless arrangements necessary for so great a change; but these were all completed. He had said farewell to his people; but the aching of his own great personal grief and shame had prevented him from feeling that separation too forcibly. But the stir and excitement were over for the hour. Here there were no cold, curious eyes fastened upon him; no fear of any harsh voice putting into words of untimely lamentation the unacknowledged reason of his departure. The beloved familiar places, so quiet yet so full of associations to him, had full power over his spirit; and he could not resist them. The very ivy-leaves rustling against the tower, and the low, sleepy chirp of the little birds were dear to him.

What, then, was the church itself, every lineament of which he knew as well as if they were the features of a friend? It was a beautiful old church; but if it had been the homeliest and barest building ever erected, he must still have mourned over the pulpit, where he had taught his people; the pews, where their listening faces were lifted up to him; the little vestry, where he had spent so many peaceful hours. And the small mound, blooming with flowers, under which his child slept, how much power had that over him! He paced restlessly up and down beneath the solemn yew-trees, his heart breaking over them all.

To-morrow by this time he would have left them far behind him; and never more would his eyes behold them, or his feet tread the path he had so often trod. They seemed to cry to him like living, sentient things. To and fro he wandered, while the silent stars and the waning moon, lying low in the sky above the church, looked down upon him with a pale and mournful light. At last the morning came; and he remembered that to-day he must quit them all, and sail for a far-off country.

The vessel Mr. Chantrey had chosen for the long voyage was a merchant ship, sailing for Melbourne, under a captain who had been an early friend of his own, and who knew the reason for his leaving England. No other cabin passengers had taken berths on board her, though there were a few emigrants in the steerage. Captain Scott, himself a water-drinker, had arranged that no intoxicating beverages, in any form, should appear in the saloon. The steward was strictly forbidden to supply them to any person except Mr. Chantrey himself.

This enforced abstinence, the complete change of scene, and the fresh sea breezes, during the protracted voyage, he reckoned upon as the best means of restoring his wife to health of body and mind. Ann Holland, too, would watch over her as vigilantly and patiently as himself; and Charlie would be always at hand to amuse her with his boyish chatter. A bright hope was already dawning upon him.

A PRAYING MOTHER.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 16, 1 Sam 1, 2 : 1–3. Golden Text, 1 : 27. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Hannah's Home Trouble—Where She Carried it—The Assurance Given—Prayers for Children's Salvation—Mistakes about them—The Promise of the Blessing—Instances—Hindrances—Samuel Consecrated by Hannah — Her Anxiety Ceasing—Parental Disappointments.

WHERE do we not meet with anxious mothers? And how many praying mothers there are who are anxious mothers still! Hannah was the beloved wife of a man whose name, Elkanah, means "possessed of God." She herself knew the Lord, and although suffering very much from domestic trial, yet she knew to whom to go and practically cast her burden upon the Lord. So sore was the pressure of Peninnah's reproaches when she went up to the house of the Lord in Shiloh, that Hannah went into the temple or tabernacle of the Lord to unburden her heart.

There are some who have great trial in their own homes, but their only thought is to tell out their trouble to some human friend from whom they claim sympathy. It is just sympathy they seek and a strengthening in their own self-pity. They think they are very badly used, and they want somebody to strengthen them in the thought. Not so Hannah; she went to One who could and would not only sympathize with her, but lift her out of her trouble. She poured out her heart to the Lord, asking Him to give her a child, but only that she might give him to the Lord all the days of his life. Hannah did not seek the luxury of a child's love, nor yet the pride of a mother whose son would shine in the world, but she did long for one who should be a witness for God in the degenerate days in which she lived. Her heart's cry was too deep to be spoken out loud, and Eli, the high priest, who saw her, thought that she was drunken, and reproached her for it. Hannah's answer reassured him; he could see that her heart was burdened and that her face spoke out the truth of what she said. Then he answered and said, "Go in peace: and the God of Israel grant thee that thou hast asked of Him." Eli did not say, "May the God of Israel grant thee thy petition," as though there were any doubt about it, but, "The God of Israel grant thee thy petition." It was not a wish but a declaration, and Hannah took it as such and rested her heart upon it. She "went her way, and did eat, and her countenance was no more sad." It was to her as sure as though she had that moment held a son in her arms; God could not fail her, she had, through Eli, His promise to rest upon.

But how many of us who are mothers have gone to the Lord with hearts just as troubled as Hannah's, entreating Him to save our children's souls, or, if they are saved, to make them holy; and yet instead of going away in peace with countenances no more sad, we have anxiously watched our children to see if there was any indication that our prayer was heard, manifesting by that very eager watching, some doubt as to whether the prayer would be answered or not. We have treated our loving God as though the spiritual welfare of our children were nearer our hearts than His, and have been in a fever of anxiety to provide in the best way possible for the bringing about an answer to our prayers, and have done all we could to help God in the matter. Oh, how foolish we have been. If we were more equal than God to the bringing about of our children's salvation, why appeal to Him at all about it? If He is equal to the task, and has assured us that if we believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, we shall be saved and our children, why be in a fret of anxiety about it? Why not be quiet enough and confident enough in our heavenly Father's love for our children, to give Him credit for loving them better than we do, and accomplishing their salvation in His own divine way. And then by our quietness and confidence we shall be in a position to receive His directions how to act with regard to them.

Now, are we fully persuaded that God wills the salvation of our children? "To the Word and to the testimony!" Besides the passage already quoted (Acts 16 : 31), we have this precious promise: "As for Me, this is My covenant with them, saith the Lord; My Spirit that is upon thee, and My words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and forever" (Isa. 59 : 21). Again, we have strong evidence of the love of God to the children of His people. When Noah was told of God to prepare an ark at the time of the deluge, when destruction had been determined on the earth, God said to Noah, "Come into the ark; for thee have I seen righteous before Me in this generation" (Gen. 7 : 1). God promised the land of Canaan, not to Abraham only, but to his seed (Gen. 13 : 15). Moses declared "Those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children forever;" and he declared to the children of Israel, "I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing; therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live" (Deut. 29 : 29; 30 : 19). Again, in the New Testament, we see how the grace of God reached whole households. In the case of Zaccheus, salvation came, not to him alone, but to his "house" (Luke 19 : 9); the nobleman of Capernaum believed and "his whole house" (John 4 : 53); when Paul preached to the women by the riverside at Philippi, the household of Lydia was baptized, and so it was with the jailer's family in the same city (Acts 16 : 15, 31–34.) Our Father's heart is much larger than we imagine; He has an eye upon every child in our families.

What, then, is the reason, many say, that my children, for whom I have been so much in prayer, and whom I have watched over with such anxiety, yet show no signs of conversion? Possibly the hindrance is that either your consecration of them, or your faith in God regarding them is defective. Hannah, when she had weaned her son, brought him and gave him to the service of the Lord. Her one idea was that God should have His rights in her child; he was and was taught to regard himself as such. Hannah did not look forward to the time when she would blush with gratified pride because her son surpassed all the sons of her neighbors in scholarship. Hannah looked higher than this, and craved that he should be a vessel of God's grace, polished or unpolished. To Hannah, had she lived in our days, there would have been no attraction in the thought that her son might become a large landed proprietor, perhaps a member of Congress; Hannah looked above the politics of earth, and craved for her son to be more familiar with the King of kings, than with the petty rulers of this our earth, and so she did her part, gave up all right in her son, and looked upon him as the Lord's property. Now, whatever happened to him was God's affair, not her's; it was true consecration; all the care of him was left to God; she did not bear the burden, but believed that God was able; and thus she manifested her faith.

If we have given up our right to our children, and hold them as the Lord's, we shall never seek for them such pleasures, society, or earthly advantages as are calculated to lead them into the world. But if we have taken by faith the salvation and sanctification of our children from God we shall cease from anxiety, even if, in their wilfulness, they do go into the world, knowing that our faithful God will not fail those who really trust in Him, and that He will in some way or other make their very waywardness work together to bring them into a deeper conviction of sin and a more real knowledge of Himself than if they had always walked so as to give joy to our hearts. Very, very often we really hinder our children's conversion and growth in grace by our anxiety; they feel that they are watched, that a great deal is expected of them; some of them are tempted to unreal profession just to keep mother from being so anxious; some are driven to hate the things of God, because they feel that their natural inclinations for the world are thwarted, and they have gained nothing in the place of it. If we are in the confidence that He has undertaken them, listening to His voice in every direction He gives us about them, then all the strain and the anxiety ceases, and the children being more at ease can be more real. Then God can show us where to lead them and how to lead them to mother's God. Oh, in our life of failure as mothers, what a blessed thing it is to know that our God has a deeper love for them than we have, that His standard of holiness is much higher than our's, and, above all, that His Almightiness is already exercised on their behalf.

When Hannah presented her Samuel to the Lord, and sung her lovely song of praise, there was not the least trace of anxiety observable. She neither recognized herself as a great saint, because she had made such a gift to the Lord, nor yet other people as shortcomers because they were not equally devoted. Hannah said, "My heart rejoiceth in the Lord" (not in Samuel), "mine horn is exalted in the Lord; my mouth is enlarged over mine enemies; because I rejoice in Thy salvation." Hannah had her heart's full desire, and although Samuel was but a little child and did not yet know the Lord, still Hannah was rejoicing as much as though she saw him already the chosen messenger and prophet of the Lord. Now, dear readers, especially dear parents, are we filled with praise continually, not so much because we see or think we see marks of grace upon our children, but because of God's salvation, because God is on our side and on our children's side?

Many of us have been

because our plans have failed; we have tried our best to shield our children from contaminating influences, and yet have failed; we have sought to instil principles of the strictest integrity and the most transparent truthfulness, and yet we have seen our children manifesting a spirit of untruth, of evasion, of self-indulgence, of vanity or of unkindness, which wounds and mortifies us. Are we sure that there was nothing of self in our training? Were we not as much grieved that our son or our daughter could manifest such a spirit, as we were that God was dishonored? Let us be willing for any personal mortification, provided God has undertaken for our children; let us take our eyes off them and fix them upon Him, then we with Hannah shall sing: "The Lord killeth, and maketh alive: He bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up. The Lord maketh poor, and maketh rich: He bringeth low, and lifteth up."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Empire of Annam has Yielded to French coercion. The French journals publish a statement that Dr. Harmand, the representative of the Republic, has been received by the Emperor of Annam, who has accepted the terms of peace imposed. France demanded that Annam should pay the cost of the war and should hold all the forts on the Hue River until the money was paid; a "protectorate" of France over the empire is to be acknowledged, and the Annamite troops in Tonquin are to be placed at the disposal of the French commander. The terms are severe, and it is not surprising to learn that a revolution has broken out in Hue against the emperor who signed them. China is also reported as dissatisfied. She exercises suzerainty over Annam, and claims that the emperor exceeded his powers in concluding a treaty of peace with France. Military preparations are being pushed forward in China.

Ranavalona, Queen of Madagascar, is Dead. A cable message received last week states that she died on July 13th. Her decease occasions general mourning throughout the island, and intensifies the gloom now hanging over the country. At a time when a foreign enemy is on their shores, the Malagese bemoan with good reason the loss of their wise and enlightened monarch, under whose sway the country has made rapid advances in civilization. There is no queen whose death would be so sincerely lamented by her subjects. Her reign commenced in 1868, and during the fifteen years that it covers, the criminal law has been codified and trial by jury established; the term of military service was reduced to five years; native schools were established in every village, and every slave in the island emancipated. In September, 1870, the Queen, who had embraced Christianity, ordered the national idols to be destroyed, and her commands were executed amid popular rejoicing. Five idols were cast into the flames with the paraphernalia of worship, and the temples razed to the ground. Christian teachers, European and native, were then sent into every locality, and the cause of true religion has prospered there. Nothing is known here at present of the queen's successor, save that she is hostile to the French.

A Volcanic Eruption of Extraordinary Violence occurred on August 26th in the island of Krakatoa, one of the Dutch dependencies in the Strait of Sunda, lying midway between the extreme westerly point of the island of Java and the southeasterly part of the island of Sumatra. Terrific detonations were heard all day in the adjacent islands, and showers of stones and ashes, which caused total darkness, fell at intervals. The threatening rumblings gradually became more and more distinct, and by noon the Maha Meru, the largest of the volcanoes of Java, was belching forth flames at an alarming rate. This eruption soon spread to the Gunung, the crater of which is the largest in the world, being nearly four miles in diameter, the Gunung Guntur, and many other minor mountains, until more than a third of the forty-five craters of Java were either in active eruption, or seriously threatening it. An observer says in a description published in the New York Sun: "Just before dusk a great luminous cloud formed over the Gunung Guntur, and the crater of that volcano began to vomit up enormous streams of white acid, sulphurous mud, and smaller quantities of lava. There were rapidly succeeding explosions, followed by tremendous showers of cinders and enormous fragments, which were hurled high into the air and scattered in all directions, to fall after the force was spent upon the valleys below, setting the forests on fire and carrying death and destruction. With these terrible eruptions came sympathetic demonstrations from the sea. The overhanging clouds were so surcharged with electricity that at one time more than fifteen huge waterspouts were seen. These have continued at somewhat long intervals ever since. Men, women, and children rushed in terror from their tottering dwelling places, filling the air with their shrieks of horror. Hundreds were unable to get out before the houses fell, and were buried beneath the great masses of rocks and mud which were piled up, where a few hours before all had been peace, happiness, and fancied security." The eruptions continued until Wednesday, August 29th, by which time thirty thousand persons had been killed, and the islands were a scene of indescribable desolation.

Mr. Parnell in a Speech Delivered in Dublin on August 29th took a brighter view of Irish prospects than usual. His speech was marked by unwonted moderation. He referred to the success of the efforts of the Irish members of Parliament to promote the Laborers, Tramways and Navigation acts. He said he believed the day was near when the Irish would gain the full programme of measures for which the League had been formed. Mr. Parnell thanked the Irishmen of America and Australia for their support of the cause of progress in Ireland, which, he said, had been most encouraging. He said that the bulk of the English members of the House of Commons had conceded that home rule was necessary for Ireland. There are indications that a general parliamentary election is impending which may interfere with Mr. Gladstone's projects for Ireland, but if he continues in power, it is believed that next session a limited measure of home rule will be proposed by the government.

The Varna, an Arctic Exploration Steamer having on board the Dutch expedition, has been wrecked. The object of the expedition was to establish a meteorological station at Dickson Haven at the mouth of the Yenisei River in western Siberia. The Varna, a Norwegian vessel, was chartered by the expedition, and sailed on July 5th, 1882. She carried provisions for 700 days, a large collection of scientific instruments, furs, clothing, and houses in sections to be put together at the station. The expedition encountered ice on August 1st near the south coast of Nova Zembla. They were, however, able to penetrate for eighteen miles into the ice, but early in September the vessel was seen to be frozen in and drifting with the ice pack. Nothing more was heard of the expedition until last week, when the party was brought to Vardoe in Norway on the steamer Obi, which had rescued them from the Dijmphna, a Danish exploration vessel. The Varna foundered on July 4th last, and her crew took refuge on board the Dijmphna which was also frozen in, but whose crew were still hoping to find open water.

The Duke of Edinburgh's Expenses in Attending the coronation of his brother-in-law, the Czar of Russia, were set down at $10,000, and recently a spirited debate took place in Parliament over a proposition to refund him the amount from the national treasury. Mr. Labouchere, the leader of the Radicals, made a vigorous attack on the measure, calling attention to the fact that $20,000 had already been paid for the English Ambassador's expenses on the same occasion, and saying that "his Royal Highness ought to defray his own expenses when he wanted to visit his relations." In the debate that followed it was evident that the Radicals did not so much object to this particular sum of $20,000 as to the principle on which grants are being asked for the royal family. It is expected that Parliament will soon be requested to provide for the sons of the Prince of Wales, and efforts are being already made to organize an opposition to the demand.

Renewed Outbreaks against the Jews are reported from Russia and Hungary. The European correspondent of the Sun cables to that journal that the Russian Government forbids Jews from carrying on the business of distilling and retailing liquors. As this most lucrative business in southern Russia is almost wholly in the hands of the Jews, who have always monopolized the trade in vodka, the force of the blow will be readily appreciated. Violent riots against the Jews occurred at Egerszeg, Hungary, on August 24th, and continued three days and nights. Two thousand peasants took part in the outbreak. They wrecked all the houses and shops of Jews in the place, and shouted "Murder all Jews!" Troops were called out, but were unable to suppress the violence of the mob until they were reinforced. The peasants were armed with muskets, and stoutly resisted the troops. It is reported that twenty soldiers and many rioters were killed. Riots against the Jews have also occurred at Churgo, Keszthely and Kanisa Nagy (Great Kanisa). The most fearful outrages are committed, and a constant stream of fugitives is flowing into the cities, abandoning homes and property to the marauders, who carry away everything portable and burn or destroy the rest.

The Last Moments of Dr. Moffat, Whose portrait and biography appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 23d, are described in the English journals just received. His departure was exceedingly bright and peaceful. Only twenty-four hours before his death he was in his garden, trimming shrubs, and admiring the beauties of nature—manifestations of the Divine beneficence in which he always rejoiced. Nine hours before his death he sent for his friend, Mr. Maxted, and at once began repeating favorite hymns and texts of Scripture. He asked for texts to show that Christians would know each other in heaven. He referred to his beloved departed wife, and spoke of her last happy moments with tears of joy. She had lived with him for fifty years, and was a most devoted helper with him in the Lord's service. Her prayerfulness and wisdom and ability to counsel him were conspicuous traits in her character. At the interment of the veteran missionary in Norwood Cemetery on Thursday, August 16th, there were present representatives of the various Church and Nonconformist Missionary Societies, besides a vast assemblage of friends from all parts of London and distant parts of the country.

Mr. Francis Murphy, the Temperance Orator, whose work in Great Britain has been eminently successful, is about to return to this country for rest. He will be welcomed on his arrival at a monster meeting in Cooper Union, New York, over which Judge Noah Davis has promised to preside. Mr. Murphy has paid a farewell visit to Norwich and other places in England where he has labored. At Norwich, on August 13th, the meeting was held in St. Andrew's Hall, which was well filled by an enthusiastic audience. The orchestra was surmounted with the Blue Ribbon banner, on which were inscribed in gilt letters the famous motto, "With malice toward none, and charity to all." There were on the platform a large number of ministers and other gentlemen identified with the Blue Ribbon Temperance Movement. Mr. Murphy and his son received quite an ovation, and made earnest speeches, which were applauded again and again. At the close of the meeting a large number of new pledges were taken.

Volume V. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now ready, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1882 with complete index. Price $3 including postage. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

IN the great day of final separation, when the Judge of all the earth will discriminate between the blessed and the cursed, a standard of merit will be adopted which the judges and historians of the world have ignored. Christ who on that day will sit on the throne of His glory, having before Him all nations, informs us what that standard will be. Among those who on that day will be honored, are they to whom the Judge will say, "I was in prison and ye came unto me" (Matt. 25 : 36). The pioneer in that self denying work in modern times is the man whose portrait adorns the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week.

The birth-place and early life of John Howard are involved in some obscurity. He was probably born at Clapton, near London, in the year 1726, but some think at Cardington, near Bedford, where his father possessed a small farm. His father was an upholsterer, at Smithfield, and had a small country-house at Enfield, whither, after he had made his fortune, he retired. John Howard's mother died while he was still an infant, and he was placed out to nurse with the wife of a Cardington farmer.

Young Howard was early removed from school, and bound as an apprentice to a firm of wholesale grocers in Watling Street, London. It would seem, however, that the business was not congenial to the boy, inasmuch as almost immediately upon his father's death, in September, 1742, he procured the surrender of his indentures. His apprenticeship obligations were cancelled upon the payment of a sum of money; but the youth, freed from the yoke of servitude, was by no means disposed to riot in his new liberty, but with a steadiness and care such as belong to the ripest years of human life, he attended to the preservation, improvement, and proper use of the patrimony he inherited.

EARLY PHILANTHROPY.

The family house at Clapton was falling into ruin, and he undertook to superintend its restoration. The young man did not live in the house, but took a kindly interest in his father's old retainers, who still worked there. Bread in those days was dear, and Howard was in the habit of watching by a buttress of the garden-wall, at the hour when the baker was passing with his cart, when he would buy a loaf and fling it over the wall. The gardener, if Howard met him, would be accosted with: "Harry, see if there is not something there among the cabbages." (The panel of our frontispiece picture on the left-hand side of the portrait illustrates the above incident.)

Howard at this time was in delicate health, and had frequent need of the attention of an experienced nurse; he therefore removed from the house at which he had at first boarded to that of Mrs. Sarah Lowne, a widow, who devoted her time to the care and comfort of the young invalid.

A STRANGE MARRIAGE.

Though he was only twenty-five, and the widow was fifty-two, Howard made her an offer of marriage which was at first declined and was only accepted at last on his urgent solicitation. He always avowed that he had been happy in his choice, though his domestic enjoyment was of a different character from that which he afterward enjoyed during the ten years of wedded companionship with his second wife—his beloved Henrietta. The first Mrs. Howard died in 1755, between two and three years after her marriage, and her tomb is in St. Mary's, Whitechapel. We have no means of ascertaining the house where Howard lived at Stoke Newington, but we know where he worshipped. It was in the old Congregational Chapel there, in which was a small pulpit, surmounted with a huge sounding-board, and the tall-backed pews and heavy galleries so common in the last century. The pastor was the Rev. Micaiah Townsend.

IMPRISONED IN FRANCE.

At the time of his wife's death, the news arrived in England of the sudden destruction of Lisbon by an earthquake and by fire. Sixty thousand of the poor had perished. No plan of assisting the sufferers occurred to Howard, but he felt that in the midst of so much misery, where the destitute were dying in their tents from hunger, cold, and sickness, strong hands and willing minds would soon find their duty; the great point was to go, to see the work for himself. Attended, therefore, by a single servant, he took his berth on board the Lisbon packet, the Hanover. All Europe was entering on war. England and France were already fighting on the high seas and in every part of the world, and the seas were swept by innumerable privateers—and one of them captured the Hanover. The crew and passengers were carried into the town of Brest and treated with the utmost barbarity.

HORRIBLE TREATMENT OF PRISONERS.

Before reaching that port, Howard was kept without food and water for forty hours. When the prisoners were at length landed, he was confined with many others in the castle of the town in a dark, damp, and filthy dungeon, where, after several hours, a leg of mutton was brought and thrown at them—like flesh to wild beasts—which the starving captives tore to pieces with their hands and teeth, devouring it with almost ferocious voracity (see representation in the right-hand section of the upper portion of frontispiece). In this dungeon, thus fed, the prisoners were detained for a week, compelled to sleep on the cold earthen floor; they were then removed and separated, Howard being sent to Carpaix, and his servant to Dinan. During his imprisonment he learned that bad as his condition was; many prisoners captured by these licensed pirates had fared worse. Some had been treated with barbarity so inhuman that they had died. He afterward learned that many hundreds had perished, and that thirty-six were buried in a hole at Dinan in one day. It was at this period he saw and felt the need of prison reform, and his experience determined the course of his future life; and when an exchange of prisoners was effected, and Howard obtained his release, he at once entered on his career of usefulness.

PLAN FOR VISITING THE FRENCH PRISONS.

In the year 1775, Mr. Howard left England for a tour of inspection among the prisons of Germany, Holland, and France. Paris was his first halting-place. Here the prisons were rigorously closed against the traveller's researches. He fortunately discovered that there was an old law which directed the keepers of prisons in Paris to admit all persons who were desirous of bestowing alms on the prisoners. He availed himself of the arrangement, and was thus able to speak with and examine almost every inmate of the great prisons of Paris. The dungeons he visited were dark, damp, and noisome beyond description. Many prisoners lost their lives by disease, many more lost the use of their limbs; while all suffered from cold and hunger. In the severe winter of 1775, hundreds of persons perished within the walls of the Bicetre from cold.

THE BASTILLE.

Into the famous fortress-prison of the Bastille, Howard found it impossible to penetrate. Neither the influence of the English Ambassador nor of his Parisian friends availed to open its gates. It was dangerous even to speak of this fortress, and he who once entered its gloomy portal very rarely quitted it alive. Being resolved not to leave Paris without some glimpse of this dark world, Howard one day presented himself at the outer gate, rang the bell, and, on its being opened by the officer in charge, boldly stepped in, passed the sentry, walked coolly through a file of guards, and advanced as far as the great drawbridge of the inner court. While he was contemplating the dismal structure an officer ran toward him, agitated and surprised at the apparition of a stranger in the place; Howard, perceiving that his manner was threatening and suspicious, thought it prudent to retreat, re-passing the guard, who were mute with astonishment at this strange exhibition of temerity. (The episode is illustrated in the left-hand section of the lower portion of our front picture.)

THE PLAGUE IN SMYRNA.

In 1786 the plague was raging in Smyrna, and Howard decided to go there. He had two objects in view in thus exposing his life to peril. He wanted to succor and relieve the afflicted, and he desired to see for himself the treatment of the sick in an Italian lazaretto. Having performed the first part of his mission he set out on his homeward journey, in a vessel with a foul bill of health, that he might be put into strictest quarantine at Venice.

ATTACKED BY A PIRATE.

The voyage was long and attended by many perils. Near the coast of the Morea a Barbary privateer bore down on the vessel and attacked her. It was a question of victory or slavery. The Venetians, therefore, fought with the courage of despair, but their numbers were few and their arms indifferent. Howard, though witnessing actual fighting for the first time, fought on deck with the courage of an old warrior. His coolness and presence of mind saved the crew. He assumed the direction of the only large gun on board, and when the stock of ball failed he rammed the gun almost to the muzzle with nails, spikes, etc., and, waiting his opportunity, sent the contents in among the pirate crew with such signal effect that in a few moments they hoisted sail and made off. (This scene is illustrated in the panel at the right-hand side of the lower section of the frontispiece.)

A LONDON PRISON IN 1787.

To detail every step in the humane career of this devoted servant of Christ would be impossible in the space at command, but a few incidents selected from the record of his labors in the metropolis of his own country will furnish an idea of the general character of his work there and on the continent of Europe.

The general description of the London prisons written by Howard gives a fearful idea of the neglect of discipline which prevailed when he began his inspection searches. The statistics which Howard supplies relative to the prison world of London make up a terrible picture of the miseries experienced by the captives.

was rebuilt between 1778 and 1780. As then erected, and as it still remains, it presents a great improvement upon its predecessors; but, as Howard observed, it is far from being a model, and at the commencement of the present century the gaol fever broke out there, which he predicted would be the result of its defective sanitary arrangements. One shudders on entering the condemned cells which Howard opens for our inspection. There are upon each of the three floors five, all vaulted. The strong stone-wall is lined all round with planks studded with broad-headed nails; and such is the aspect of these darksome, solitary abodes that criminals, before unmoved, have been struck with horror, and have shed tears on entering them. When Howard lived, fifteen condemned cells seemed not more than to suffice for the demand which was created by the Draconic severity of the judicial code. In twelve years 467 executions took place in London, including two by burning, the two culprits being women, one condemned for murder, the other for coining.

A PRISON INTERIOR.

The prison, when Howard visited it, was a veritable Pandemonium. No attempt had been made to classify the prisoners or to preserve order in the cells. The unhappy creatures were driven into one of the fifteen cells at the caprice of the gaoler and were left there to get on as they might. Every cell was a school of vice. The herd of prisoners in each had full liberty to do as they chose. The hoary-headed criminal, whose life had been passed in vice, was there, and at his side the youth who was then, for the first time in prison, and who might if he desired learn new lessons in the art of law-breaking. The grossest cruelty and oppression was practised by the stronger on the weaker prisoners. Every newcomer was made to contribute to a fund known in prisoners' patter as "garnish," which was expended in riotious orgies. Woe to the uninitiated prisoner who came in empty handed. His clothes were seized and impounded, and he was beaten and maltreated.

Another famous prison was New Ludgate, a prison for debtors, in which was a room about thirty-five feet by eighteen, with twenty-three beds ranged round the walls, on three tiers of shelves. At one of his recent visits, he informs us, there were in this room thirty-nine debtors, seven of them with their wives and children. The room was swarming with vermin. There was a chapel in the court, and under it a tap-room.

THE BRIDEWELL

We pass on next to Bridewell, where there was no court, and fresh air could be obtained only by means of a hand-ventilator, with a tube to each room of the women's ward. It enjoyed a privilege peculiar to itself, that of having an allowance of rye straw once a month. "No other prison in London," says Howard, "has any straw or bedding."

At Whitechapel prison a curious custom prevailed which is worthy of record as an indication of the state of prison discipline in England in the eighteenth century. The debtors had the privilege of hanging out a begging-box from a little closet in the front of the house, and clearing it of the gifts of passers-by each in turn. It brought in only a few pence daily, of which pittance none partook but those who on entrance paid the keeper a fee, and treated the prisoners with half-a-gallon of beer.

A REMARKABLE INCIDENT

will ever associate with the history of the prison called "the Savoy" the remembrance of Howard's amazing personal courage and influence over prisoners. During an alarming riot there, the men confined had killed two of their keepers, and no person dared to approach them, until the intrepid philanthropist undertook to do so. Gaolers and friends endeavored to dissuade him; but in he went among the desperate ruffians, whose savage spirits he so completely subdued by his persuasions, that they allowed themselves to be quietly conducted back to their cells.

The King's Bench prison at Southwark Howard visited and found full to overflowing. It was so crowded in the summer of 1776 that a prisoner paid five shillings ($1.25) a week for half a bed, and many lay in the chapel. The debtors with their families, two-thirds of whom were within the prison walls, formed a population of 1004.

THE MARSHALSEA.

But, perhaps, of all the London prisons, the Marshalsea was the worst, where debtors and pirates were huddled together in dark, narrow rooms, four men in each, sleeping in two beds. The tap-room was let to a prisoner, and there the inmates of the place, at times, slept on the floor; and to show the habits of drinking which prevailed, it is sufficient to repeat a statement by Howard, that one Sunday six hundred pots of beer were brought in from a neighboring tavern, because the prisoners did not like the beverage supplied by the tapster within the walls.

Such were the London prisons as Howard found them. Not one Christian man in a thousand in London had any idea that such a condition of things existed in the city. But John Howard made his discoveries public, and the death knell of the vile system was rung. His was no second-hand statement "on authority." He knew whereof he spoke, and he was able to tell his fellow-Christians of the things he had seen, and that disclosure was sufficient to insure the overthrow of the evil.

ILLNESS AND DEATH.

John Howard had been in many a plague-stricken spot, and had come away uninjured. The information that fever and contagious and loathsome diseases were raging in a prison never kept him away; they rather attracted him by the consciousness of opportunity for Christian labor. But his life of service was drawing to its close. He was sixty-four years of age when, in 1790, he undertook a tour of prison and hospital inspection in Russia. During that tour he heard that at Cherson a prison and a hospital had with singular carelessness been recently built on a morass. He desired to satisfy himself by personal inspection of the fact before reporting it, and went to Cherson. There he found the fever raging, and he labored night and day in hospital, prison, and the houses of the city for the relief of the sick and dying.

In the midst of his work an urgent request was brought him to visit a dying girl in a village twenty-four miles off. He was weary and faint from protracted exertion; it was raining heavily and the cold was intense. But the self-denying philanthropist had no thought for himself, and set out immediately. In his exhausted condition of body, wet and nerveless, he entered the sick room of the sufferer and talked to her of Jesus. He soothed her last moments, and then returned to Cherson. But his work was done. From the room of the dying girl he went out a dying man. The fever he contracted there did its work quickly, and in a few days the Christian philanthropist lay dead. Though far from home he was no stranger. His work and labor of love were well known. At his funeral there were princes, statesmen and eminent generals, who had come to honor the devoted Christian worker; but the best testimony to the grandeur of his character was the crowd of ragged, pallid, weeping poor, the friendless who grieved over their dead friend. In St. Paul's Cathedral, London, his fellow-citizens erected a statue of him in which he is appropriately represented standing with the key of prison-doors in his hand and broken manacles under his feet. It was an honor that was due to him, but it was not needed to perpetuate his memory; that will never die.

THE FOUR DAVYS.

By Rev. Charles Courtenay.

BILLY DAVY.

"HALLO, old codger!"

A very familiar greeting this, without a doubt, and, moreover, slightly coarse. Not a greeting that any of my readers would be over-delighted to receive, especially in public.

Neither did the thumping slap on the back, which accompanied it, add to its delicacy, especially as the friendly hand was not at all clean. Being a chimney-sweep's, it could, perhaps, hardly be expected to be.

Now if it had been a brother sweep, or a dustman, or a coalheaver just off duty, who was so cheerily hailed and thumped, who could have wondered? Would it not have been a very natural action? But then, you see, it wasn't such a man at all. And it is just this which makes the performance worthy of notice. Let me take your minds back a little, and show you a picture or two.

The first is a little boy in a very comfortable home. He is neatly dressed, and spotlessly clean, and looks well-cared for, and you can see at a single glance of the eye that he is the child of good parents. Had we time, I might lead your minds to a thousand like scenes, all pointing to the same fact. Was there ever a day when he did not kneel at his mother's knee to say his simple prayers?

We pass over a few years. The lad has become a young man. He has left his father's roof to earn his own living. With such a training is it any wonder that he should manage it well? Indeed, so well did he go to work that there were not wanting more wise heads than one to predict a bright career for the young man.

"He'll get on, sure enough. No fear. He's got the making of a prosperous man about him." And they were not given to prophecy either.

Let us now leap over a few more years, say ten or fifteen.

With such a start, my readers will expect something very striking in his rate of progress. They will expect to see a jolly round face, all of a twinkle with good-humor, and a good round form, such as rightfully belongs to the well-fed, easy-going, well-to-do man of business. They will not be surprised if there starts up before the mind's eye a high-stepping steed, and an exceedingly natty little dog-cart, full of little living likenesses of the owner himself, and all screaming with delight, as off they go.

Nothing of the kind. No greater mistake in the world.

I wish I could have obliged my readers with such a picture,

They must rather imagine a very disreputable, greasy-looking fellow, with a very hard and gloomy face, and an aspect which may be generally described as abject and woe-begone in the extreme.

They must conjure up in their minds one who has lost, not only all the respect of his fellow-townsmen, but also his own.

"Hallo, old codger!"

Listen to this, and remember the familiar thump of the very sooty hand, and I think you will gather at least a little of the truth.

Follow him up the street, and you cannot fail to observe other speaking signs of the same character.

One jocular fellow, for instance, knocked his hat off into the gutter.

Another playfully poked him in the ribs.

A waterman, whose spirits were somewhat light at the time, watered his toes.

More than one winked as they passed, throwing, I am bound to say, a great deal of expression into that familiar action.

Even the small boys claimed a sort of acquaintance with him, and displayed not a little humor at his expense.

Some were especially strong in the dramatic line, getting up, on the spur of the moment, scenes of great vividness.

One naughty little boy, with his hat on one side, and his hands in his pocket, reeled across his path in an evidently drunken fashion.

A second, placing his hands in the form of a cup, seemed to be greatly absorbed in the act of drinking therefrom, or "having a good pull," as he was pleased to express himself.

A third was sportive enough to throw himself into an exceeding irregular and sprawling posture on the pavement, and there to feign a drunken sleep, the snores being especially pronounced.

A fourth, for there seemed no end to their playfulness and ingenuity, struck an attitude, evidently intended to represent intense thirst, at the same time calling out in a tone of great urgency and agony, for "a glass of summat strong, quick."

But perhaps the sign and token which would be most firmly impressed on the mind of the beholder, and that because of its frequency, was that our friend was usually addressed, not by his surname, but by his Christian name. Everybody called him "Billy," or "Bill." He might have been without a surname, for the use that was made of it.

Is there any more information needed about him? Is it not clear that the well-brought-up lad, the young man of fair promise, had, somehow, been drawn into the whirlpool of strong drink, and had lost therein his bright prospects, his money, his business, and, worst of all, his good name?

Alas! to what a depth can strong drink drag its victims.

(To be concluded.)

THE TIMES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, September 9, 1883.

"I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth."—Joel 2 : 30.

An Eventful Epoch—A Period of Disaster—An Epileptic Earth—Disasters Volcanic—A Series of Earthquakes—Disasters Cyclonic—A Cyclone at Sea—Disasters Oceanic—The Roll of the Lost—Disasters Epidemic—An Era of Blessing—Of Longevity—Rapid Travel—Blessing of Quick Information—Of Gospel Proclamation—A Falsehood on its Travels—Wonders of Self-Sacrifice—The Track and the Engineer—Relics of Peter the Great—The Incoming Fleet.

Dr. Cummings—great and good man—would have told us the exact time of the fulfilment of this prophecy. As I stepped into his study in London on my arrival from Paris just after the French had surrendered at Sedan, the good Doctor said to me: "It is just as I told you about France; people laughed at me because I talked about the seven horns and the vials, but I foresaw all this from the Book of Daniel and the Book of Revelation." Not taking any such responsibility in the interpretation of this passage, I simply assert that there are in it suggestions of many things in our time.

Our eyes dilate and our heart quickens its pulsation as we read of events in the third century, the sixth century, the eighth century, the fourteenth century; but there are more far-reaching events crowded into the nineteenth century than into any other, and the last quarter bids fair to eclipse the preceding three quarters. We read in the daily newspapers of events announced in one paragraph and without any especial emphasis—of events which a Herodotus, a Josephus, a Xenophon, a Gibbon would have taken whole chapters or whole volumes to elaborate. Looking out upon our time, we must cry out in the words of the text: "Wonders in the heaven and in the earth."

A PERIOD OF DISASTER.

I propose to show you that the time in which we live is wonderful for disaster and wonderful for blessing, for there must be lights and shades in this picture as in all others. Need I argue this day that our time is wonderful for disaster? Our world has had a rough time since by the hand of God it was bowled out into space. It is an epileptic earth. Convulsion after convulsion. Frosts pounding it with sledge hammer of iceberg, and fires melting it with furnaces seven hundred times heated. It is a wonder to me it has lasted so long. Meteors shooting by on this side and grazing it, and meteors shooting by on the other side and grazing it, none of them slowing up for safety. Whole fleets and navies and argosies and flotillos of worlds sweeping all about us. Our earth like a fishing smack off the banks of Newfoundland, while the Gallia and the Bothnia and the Arizona and the Great Eastern rush by. Beside that our world has by sin been damaged in its internal machinery, and ever and anon the furnaces have burst, and the walking beams of the mountains have broken, and the islands have shipped a sea, and the great hulk of the world has been jarred with accidents that ever and anon threatened immediate demolition. But it seems to me as if our century were specially characterized by disasters volcanic, cyclonic, oceanic, epidemic. I say volcanic because an earthquake is only a volcano hushed up. When Stromboli and Cotopaxi and Vesuvius stop breathing, let the foundations of the earth beware. Seven thousand earthquakes in two centuries recorded in the catalogue of the British Association. Trajan, the emperor, goes to ancient Antioch, and amid the splendors of his reception is met by an earthquake that nearly destroys the emperor's life. Lisbon, fair and beautiful, at one o'clock on the first of November, 1755, in six minutes 60,000 have perished, and Voltaire writes of them: "For that region it was the last judgment, nothing wanting but a trumpet!" Europe and America feeling the throb; fifteen hundred chimneys in Boston partly or fully destroyed.

But the disasters of other centuries have had their counterpart in our own. In 1812, Caraccas was caught in the grip of the earthquake; in 1822, in Chili, 100,000 square miles of land by volcanic force upheaved to four and seven feet of permanent elevation; in 1854 Japan felt the geological agony; Naples shaken in 1857; Mexico in 1858; Medosa, the capital of the Argentine Republic, in 1861; Manilla terrorized in 1863: the Hawaiian Islands by such force uplifted and let down in 1871; Nevada shaken in 1871; Antioch in 1872; California in 1872; San Salvador in 1873; while this summer, of 1883, what subterranean excitements! Ischia, an island of the Mediterranean, a beautiful Italian watering place, vineyard clad, surrounded by all natural charm and historical reminiscence; yonder, Capri, the summer resort of the Roman Emperors; yonder, Naples, the Paradise of art—this beautiful island suddenly toppled into the trough of the earth, 8000 merry-makers perishing, and some of them so far down beneath the reach of human obsequies that it may be said of many a one of them as it was said of Moses, "The Lord buried him." Italy weeping, all Europe weeping, all Christendom weeping where there are hearts to sympathize and Christians to pray. But while the nations were measuring that magnitude of disaster, measuring it not with golden rod like that with which the angel measured heaven, but with the black rule of death, Java, of the Indian Archipelago, the most fertile island of all the earth, is caught in the grip of the earthquake, and mountain after mountain goes down, and city after city, until that island, which produces the healthiest beverage of all the world, has produced the ghastliest accident of the century. One hundred thousand people dying, dying, dead, dead.

DISASTERS CYCLONIC.

But look at the cyclonic, the disasters cyclonic. At the mouth of the Ganges are three islands—the Hattiah, the Sundeep and the Dakin Shabazpore. In the midnight of October, 1877, on all those three islands the cry was: "The waters, the waters!" A cyclone arose and rolled the sea over those three islands, and of a population of 340,000, 215,000 were drowned. Only those saved who had climbed to the top of the highest trees. Did you ever see a cyclone? No. Then I pray God you may never see one. I saw one on the ocean, and it swept us eight hundred miles back from our course, and for thirty-six hours during the cyclone and after it we expected every moment to go to the bottom. They told us before we retired at nine o'clock that the barometer had fallen, but at eleven o'clock at night we were awakened with the shock of the waves. All the lights out. Crash! went all the lifeboats. Waters rushing through the skylights down into the cabin and down on the furnaces until they hissed and smoked in the deluge. Seven hundred people praying, blaspheming, shrieking. Our great ship poised a moment on the top of a mountain of phosphorescent fire, and then plunged down, down, down, until it seemed as if she never would again be righted. Ah! you never want to see a cyclone at sea. But a few weeks ago, I was in Minnesota, where there was one of those cyclones on land that swept the city of Rochester from its foundations and took dwelling houses, barns, men, women, children, horses, cattle, and tossed them into indiscriminate ruin, and lifted a railtrain and dashed it down, a mightier hand than that of the engineer on the air-brake. Cyclone in Kansas, within a few months; cyclone in Missouri, cyclone in Wisconsin, cyclone in Illinois, cyclone in Iowa. Satan, prince of the power of the air, never made such cyclonic disturbance as he has in one day. And am I not right in saying that one of the characteristics of the time in which we live is disaster cyclonic?

DISASTERS OCEANIC.

But look at the disasters oceanic. Shall I call the roll of the dead shipping? Ye monsters of the deep answer when I call your names. Ville de Havre! The Schiller! City of Boston! The Melville! The President! The Cimbria! But why should I go on calling the roll when none of them answer, and the roll is as long as the white scroll of the Atlantic surf at Cape Hatteras breakers. If the oceanic cables could report all the scattered life and all the bleached bones that they rub against in the depths of the ocean, what a message of pathos and tragedy for both beaches! Week before last, eighty fishermen perished off the coast of Newfoundland, and whole fleets of them off the coast of England. God help the poor fellows at sea, and give high seats in heaven to the Grace Darlings and the Ida Lewises and the life-boatmen hovering around Goodwin's Sands and the Skerries.

The sea, now owning three-fourths of the earth, proposes to capture the other fourth, and is bombarding the land all around the earth. The moving of our hotels at Brighton Beach backward 100 yards from where they once stood, a type of what is going on all around the world and on every coast. The Dead Sea rolls to-day where ancient cities stood. Pillars of temples that stood on hills geologists find now three-quarters under the water, or altogether submerged. The sea having wrecked so many merchantmen and flotillas wants to wreck the continents, and hence disasters oceanic.

DISASTERS EPIDEMIC.

Look at the disasters epidemic. I speak not of the plague in the fourth century that ravaged Europe; and in Moscow and the Neapolitan dominions and Marseilles wrought such terror in the eighteenth century; but I look at the yellow fevers, and the choleras, and the diphtherias, and the scarlet fevers, and the typhoids of our own time. Hear the wailing of Memphis. and Shreveport, and New Orleans, and Savannah of the last two decades. From Hurdwar, India, where every twelfth year three million devotees congregate, the caravans brought the cholera, and that one disease slew 18,000 in eighteen days in Bossorah. Twelve thousand this summer slain by it in India, and twenty-five thousand in Egypt. Disasters epidemic. Some of the finest monuments in Greenwood, and Laurel Hill, and Mount Auburn are to doctors who lost their life battling with Southern epidemic.

AN ERA OF BLESSING.

But now I turn the leaf in my subject and I plant the white lilies and the palm-tree amid the nightshade and the myrtle. This age no more characterized by wonders of disaster than by wonders of blessing. Blessing of longevity. The average of human life rapidly increasing. Forty years now worth four hundred years once. Week before last I came from Manitoba to New York in three days and three nights. In other times it would have taken three months. In other words, three days and three nights now are worth three months of other days. The average of human life practically greater now than when Noah lived his 950 years, and Methusaleh lived his 969 years. Blessing of intelligence. The Salmon P. Chases and the Abraham Lincolns and the Henry Wilsons of the coming time will not be required to learn to read by pine-knot lights, or seated on shoemaker's bench, nor will the Fergusons have to study astronomy while watching the cattle. Knowledge rolls its tides along every poor man's door, and his children may go down and bathe in them. If the philosophers of the last century were called up to recite in a class with our boys at the Polytechnic, or our girls at the Packer, those old philosophers would be sent down to the foot of the class because they failed to answer the questions! Free libraries in all the important towns and cities of the land except one place called Brooklyn! Historical alcoves and poetic shelves and magazine tables for all that desire to walk through them or sit down at them.

QUICK INFORMATION.

Blessings of quick information; newspapers falling all around us thick as leaves in a September equinoctial. News three days old rancid and stale. We see the whole world twice a day—through the newspaper at the breakfast-table, and through the newspaper at the tea-table, with an "extra" here and there between.

Blessing of Gospel proclamation. Do you not know that nearly all the missionary societies have been born in this century? and nearly all the Bible societies, and nearly all the great philanthropic movements? A secretary of one of the denominations said to me the other day in Dakota: "You were wrong when you said our denomination averaged a new church every day of the year; they established nine in one week, so you are far within the truth." A clergyman of our own denomination said: "I have just been out establishing five mission stations." I tell you, Christianity is on the march, while Infidelity is dwindling into the imbecility that was demonstrated a few days ago at Rochester, N.Y., where after the blowing of the trumpets and the gathering of all the clans there assembled a small group of semi-idiots to denounce the Christian religion and eulogize one of their dead patrons, a libertine, arrested in New York and Boston again and again for scattering obscene literature—that dead man the patron saint of the whole movement. While Infidelity is thus dwindling and dropping down into imbecility and indecency, the wheel of Christianity is making about a thousand revolutions in a minute. All the copies of Shakespeare and Tennyson and Disraeli and of any ten of the most popular writers of the day, less in number than the copies of the Bible going out from our printing-presses. Two years ago, in six weeks, more than two million copies of the New Testament purchased, not given away, but purchased, because the world will have it.

More Christian men in high official position to-day in Great Britain and in the United States than ever before. Stop that falsehood going through the newspapers—I have seen it in twenty—that the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States are all infidels except Judge Strong. By personal acquaintance I know three of them to be old-fashioned evangelical Christians, sitting at the holy sacrament of our Lord Jesus Christ, and I suppose that the majority of them are stanch believers in our Christian religion. And then hear the dying words of Judge Black last month, a man who had been Attorney-General of the United States, and who had been Secretary of the United States, no stronger lawyer of the century than Judge Black—dying, his aged wife kneeling by his side, and he uttering that sublime and tender prayer: "O Lord God, from whom I derived my existence and in whom I have always trusted, take my spirit to Thyself and let Thy richest blessing come down upon my Mary." The most popular book to-day is the Bible, and the mightiest institution is the Church, and the greatest name among the nations, and more honored than any other, is the name of Jesus.

Wonders of self-sacrifice: A clergyman told me in the northwest a few weeks ago that for six years he was a missionary at the extreme north, living 400 miles from a post-office, and sometimes he slept out of doors in winter, the thermometer sixty and sixty-five degrees below zero, wrapped in rabbit skins woven together. I said: "Is it possible? you do not mean sixty and sixty-five degrees below zero?" He said: "I do, and I was happy." All for Christ. Where is there any other being that will rally such enthusiasm? Mothers sewing their fingers off to educate their boys for the Gospel ministry. For nine years no luxury on the table until the course through grammar school and college and theological seminary be completed. Poor widow putting her mite into the Lord's treasury, the face of emperor or President impressed upon the coin not so conspicuous as the blood with which she earned it. Millions of good men and women, but more women than men, to whom Christ is everything. Christ first and Christ last, and Christ forever.

Why, this age is not so characterized by invention and scientific exploration as it is by Gospel proclamation. You can get no idea of it unless you can ring all the church bells in one chime, and sound all the organs in one diapason, and gather all the congregations of Christendom in one Gloria in Excelsis. Mighty camp-meetings. Mighty Ocean Groves. Mighty Chautauquas. Mighty conventions of Christian workers. Mighty General Assemblies of the Presbyterian Church. Mighty Conferences of the Methodist Church. Mighty associations of the Baptist Church. Mighty conventions of the Episcopal Church. I think before long the best investments will not be in railroad stock or Western Union, but in trumpets and cymbals and festal decorations, for we are on the eve of victories wide and world uplifting. There may be many years of hard work yet before the consummation, but the signs are to me so encouraging that I would not be unbelieving if I saw the wing of the apocalyptic angel spread for its last triumphal flight in this day's sunset; or if to-morrow morning the ocean cables should thrill us with the news that Christ the Lord had alighted on Mount Olivet or Mount Calvary to proclaim universal dominion.

O you dead churches, wake up. Throw back the shutters of stiff ecclesiasticism and let the light of the spring morning come in. Morning for the land. Morning for the sea. Morning of emancipation. Morning of light and love and peace. Morning of a day in which there shall be no chains to break, no sorrows to assuage, no despotism to shatter, no woes to compassionate. O Christ, descend! Scarred temple, take the crown! Bruised hand, take the sceptre! Wounded foot, step the throne! "Thine is the kingdom."

These things I say, because I want you to be alert. I want you to be watching all these wonders unrolling from the heavens and the earth. God has classified them, whether calamitous or blessing. The divine purposes are harnessed in traces that cannot break, and in girths that cannot slip, and in buckles that cannot loosen, and are driven by reins they must answer. I preach no fatalism. A swarthy engineer at one of the depots in Dakota, said: "When will you get on the locomotive and take a ride with us?" "Well," I said, "now, if that suits you." So I got on one side the locomotive and a Methodist minister, who was also invited, got on the other side, and between us were the engineer and the stoker. The train started. The engineer had his hand on the agitated pulse of the great engine. The stoker shoveled in the coal and shut the door with a loud clang. A vast plain slipped under us and the hills swept by, and that great monster on which we rode trembled and bounded and snorted and raged as it hurled us on. I said to the Methodist minister on the other side the locomotive: "My brother, why should Presbyterians and Methodists quarrel about the decrees and free agency? You see that track, that firm track, that iron track; that is the decree. You see this engineer's arm; that is free agency. How beautifully they work together. They are going to take us through. We could not do without the track and we could not do without the engineer." So I rejoice day by day. Work for us all to do, and we may turn the crank of the Christian machinery this way or that, for we are free agents; but there is the track laid so long ago no one remembers it, laid by the hand of Almighty God in sockets that no terrestrial or satanic pressure can ever affect. And along that track the car of the world's redemption will roll and roll to the Grand Central Depot of the Millennium. I have no anxiety about the track. I am only afraid that for our indolence God will discharge us and get some other stoker and some other engineer. The train is going through with us or without us. So, my brethren, watch all the events that are going by. If things seem to turn out right, give wings to your joy. If things seem to turn out wrong, throw out the anchor of faith and hold fast.

There is a house in London where Peter the Great of Russia lived a while when he was moving through the land incognito and in workman's dress, that he might learn the wants of the people. A stranger was visiting at that house recently, and saw in a dark attic an old box, and he said to the owner of the house, "What's in that box?" The owner said: "I don't know; that box was there when I got the house and it was there when my father got it; we haven't had any curiosity to look at it; I guess there's nothing in it." "Well," said the stranger, "I'll give you two pounds for it." "Well, done." The two pounds are paid, and recently the contents of that box were sold to the Czar of Russia for fifty thousand dollars. In it, the lathing machine of Peter the Great, his private letters and documents of value beyond all monetary consideration. And here are events that seem very insignificant and unimportant, but they encase treasures of divine providence and eternities of meaning which after a while God will demonstrate before the ages as being of stupendous value. As near as I can tell from what I see, there must be a God somewhere about.

When Titans play quoits they pitch mountains; but who owns these gigantic forces you have been reading about the last two months? Whose hand is on the throttle valve of the volcanoes? Whose foot suddenly planted on the footstool makes the continents quiver? God! God! He looketh upon the mountains and they tremble. He toucheth the hills and they smoke. God! God! I must be at peace with Him. Through the Lord Jesus Christ this God is mine and He is yours. I put the earthquake that shook Palestine at the crucifixion against all the down-rockings of the centuries. This God on our side we may challenge all the centuries of time and all the cycles of eternity.

THE INCOMING FLEET.

A few days ago I was at Fire Island, Long Island, and I went up in the cupola from which they telegraph to New York the approach of vessels hours before they come into port. There is an opening in the wall, and the operator puts his telescope through that opening, and looks out and sees vessels far out at sea. While I was talking with him, he went up and looked out. He said: "We are expecting the Arizona to-night." I said: "Is it possible you know all those vessels? do you know them as you know a man's face?" He said: "Yes, I never make a mistake; before I can see the hulks, I know them by the masts; I know them all, I have watched them so long." Oh, what a grand thing it is to have ships telegraphed and heralded long before they come into port, that friends may come down to the wharf and welcome their long-absent loved ones. So to-day, we take our stand in the watch tower and we look off and through the glass of inspiration or providence we look off and see a whole fleet of ships coming in. That is the ship of peace, flag with one star of Bethlehem floating above the top-gallants. That is the ship of the Church, mark of salt wave high up on the smoke stack, showing she has had rough weather, but the Captain of salvation commands her and all is well with her. The ship of heaven, mightiest craft ever launched, millions of passengers, waiting for millions more, prophets and apostles and martyrs in the cabin, conquerors at the foot of the mast, while from the rigging hands are waving this way as though they knew us, and we wave back again, for they are ours; they went out from our own households. Ours! Hail, hail! Put off the black and put on the white. Stop tolling the funeral bell and ring the wedding anthem. Shut up the hearse and take the chariot. Now, it comes around the great headland. Soon she will strike the wharf and we will go aboard her. Tears for ships going out. Laughter for ships coming in. Now she touches the wharf. Throw on the planks. Block not up that gangway with embracing long lost-friends, for you will have eternity of reunion. Stand back and give way until other millions come on. Farewell to sin. Farewell to struggle. Farewell to sickness. Farewell to death. All aboard for heaven!

THREE PROPHETIC DAYS.

By E. B. S.

Peter in his second epistle (3 : 8) tells us not to be ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years. It is plain, however, from reason and from Scripture, that time belongs to this earth and not to eternity. It can be measured, but can eternity be measured? Where is its centre? its beginning or its end?

The faithless Jews numbered our Lord's years (John 8 : 57). He did not tell them His age by centuries; but of one fact He assured them, which was; "Before Abraham was, I am." John 8 : 58. This we may not be able to comprehend, but the Lord's statement is sufficient for the faithful child of God.

The sun, by whose apparent motion we measure time, was given us "for signs and for seasons and for days and years." By him time is calculated; and by him we can measure it and count days and years; but the sun will soon have finished his work. Soon the hour will come when the angel will swear, by Him who made all things, that time shall be no more; the mystery which God hath spoken of by all His prophets having been accomplished. Rev. 10 : 6, 7.

By the help of Scripture, however, the record of the sun's course may be used to warn and guide the Church. Days and years are terms of value for this world alone, but though they cannot be understood when used in prophecy in relation to God and eternity in the sense in which we use them, they may, and probably do, refer to periods of time as clearly defined and limited in the purposes of God as natural days and years are in our conception of life and time. Bearing this in mind, and never forgetting that days and years and other periods of time mentioned are in their natural sense for this world only, let us see what may be learned from their spiritual and eternal signification.

The same remarks apply to all periods of time mentioned in prophecy. The words "hour," "generation," "time, times, and half a time," etc., as used by our Lord, His apostles and the prophets, have a definite though not a natural signification. Thus the word "hour," in the passage, "The hour cometh and now is when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God: and they that hear shall live" (John 5 : 25), evidently is no hour of sixty minutes, but through the long-suffering mercy of God has not closed to this moment. The same word occurs in our Lord's conversation with the woman of Samaria (John 4 : 21), and there it also denotes a lengthened period of time, the limits of which, though known to God, are unknown to men.

The word "generation" is similarly used. Our Lord says (Mark 8 . 38): "For whosoever shall be ashamed of Me and of My words in this adulterous and sinful generation, the Son of man also will be ashamed of him, when He cometh in the glory of His Father with the holy angels." A perusal of the four previous verses in the same chapter shows that the word "generation" covers the whole of this Gospel dispensation. Again in 1 Pet. 2 : 9, we read: "Ye are a chosen generation," bearing the same meaning that the word "generation" is often used in Scripture to denote, a dispensation. The antediluvians are called a generation, which is described as notorious for violence, and at its close only one was found faithful; another generation covering the period from that time to Christ's first advent, noted for its idolatry and faithlessness; another generation, the present one, until the sign of the Son of man shall be seen in the heavens, which generation our Lord designates as being wicked and adulterous.

While, however, the limits of all these periods are unknown to us, an indication which may assist us in forming an approximate idea of their extent, is given by Peter in the passage already referred to. Peter emphatically impresses upon us the fact that a day is equivalent with the Lord to a thousand years, and he speaks of it in connection with our Lord's return. Accepting the apostle's ratio between God's time and man's time, some remarkable conclusions are reached. We read in Exodus, "God blessed the Sabbath day," for He made the heavens and the earth in six days and rested on the seventh. Taking this fact, that God made the earth in six periods of time and rested on the seventh to be a prophetic picture of this world's history, it appears that up to the flood were the first two days; two days to the first advent of our Lord; and two days between it and His second coming, which will usher in the seventh day, the day for which the whole creation is now groaning, when all things will be restored to their original beauty. It is that day of which Paul speaks in Heb. 4 : 9, where he says: "There remaineth, therefore, a Sabbath rest for the people of God."

Scripture authorizes us to divide the world's history into four dispensations. The first dispensation of two days closing with the flood; the second dispensation of two days closing with the birth of Christ; the third dispensation of two days which will end this present period of grace; and the fourth dispensation of one day is the millennium, the rest, the thousand years, etc. These last two dispensations are often spoken of in Scripture as "the latter days."

The point of commencement of this dispensation is indicated by the Apostle Peter, who in Acts 2 : 17, speaks of the fulfilment of the words spoken by the Prophet Joel, showing us how this dispensation opened with the gift of the Holy Ghost and is to close with the sun being turned into darkness and the moon into blood.

Another indication that the period described as two days covers the whole of this dispensation is our Lord's emphatic message to Herod, Luke 13 : 32, where He plainly shows us, in speaking of this present dispensation, that He counts it as two days. He says: "Go tell that fox I do cures to-day and to-morrow, and the third day I shall be perfected." Do not all who believe in the atonement of the precious blood of Christ know that these two days (to-day and to-morrow) have not yet closed? though the drawing of the third day when our Lord will be perfected may be very near.

The three following verses of the same chapter (Luke 13 : 33–35) taken in connection with other passages describing the same event give a most important clue to the understanding of the chronology in verse 32. Our Lord first speaks of the utter failure of the Jewish nation to do His will; their being cast off in consequence until they will be willing to receive Him, saying: "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." The rejection of the Jews forms the subject of an argument by the Apostle Paul, who asks the question, "Did God cast off His people?" and answers it, "God forbid" (Rom. 11 : 1.) And further, "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye be wise in your own conceits, that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in; and so all Israel shall be saved; as it is written, "There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer; He shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob" (Rom. 11 : 25, 26). This passage establishes very clearly the fact that they are only cast off for a period. This view is confirmed by the words of the Apostle James (Acts 15 : 15, 16), who says this agrees with the words of the prophets; as it is written, "After these things I will return and I will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen."

Hosea also speaks of their affliction and of their being healed, and also gives the period of their affliction and the time of their healing. "After two days will He revive us; in the third day He will raise us up, and we shall live in His sight." (Hosea 6 : 2.) It will be seen that this passage corresponds with our Lord's message to Herod (Luke 13 : 32).

From a comparison of these portions we gather that the fulness of the Gentiles will be accomplished in two days; during those days Israel is rejected; the third day our Lord's work will be perfected by Israel being restored and God's will being done upon earth the same as it is done in heaven, the primary object of our Lord's mission to this world.

The same truth is taught us by a figure, in the first three days ministry of Christ, as recorded by John. The first day He was calling disciples; the second day calling disciples, and on the last He called Nathanael, a type of the Jewish nation who will not receive Him in faith and will not believe until they see Him coming whom they have pierced; and on the third day will be the marriage.

The final result of this comparison of passages of Scripture and the deductions drawn from parallel expressions is stimulating and encouraging. Only one conclusion can be drawn by the student of prophecy who reads the Scriptures in faith, apart from tradition. He sees that the fulfilment must be very near of the predicted glory described in the following verses: "Let us rejoice and be exceeding glad, and let us give glory unto Him; for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and His wife hath made herself ready. And it was given unto her that she should array herself in fine linen, bright and pure; for the fine linen is the righteous acts of the saints. And He saith unto me, Write, Blessed are they which are bidden to the marriage supper of the Lamb. And He saith unto me, These are true words of God." (Rev. 19 : 7–9.)

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Soldier's Conversion.—Mr. Richard Hill said at a recent meeting: "A happy Christian soldier was asked how he was brought to the Saviour, and instead of going into the minutiæ of his conversion, he said, 'The Lord met me one day and said, Halt, attention, right about face, march; and that was all about it, my friends.'"

A Banker's Clerk's Fidelity.—Mr. Guinness said: "God has peculiar ways of working sometimes. A banker's clerk who was a real Christian was transferred to an office in Marseilles, where there was no aggressive Christian work of any kind going on. His soul being on fire with love to our dear Redeemer, he opened a meeting in a small room which became so crowded that he had to take another place much larger. Soon he had to take another still larger. The Lord so blessed his labors that now week by week there are gathered together two thousand five hundred people to listen to the simple story of Jesus and His dying love."

A Prodigal's Ruin.—Dr. Cameron, Speaking on the "Prodigal Son," said that "Not long ago one of the leading young men of our city went to spend a night at the theatre, and endeavored to make his life happier by draining the cup of pleasure to the dregs. Ah! he was wandering in a far country, and never returned to the father who longed for him so eagerly. That prodigal spent his last night on earth in sinful license, and had no time for repentance. Death came silently and suddenly upon him, and he stood before the Almighty God whom he had so openly sinned against without having accepted the pardon so freely offered to him and to you."

A Ploughman's Good Fortune.—"Not long ago I spent a little time with the wife of a rich Australian farmer. Years ago the Government of Australia sent home word that able-bodied men would get assisted passages and land on good terms. A number of ploughmen read this offer at the village smithy, and afterward discussed it over the glowing fire of the farmhouse-kitchen. They all believed what the paper told them, because it bore the government mark, but they didn't accept the offer. Some did, and got the passage, but rued it and drew back; but one, the husband of my friend, went. He ventured his all; he sold all he had to raise the money he needed, because he believed in the statements and accepted the offer of the government. Forty years after he sailed from this country he returned a rich man. A sinner who gives up everything for Christ, and believes His word, is made rich with true riches at once and forever. He is a son of God, and 'a joint-heir with Jesus Christ.'"

A Good Breakfast Gratis.—"One Sabbath morning a poor woman came in to the Free Breakfast so destitute and abandoned that she had no hope left of improvement in the future. She heard while she was appeasing her hunger some words which kindled hope anew in her despairing breast. They were, 'He careth for you.' 'What!' she thought, 'Jesus cares for me? I fancied no one cared for me. What did it matter if the police dragged me to the station drunk; who cared about it? But it seems that Jesus cares for me.' She continued to think the matter over; she did more, she trusted Him, and sought His pardon for her sins, and on that cold Sabbath morning and since, for many years, she has found it true that Jesus, indeed, cares for her."

Volunteers for the Coal-Shaft.—The Rev. Mr. Munro said: "One beautiful day in summer a fearful accident occurred in a coal mine in England, by which many hundreds of brave men lost their lives. Still there were a number who were unhurt; some were wounded, but not fatally, and soon they all gathered near to the shaft, but it was blocked, and they were unable to escape without help from the surface. Many hundreds of men and women were crowding to the pit's mouth, but only a confused noise was made instead of prompt action for a rescue, until a man in authority appeared on the tumultuous scene, and called for volunteers to go down the shaft. A Christian standing by noticed that the hands held up were those of men who had friends at the bottom. It was the same reason which induced Jesus to die for us. He loved us, and gave Himself for us."

What a Bunch of Flowers Did.—Mr. Guinness said: "I will relate to you an incident which will show how a great work for Christ was begun in Spain. There was a lady in London who took a bunch of flowers to a hospital and laid it on the bed of an invalid together with a small card on which was printed a text of Scripture. The patient was a Spaniard; and being a stranger in a strange land, lying sick and weary, his heart was moved by the little token of love, and he read the card, which he discovered was strikingly adapted to his case. The lady had some conversation with him on her next visit, and he was led to give himself to the Saviour. On his recovery from illness he came to our Institute at Harley House, Bow Road, London, where he was trained as an evangelist for work among his own people. He became very intimate with a Swede who was also in training, and induced him to go with him to Spain, where they both preached the Gospel with great boldness, and were much blessed in their work."

A Drunken Waif Rescued.—Mr. Simpson Related the following: "Three or four days ago there was a man walking our streets, his hands waving above his head, and staggering along under the influence of drink. A friend who was passing, and who has a love for souls, saw him, and laying his hand upon him, said, 'Ah, man, you are a poor sinner.' 'Yes,' said the man, 'I know that!' My friend then said, 'The Lord Jesus loves you.' 'No, no,' replied the drunkard, 'He does not love me.' 'Ah,' said the other, 'but He does, and wants to save you,' and he pressed the thought upon him that the Lord Jesus was anxious to save his soul. The unfortunate drunkard broke down and said, 'What am I to do?' He was told to go into the Green and sit down on one of the seats till he got a little sober, and then come to the Circus and meet him at three o'clock. The man promised to do so, and he was as good as his word. He presented a sad sight—a mere human waif. He was filthy, ragged, and degraded; but he was pointed to the Lord Jesus, and he found Him ready to save his long-lost soul. On the Sabbath morning, after the Free Breakfast was over, that man came into the little room where I was, and I scarcely knew him—there was such a marvellous change in his face and whole appearance. Two hours ago I again saw him, and he told me that Christ was precious to him, and he was still holding on to Him."

THE MARSHALLING OF THE NATIONS.*

By Rev. J. R. Graves, LL.D.

THE UNMISTAKABLE SIGNS

of Christ's coming, are apparent. The disciples, after hearing his predictions of His coming and of the ending of the Gospel or Gentile Dispensation, eagerly asked what would be the sign of the coming and of the end of the age that would close at His coming. I will suppose my readers as eagerly ask me to answer these two questions, but essentially one. I will endeavor to find the answers to both of these questions, under the same division, and present not only the Saviour's teachings, but also of His apostles, whom He instructed.

From these sources we learn that His coming, and the close of this Dispensation will be immediately preceded by the following portentous signs: 1. Gross ignorance of divine things will be prevalent among all classes, with respect to His coming. In His address of comfort to Zion and Jerusalem, in view of His immediate appearing, Christ Jehovah puts these words into the mouth of His prophet: "Arise, shine; for Thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen above thee. For, behold, the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people; but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and His glory shall be seen above thee. And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising."—Isa. 60 : 1-3. "But the wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand."—Dan. 12 : 10. "And with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish, because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie; that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness."—II Cor 2 : 10-12.

2. A great

once delivered to the saints on the part of its professors. "Nevertheless when the Lord cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?"—Luke 18 : 8. If this is not equivalent to an assertion that there will not be a saint on the earth at His second coming (see future chapter), it certainly indicates that there will be very few indeed at that time. "Let no man deceive you by any means, for that day [i.e., the coming of Christ] shall not come, except there come a falling away first."—II Thess. 2 : 3. "Now, the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of demons; speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their consciences seared with a hot iron."—I Tim. 4 : 1, 2. "There shall be false teachers among you who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. And many shall follow their pernicious ways; by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of. And through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you; whose judgment lingereth not and their damnation slumbereth not."—II Pet. 2 : 1-3. (Read onward to the end.)

3. A general unbelief in Christ's coming, abounding iniquity, hypocrisy, untruthfulness, disobedience to parents, and

SCOFFING INFIDELITY.

We learn from God's Word to what depths of abominable iniquity and infidelity the world had reached, "while the long-suffering of God waited, in the days of Noah"—and how few believed God's Word, spoken by Him concerning the coming flood; and also the wickedness and infidelity of Sodom and Gomorrah, in the days of Lot. And Jesus said this would be the case with the whole world just before His coming, and He gave it as one of the signs of His coming: "And as it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man. They did eat and they drank [i.e., to drunkenness], they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and the flood came and destroyed them all. Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot, they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven and destroyed them all. Even so shall it be when the Son of man is revealed."—Luke 17 : 26-31.

What more irrefragable proof than this could be framed in human language, that the world is not to be converted before the revelation of the Son of God from heaven, and consequently that His coming is pre-millennial? And is not this a graphic picture of the present state of the world—an inveterate unbelief in His second coming, and a presumptuous recklessness under its proclamation, and an inordinate greed for lust and gain?

Could a darker picture possibly be drawn of the moral condition of the world, out of Christ, than this? Christ will make their destruction manifest unto all men at His coming. With this dark and fearful picture of universal and most abominable wickedness before their eyes, how can any candid mind believe that the world is to be converted before Christ comes?

Thus we have delineated before us the state of the churches, and of the world, just prior to the coming of the Lord for His saints, to take them away from the most terrible evils to come upon all them left upon the face of the whole earth. There is but one commendable feature connected with all this, and it is given as a sign of the end.

4. There will be an extensive

SPIRIT OF INQUIRY,

among the faithful few followers of Christ, concerning His coming.

The Saviour has left on record most emphatic commands to His faithful disciples to watch for and recognize the signs of His near approach, and pronounced especial blessings upon all who do study His word and compare the events that are transpiring among the nations, with the moral condition of the world and the spiritual state of the churches; with the signs He has given we must believe that "the wise"—the truly justified in Christ—will, in a good measure, understand the things, and be found ready and waiting for His appearing. "And none of the wicked shall understand, but the wise [the justified] shall understand."—Dan. 12 : 10.

A distaste for prophetic study, to search and to understand what is written concerning Christ's second coming, should be to each professor of Christianity a satisfactory evidence of unregeneracy. But many will search most diligently into these prophecies as the time of the end appproaches, and great attainments in a knowledge of them will be made. (Dan. 12 : 4.)

"Many shall endeavor to search out the sense, and knowledge shall be increased by their means." (A. Clark.) "And there will be many teachers who will understand, for they will give the timely warning of the Bridegroom's approach, and all the wise virgins will hear and be prepared to go into the marriage." (On Matt. 15.) This sign is being fulfilled in this, our day, as is evidenced by the numerous new books and tracts almost weekly offered to the public in this country and England, and the Prophetical Conferences that have been held in New York and London; and the papers, weekly and quarterly, devoted to the discussion of prophecy and the signs of the second coming. Many are indeed diligently searching the teachings of God's word with respect to Christ's coming, and knowledge upon this subject is being largely increased and widely diffused.

NOTICE.

Many subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who are laboring to extend the sphere of its usefulness, wish us to afford them the same facilities as were placed at their disposal last year. It appears that the concession in price then made, enabled them to introduce the journal to persons and families to whom it proved a blessing. God used it as a means of conversion in not a few cases; in others it gave comfort and encouragement to tried and afflicted believers; and ministers and lay preachers, to whom our friends sent it, acknowledged their indebtedness for help in their labors to the hints and suggestions contained in its pages.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has no higher object than that which its friends thus state was achieved last year. The same opportunity is therefore cheerfully given this year. Any subscriber wishing to introduce THE CHRISTIAN HERALD where it may do good, may send to THE MANAGER, 63 Bible House, New York, for which sum the paper will be mailed to any address in the United States or in Canada every week from the date on which the money is received, until the end of 1883. Will our friends pray that God will use each number for the advancement of Christ's Kingdom?

CURRENT EVENTS.

President Arthur Returned to Washington on Friday from his five weeks' trip to the West. A Washington despatch says: "He was met at the depot by Assistant Secretary of State Davis, Private Secretary Phillips, and Assistant Secretary Pruden. After greeting these gentlemen cordially he drove directly to the White House. He appeared to be in good health, and is very much sun-browned." He has received a hearty reception everywhere, and Chicago showed marked enthusiasm. Few changes in public opinion in the course of the history of the nation are more remarkable than that in respect to President Arthur. His accession to power was regarded with apprehension in many quarters, and in others was plainly characterized as a national misfortune; but his conduct in the Presidential chair has won public confidence, and he is now one of the strongest candidates for the Republican nomination.

A Report of the Imports and Exports of the United States has been issued by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, which, in view of the discussion now going on as to the advantages of high tariff, is very significant. The following is a brief synopsis of the figures: Month ended July 31st, 1883 (excess of imports), $4,466,589; seven months ended July 31st, 1883 (excess of exports), $41,616,430; twelve months ended July 31st, 1883 (excess of exports), $107,379,236. The total values of the imports of merchandise during the twelve months ended July 31st, 1883, were $714,236,719, and for the previous twelve months, $738,021,773, a decrease of $23,785,054. The values of the exports of merchandise for the twelve months ended July 31st, 1883, were $821,615,955, and for the twelve months ended July 31st, 1882, $742,126,183, an increase of $79,489,772.

The Results of the Labor of the Utah Commission have been stated in an official letter addressed by Mr. A. B. Carlton of the Commission to the Secretary of the Interior. Mr. Carlton says: "This board is charged under the law with the duty of excluding all polygamists from voting and from eligibility to office. This is the full extent of our authority under the law; and in this our work has been completely successful. We have excluded some 12,000 polygamists from the polls; and at the November election of 1882, many municipal elections since that time, and at the general election in August, 1883, embracing about 800 officers who were elected, we have excluded all polygamists from eligibility. In short, the commission has strictly and stringently executed the law of Congress, and has stretched the legal tether to its utmost tension in order to make it as effective as possible, insomuch that the Mormons have sued the members of this Board in ten several cases for what they allege to be an excess of authority against them." This statement relieves the commission of blame for the failure of the law, but it does not change the fact that the law has failed.

A New Project for Dealing with the Indians is advocated by General Sheridan, who explained it to the Shoshone and Arapahoe chiefs at their recent conference with the Presidential party. General Sheridan's proposal is that the Indians should surrender their reservations for interest-bearing bonds, and break up their tribal relations by becoming settlers. The chiefs appeared to be strongly opposed to the plan when it was suggested to them. It may be doubted whether they are yet sufficiently advanced in civilization to prosper in farm life, and it is certain that many of them would consider the removal from the reservation to a much smaller area of land poorly compensated by the receipt of a bond the value of which they probably would not appreciate.

The Convention of Colored Men to be Held at Louisville, Ky., on September 24th, has been stigmatized as a scheme to support the present administration. The charge has now been publicly denied by Frederick Douglass in the Washington Star. He said, also, that he proposed to go as a delegate to the convention, if one should be held, and that he had received letters from Texas, Louisiana, Arkansas, Nebraska, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland and other States informing him that the delegates from those States would attend. He said also that he had received letters from Senator Harrison, of Indiana; from the Mayor of the city of Indianapolis, and other prominent gentlemen of Indiana, welcoming the convention to Indianapolis, in case it should not be welcomed to Louisville, and in any case if the colored people should wish to hold the convention there.

The Change in the Rate of Internal Postage from three to two cents, which takes effect on October 1st, is to be accompanied by the issue of new two- and four-cent stamps. Proofs of the new designs were shown last week to a Tribune reporter, who has written a lengthy description of them. The two-cent is a head of George Washington engraved by Alfred Jones from a copy of Houdin's cast from the life. It differs considerably from the head of Washington on the present three-cent stamp. The new one is much more refined, has less breadth of cheek, and the chin is delicately discriminated. The hair is more artistically drawn, and there is a better arrangement of the cue, producing altogether a younger, sweeter and more intellectual head without losing any of the power and force so clearly defined as a characteristic of the face of the Father of his Country. The new head is set in an oval medallion like the old, and this is placed upon a shield of the heraldic form. Another great improvement is in the lettering. Instead of "U. S. Postage" at the top upon a comparatively light ground, which does not give effect to the white letters, the ground is much darker and the lettering is unabbreviated and reads "United States Postage." The color used is an ink prepared from various ingredients in which an oxide of iron plays a prominent part. It is a light purple or a carmine-red of pale tone according to the phraseology of the collector. The four-cent stamp, also engraved by Alfred Jones, bears the portrait of Andrew Jackson, and is taken from a bust of him discovered at Nashville. The head is on an oval medallion, placed upon a panel with bevelled edges. The legend around the top of the medallion is precisely similar to the new two-cent stamp. The color used is green, not unlike that of the present three-cent stamp.

Preparations for the Christian Convention have already commenced in Chicago. The convention will be conducted by Messrs. Moody and Sankey, and will commence on September 18th. A male choir of one hundred voices will lead the singing, and the general exercises will be under Mr. Moody's personal direction. From this time until the convention meets, Major Whittle, Mr. McGranahan and the evangelists will conduct a series of preparatory meetings and Bible readings.

The Libel on Messrs. Moody and Sankey, which has been extensively circulated, is contradicted in a published card by Mr. Moody, who denies that he and Mr. Sankey are no longer able to work in harmony, and declares that if their lives are spared they will continue together in the labor they both love and enjoy. The recently revamped tale about Mr. Sankey's using his position as an evangelist in the interests of a reed-organ company is also branded as false, Mr. Moody declaring positively that during the ten years of their association Mr. Sankey has not acted as agent of any organ company, nor has he sold any organs on commission. On September 18th, 19th, and 20th, the Christian Convention will assemble in Chicago. Messrs. Moody and Sankey will conduct the meetings. At its close they will start for the East, and expect to leave for Europe on October 1st.

Ben Hogan, the Converted Prize-Fighter, whose rescue from a life of sin, through the instrumentality of Mr. C. W. Sawyer, has been mentioned in these columns, is now holding services in San Francisco. The Central Presbyterian Tabernacle has been crowded by people anxious to hear him, and though it is one of the largest churches in the city, hundreds were unable to gain admission. On one evening about thirty-five of the leading sporting men, including prize-fighters, gamblers and wrestlers, attended in a body, attracted by their recollection of Hogan, whom all had known in the days of his professional connection with the prize ring. They all seemed deeply impressed, and one of them remarked, "He is a changed man from what I saw him in New York six or seven years ago, and I don't doubt but he's honest in all he says." Mr. Hogan is holding meetings this week in the rooms of the Y. M. C. A. of San Francisco.

The New Postal Notes now being Sold at All money order offices are a convenience appreciated by the public. They can be bought like postage stamps without a written application; they cost only three cents, and they may be had of any denomination below five dollars. Many subscribers remitting money to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have availed themselves of this means. It would save us considerable loss of time and money if all our friends who have access to a money-order office would send us postal notes instead of postage stamps.

A Gold Spike and a Silver Sledge were used on Saturday last in fixing the last rail of the great Northern Pacific Railroad. The road, which is the third great road across the Continent, covers with its branches 2654 miles, and connects the Eastern coast by the Chicago trunk lines at Duluth, Minn., situated at the western extremity of the great lakes, with Tacoma, Washington Territory, on the Pacific coast. The road was commenced at its termini, and the last rail was laid near Helena, Mont. The completion of a work of that magnitude was, therefore, naturally considered a matter of more than ordinary interest to the public who will use it and the men who originated and completed it. Thus we see the significance of the golden spike and the silver sledge. This is another of the many facilities given us by men of genius and energy, enabling us to journey whither we desire to go. The human race is making vast and rapid strides in bringing under control the whole of the earth; it is only when the world recedes and men pass through the portal of death into the world of spirits that such facilities fail. Then man is powerless, and the only sure pathway to the blessed haven is the new and living way Jesus opened for us, and completed on the cross, not amid the plaudits of nobles, but amid the jibes and taunts of enemies, His limbs torn with nails and His head pierced by the crown of thorns (Heb. 10 : 20).

A Romantic Marriage, Which was Solemnized in Texas, was described recently on the occasion of its forty-eighth anniversary by the husband. From his narrative it appeared that in 1835 he was settled in Texas, and being lonely he thought he would marry if he could find a suitable wife. One day he was passing the clearing of another settler when he heard some one chopping. He concluded to turn aside and see who the axeman was. To his utter astonishment he found a buxom lass, about twenty years old, splitting rails. He engaged her in conversation, and then and there, on the rail cut she had chopped, and was preparing to split into rails, wooed and won the damsel. A more happy and beloved couple never joined hands than they proved, and the old gentleman in telling the story bore testimony to the excellent wife a rail-splitting lass proved to be. They have several children living. Young ladies often consider that a ball-room is the likeliest place in which to become acquainted with their future husbands. It often happens, however, that the husbands who find them there are not able in after life to bear testimony like that of the old gentleman in Texas, who first saw his wife when she was engaged in the prosaic occupation of splitting rails. It may encourage Christians whose occupations are laborious and uncongenial to reflect that the call of God to work for Him has often come to men engaged in such duties. Moses, David, Elisha and the Apostles were all called while at work (Prov. 22 : 29).

A Thrilling Adventure with a Panther is narrated in The Polaris of Portland, Oregon. It appears that two young men, accompanied by an old hunter, went hunting recently on the Lewis River. They were very successful, but one morning they noticed that the quarters of a deer they had hung up the night before, had been dragged down and carried away. The old hunter recognized the work of a panther, and warned the boys of the danger of an attack from one of the savage brutes. About midnight of the following day the two boys were awakened by a shout, and, springing to their feet, they found their companion in a struggle for life or death with a large panther. The camp-fire had burned low, giving little light, but they could see that the old man was trying to free himself from the panther by main strength. Just at this opportune moment one of them fired both barrels of his gun, at once, sending the charge into the neck and shoulder of the brute. This had the effect of preventing it from making another spring, and, quick as a flash, the other fired, and the would-be man-eater rolled on the ground helpless. The old man's wounds were then bound up, and he was assisted to the nearest house, which was eight miles off, for treatment. The party evidently had a narrow escape. It is surprising that the panther should have found them all asleep after they knew that there was a danger of its attack. There are many who show a similar lack of watchfulness in spiritual matters though conscious of the nearness of a relentless enemy. Like Peter they disregard warnings, and like him, too, they have to lament the consequences (Luke 22 : 31 and 62).

A Number of Tenants of a Tottering House in New York City refuse to leave it, though warned that it is likely to fall. The building is a three-story and basement brick dwelling, and is inhabited by five families. The partitions in the basement story have been taken out, and the central piers of the basement, both front and rear, are torn and weak, so that the house is settled and the wall bulged. The Bureau of Buildings sent its inspector to examine it, and he recommended that it should be torn down instantly. The police were instructed to clear the tenants out, but the inspector found that he had not the legal power to do so. Some of the more sensible tenants moved their household goods out into the street and vacated their apartments, but others, although repeatedly warned, still cling to the place and refuse to move. They are blamed by the press and their neighbors, and if the house should fall while they are in it they will have no pity; for, as people justly say, they were warned. But while men marvel at the temerity of these tenants, it occasions no surprise that a much more urgent warning is unheeded (II Peter 3 : 9, 10).

A Wonderful Mirage was Visible on the Coast of Maine a few days ago. The day had been warm and calm, and waves of heated air seemed to vibrate with great intensity on the sea. Suddenly the ocean assumed a wonderful appearance. Above the true horizon seemed suspended in air a second ocean, which faded away and formed a gray vapor that appeared like an immense tidal wave and fell and rose to a great height. Vessels before invisible rose from below the horizon and sailed in spectral procession through the clouds. Just beyond the spectral cliffs the sea broke on a long ledge and the spray leaped skyward with lightning rapidity. The phenomena lasted till sunset, and then in the haze slowly faded away. Observers describe the scene as one of unequalled beauty. It is explained by natural causes, but prophecy indicates that a more wondrous sight will yet be manifested with which natural causes will have nothing to do. It is the scene the seer of Patmos saw in prophetic vision when the city of God will descend from heaven adorned as a bride for her husband (Rev. 21 : 2 and 3).

A Rescued Party Taken off a Sinking Ship and carried into Baltimore, Md., on September 7th, give a thrilling account of their experience. The captain of the Deerhound, an English steamer, saw them on a battered hulk in the open sea on September 4th, and took them on board his own vessel. The ship they were on had lost her masts, spars and sails, and was leaking badly. The party consisted of nine persons, and included the captain and his newly-married wife. They took nothing on board but some few clothes, and appeared afraid the steamer would sail away without them, as several others had done. They were exhausted from their terrible experience, loss of rest, and hardship. They had not suffered for want of food, but they had endured the terrible agony of seeing sail after sail pass by without coming to their relief, in spite of their signal of distress, and they saw the danger of another storm coming up and carrying all to the bottom of the ocean, and that overcame them. This English Good Samaritan found the poor creatures in no need of pressing to leave their wretched ship; they were so eager to go that they gladly left their property behind lest they should miss the opportunity. Would that poor shipwrecked sinners similarly realized their danger and showed like alacrity in accepting the offer of salvation! (Luke 5 : 11.)

THE DOCTRINES OF GRACE DO NOT LEAD TO SIN.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under the law, but under grace. What then? shall we sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid."—Romans 6 . 14, 15.

LAST Sabbath morning I tried to show that the substance and essence of the true Gospel is the doctrine of God's grace—that, in fact, if you take away the grace of God from the Gospel you have extracted from it its very life-blood, and there is nothing left worth preaching, worth believing, or worth contending for. Grace is the soul of the Gospel; without it the Gospel is dead. Grace is the music of the Gospel; without it the Gospel is silent as to all comfort. Grace commences to save, and it perseveres till all is done. From first to last, from the "A" to the "Z" of the heavenly alphabet, everything in salvation is of grace, and grace alone; all is of free favor, nothing of merit. "By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God." "So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy."

No sooner is this doctrine set forth in a clear light than men begin to cavil at it. It is the target for all carnal logic to shoot at. Unrenewed minds never did like it, and they never will; it is so humbling to human pride, making so light of the nobility of human nature. That men are to be saved by divine charity, that they must as condemned criminals receive pardon by the exercise of the royal prerogative, or else perish in their sins, is a teaching which they cannot endure. Straightway the unrenewed man seeks out artillery with which to fight against the gospel of the grace of God, and one of

he has ever brought to the front is the declaration that the doctrine of the grace of God must lead to licentiousness. If great sinners are freely saved, then men will more readily become great sinners; and if when God's grace regenerates a man it abides with him, then men will infer that they may live as they like, and yet be saved. This is the constantly-repeated objection which I have heard till it wearies me with its vain and false noise. I am almost ashamed to have to refute so rotten an argument.

This morning I want to talk a little about this notion; for in part it is a great mistake, and in part it is a great lie. In part it is a mistake because it arises from misconception, and in part it is a lie because men know better, or might know better if they pleased.

I begin by admitting that the charge does appear somewhat probable. It does seem very likely that if we are everywhere to cry, "Come, ye sinners, come and welcome, and receive free and immediate pardon through the sovereign grace of God," it does seem probable that some may basely reply, "Let us sin without stint, for we can easily obtain forgiveness." But that which looks to be probable is not, therefore, certain; on the contrary, the improbable and the unexpected full often come to pass. I believe that the inference which would lead men to sin because grace reigns is not logical, but the very reverse; and I venture to assert that, as a matter of fact, ungodly men do not, as a rule, plead the grace of God as an excuse for their sin. As a rule they are too indifferent to care about reasons at all ; and if they do offer an excuse it is usually more flimsy and superficial. There may be a few men of perverse minds who have used this argument, but there is no accounting for the freaks of the fallen understanding. I shrewdly suspect that in any cases in which such reasoning has been put forward it was a mere pretence, and by no means a plea which satisfied the sinner's own conscience.

If men do thus excuse themselves, it is generally in some veiled manner, for the most of them would be utterly ashamed to state the argument in plain terms. I question whether the devil himself would be found reasoning thus—"God is merciful, therefore let us be more sinful." It is so diabolical an inference, that I do not like to charge my fellow-men with it, though our moralist opposers do not hesitate thus to degrade them.

I have admitted that a few human beings have turned the grace of God into lasciviousness ; but I trust no one will ever argue against any doctrine on account of the perverse use made of it by the baser sort. Cannot every truth be perverted? Is there a single doctrine of Scripture which graceless hands have not twisted into mischief? Let us act like rational men. We do not find fault with ropes because poor insane creatures have hanged themselves therewith ; nor do we ask that the wares of Sheffield may be destroyed because edged tools are the murderer's instruments.

It may appear probable that the doctrine of free grace will be made into a license for sin, but a better acquaintance with the curious working of the human mind corrects the notion. Fallen as human nature is, it is still human, and therefore does not take kindly to certain forms of evil—such, for instance, as

INHUMAN INGRATITUDE.

It is hardly human to multiply injuries upon those who return us continued benefits. The case reminds me of the story of half-a-dozen boys who had severe fathers, accustomed to flog them within an inch of their lives. Another boy was with them who was tenderly beloved by his parents, and known to be so. These young gentlemen met together to hold a council of war about robbing an orchard. They were all of them anxious to get about it except the favored youth, who did not enjoy the proposal. One of them cried out, "You need not be afraid ; if our fathers catch us at this work, we shall be half killed, but your father won't lay a hand upon you." The little boy answered, "And do you think because my father is kind to me, that therefore I will do wrong and grieve him? I will do nothing of the sort to my dear father. He is so good to me that I cannot vex him." It would appear that the argument of the many boys was not overpoweringly convincing to their companion ; the opposite conclusion was quite as logical, and evidently carried weight with it.

By the way I cannot help observing that I have known persons object to the evil influence of the doctrines of grace who were by no means qualified by their own morality to be judges of the subject. Morals must be in a poor way when immoral persons become their guardians. I have found men pleading against the doctrines of grace on the ground that they did not promote morality, to whom I could have justly replied, "What has morality to do with you, or you with it?" These sticklers for good works are not often the doers of them. Let legalists look to their own hands and tongues, and leave the Gospel of grace and its advocates to answer for themselves.

Looking back in history, I see upon its pages a refutation of the oft-repeated calumny. Who dares to suggest that the men who believed in the grace of God have been sinners above other sinners? With all their faults, those who throw stones at them will be few if they first prove themselves to be their superiors in character. When have they been the patrons of vice, or the defenders of injustice?

Pitch upon the point in English history when this doctrine was very strong in the land ; who were the men that held these doctrines most firmly? Men like Owen, Charnock, Manton, Howe, and I hesitate not to add

OLIVER CROMWELL.

What kind of men were these? Did they pander to the licentiousness of a court? Did they invent a Book of Sports for Sabbath diversion? Did they haunt ale-houses and places of revelry? Every historian will tell you, the greatest fault of these men in the eyes of their enemies was that they were too precise for the generation in which they lived, so that they called them Puritans, and condemned them as holding a gloomy theology.

Sirs, if there was iniquity in the land in that day, it was to be found with the theological party which preached up salvation by works. The gentlemen with their womanish locks and essenced hair, whose speech savored of profanity, were advocates of salvation by works, and all bedabbled with lust they pleaded for human merit ; but the men who believed in grace alone were of another style. They were not in the chambers of rioting and wantonness ; where were they? They might be found on their knees crying to God for help in temptation ; and in persecuting times they might be found in prison, cheerfully suffering the loss of all things for the truth's sake. The Puritans were the godliest men on the face of the earth. Are men so inconsistent as to nickname them for their purity, and yet say that their doctrines lead to sin?

Nor is this a solitary instance—this instance of Puritanism ; all and when it is said that these doctrines will create sin, I appeal to facts, and leave the oracle to answer as it may. If we are ever to see a pure and godly England we must have a gospelized England : if we are to put down drunkenness and the social evil it must be by the proclamation of the grace of God. Men must be forgiven by grace, renewed by grace, transformed by grace, sanctified by grace, preserved by grace ; and when that comes to pass the golden age will dawn ; but while they are merely taught their duty, and left to do it of themselves in their own strength, it is labor in vain. You may flog a dead horse a long while before it will stir ; you need to put life into it, for else all your flogging will fail. The Gospel alone supplies men with motive and strength, and therefore it is to the Gospel that we must look as the real reformer of men.

HISTORY CONFIRMS THE RULE :

I shall fight this morning with the objection before us as I shall find strength. The doctrine of grace, the whole plan of salvation by grace, is most promotive of holiness. Wherever it comes it helps us to say, "God forbid," to the question, "Shall we sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace?" This I would set out in the clear sunlight.

I wish to call your attention to some six or seven points.

I. First, you will see that the gospel of the grace of God promotes real holiness in men by remembering that the salvation which it brings is salvation

FROM THE POWER OF SIN.

When we preach salvation to the vilest of men, some suppose we mean by that a mere deliverance from hell and an entrance into heaven. It includes all that, and results in that, but that is not what we mean. What we mean by salvation is this—deliverance from the love of sin, rescue from the habit of sin, setting free from the desire to sin. Now listen. If it be so, that that boon of deliverance from sin is the gift of divine grace, in what way will that gift, or the free distribution of it, produce sin? I fail to see any such danger.

Suppose the salvation we preach be this : you that have lived ungodly and wicked lives may enjoy your sins, and yet escape the penalty —that would be mischievous indeed ; but if it be this—you that live the most ungodly and wicked lives may yet by believing in the Lord Jesus be enabled to change those lives, so that you shall live unto God instead of serving sin and Satan —what harm can come to the most prudish morals? Why, I say spread such a gospel, and let it circulate through every part of our vast empire, and let all men hear it, whether they rule in the House of Lords or suffer in the house of bondage. Tell them everywhere that God freely and of infinite grace is willing to renew men, and make them new creatures in Christ Jesus. Can any evil consequences come of the freest proclamation of this news? The worse men are, the more gladly would we see them embracing this truth, for they most need it.

II. Secondly, let it not be forgotten as a matter of fact that has been found to possess very great power over men. In the infancy of history nations dream that crime can be put down by severity, and they rely upon fierce punishments ; but experience corrects the error. Our forefathers dreaded forgery, which is a troublesome fraud, and interferes with the confidence which should exist between man and man. To put it down they made forgery a capital offence. Alas for the murders committed by that law! Yet the constant use of the gallows was never sufficient to stamp out the crime. Many offences have been created and multiplied by the penalty which was meant to suppress them. Some offences have almost ceased when the penalty against them has been lightened. It is a notable fact as to men, that if they are forbidden to do a thing they straightway pine to do it, though they had never thought of doing it before. Law commands obedience, but does not promote it ; it often creates disobedience, and an over-weighted penalty has been known to provoke an offence. Law fails, but love wins.

Love in any case makes sin infamous. If one should rob another it would be sufficiently bad ; but suppose a man robbed his friend, who had helped him often when he was in need, every one would say that this crime was most disgraceful. Love brands sin on the forehead with a red hot iron. If a man should kill an enemy, the offence would be grievous ; but if he slew his father, to whom he owes his life, or his mother, on whose breasts he was nursed in infancy, then all would cry out against the monster. In the light of love sin is seen to be exceeding sinful.

Nor is this all. Love has a great constraining power toward the highest form of virtue. Deeds to which a man could not be compelled on the ground of law, men have cheerfully done because of love. Would our brave seamen man the lifeboat to obey an Act of Parliament? No, they would indignantly revolt against being forced to risk their lives ; but they will do it freely to save their fellow-men. Remember that text of the apostle, "Scarcely for a righteous (or merely just) man will one die ; yet peradventure," says he, "for a good (benevolent) man some would even dare to die."

GOODNESS WINS THE HEART, and one is ready to die for the kind and generous.

Kindness also, working by the law of love, has often changed the most unworthy, and therein proved that it is not a factor of evil. We have often heard the story of the soldier who had been degraded to the ranks, and flogged and imprisoned, and yet for all that he would get drunk and misbehave himself. The commanding officer said one day, "I have tried almost everything with this man, and can do nothing with him. I will try one thing more." When he was brought in, the officer addressed him, and said, "You seem incorrigible : we have tried everything with you ; there seems to be no hope of a change in your wicked conduct. I am determined to try if another plan will have any effect. Though you deserve flogging and long imprisonment, I shall freely forgive you." The man was greatly moved by the unexpected and undeserved pardon, and became a good soldier. The story wears truth on its brow ; we all see that it would probably end so.

A DRUNKARD'S DAUGHTER.

That anecdote is such good argument that I will give you another. A drunkard woke up one morning from his drunken sleep, with his clothes on him just as he had rolled down the night before. He saw his only child, his daughter Millie, getting his breakfast. Coming to his senses he said to her, "Millie, why do you stay with me?" She answered, "Because you are my father, and because I love you." He looked at himself, and saw what a sottish, ragged, good-for-nothing creature he was, and he answered her, "Millie, do you really love me?" The child cried, "Yes, father, I do, and I will never leave you, because when mother died she said, 'Millie, stick to your father, and always pray for him, and one of these days he will give up drink, and be a good father to you;' so I will never leave you." Is it wonderful when I add that, as the story has it, Millie's father cast away his drink, and became a Christian man? It would have been more remarkable if he had not. Millie was trying free grace, was she not?

AN UNGRATEFUL COBBLER.

Hear another story: In the old persecuting times there lived in Cheapside one who feared God and attended the secret meetings of the saints; and near him there dwelt a poor cobbler, whose wants were often relieved by the merchant; but the poor man was a cross-grained being, and, most ungratefully, from hope of reward, laid an information against his kind friend on the score of religion. This accusation would have brought the merchant to death by burning if he had not found a means of escape. Returning to his house, the injured man did not change his generous behavior to the malignant cobbler, but, on the contrary, was more liberal than ever. The cobbler was, however, in an ill mood, and avoided the good man with all his might, running away at his approach. One day he was obliged to meet him face to face, and the Christian man asked him gently, "Why do you shun me? I am not your enemy. I know all that you did to injure me, but I never had an angry thought against you. I have helped you, and I am willing to do so as long as I live, only let us be friends." Do you marvel that they clasped hands? Would you wonder if ere long the poor man was found at the Lollards' meeting?

All such anecdotes rest upon the assured fact that grace has a strange subduing power, and leads men to goodness, drawing them with cords of love, and bands of a man. The Lord knows that bad as men are the key of their hearts hangs on the nail of love. He knows that His almighty goodness, though often baffled, will triumph in the end. I believe my point is proved. To myself it is so. However, we must pass on.

III. There is no fear that the doctrine of the grace of God will lead men to sin, because its operations are connected with of the evil of sin. Iniquity is made to be exceeding bitter before it is forgiven or when it is forgiven. When God begins to deal with a man with a view of blotting out his sins and making him His child, He usually causes him to see his evil ways in all their heinousness; He makes him look on sin with fixed eyes, till he cries with David, "My sin is ever before me." By the operations of grace we are made weary of sin; we loathe both it and its imaginary pleasures. We would utterly exterminate it from the soil of our nature. A deep inward experience forbids the child of God to sin; he has known within himself its judgment and its condemnation, and henceforth it is a thing abhorrent to him. An enmity both fierce and endless exists between the chosen seed and the serpent brood of evil; hence the fear that grace will be abused is abundantly safeguarded.

IV. Remember also that not only is the forgiven man thus set against sin by the process of conviction, but every man who tastes of the saving grace of God, is in Christ Jesus. Now if the doctrine of grace in the hands of an ordinary man might be dangerous, yet it would cease to be so in the hands of one who is quickened by the Spirit, and created anew in the image of God. One said the other day, "If I believed that I was eternally saved, I should live in sin." Perhaps you would; but if you were renewed in heart you would not. "But," says one, "if I believed God loved me from before the foundation of the world, and that therefore I should be saved, I would take a full swing of sin." Perhaps you and the devil would; but God's regenerate children are not of so base a nature. To them the abounding grace of the Father is a bond to righteousness which they never think of breaking; they feel the sweet constraints of sacred gratitude, and desire to perfect holiness in the fear of the Lord. A new heart makes all the difference. Given a new nature, and then all the propensities run in a different way, and the blessings of almighty love no longer involve peril, but suggest the loftiest aspirations.

V. One of the chief securities for the holiness of the pardoned is found in the way of

CLEANSING THROUGH ATONEMENT.

The blood of Jesus sanctifies as well as pardons. The sinner learns that his free pardon cost the life of his best Friend; that in order to his salvation the Son of God Himself agonized even to a bloody sweat, and died forsaken of His God. This causes a sacred mourning for sin, as he looks upon the Lord whom he pierced. Love to Jesus burns within the pardoned sinner's breast, for the Lord is his Redeemer; and therefore he feels a burning indignation against the murderous evil of sin. To him all manner of evil is detestable, since it is stained with the Saviour's heart's blood. What! live in the sin which slew Jesus? Find pleasure in that which wrought His death? Trifle with that which laid His glory in the dust? Impossible! Thus you see that the gifts of free grace, when handed down by a pierced hand, are never likely to suggest self-indulgence in sin, but the very reverse.

VI. Sixthly, a man who becomes a partaker of divine grace, and receives the new nature, is ever afterward a partaker of from God's Holy Spirit. God the Holy Ghost deigns to dwell in the bosom of every man whom God has saved by His grace. Is not that a wonderful means of sanctifying? By what process can men be better kept from sin than by having the Holy Spirit Himself to dwell as Vicegerent within their hearts? The Ever-blessed Spirit leads believers to be much in prayer, and what a power for holiness is found in the child of grace speaking to the heavenly Father! He who has most grace is most conscious of his need of more grace. The gracious are often afraid to put one foot before another for fear of doing wrong. Have you not felt this holy fear, this sacred caution? It is by this means that the Holy Spirit prevents your ever turning your Christian liberty into licentiousness, or daring to make the grace of God an argument for folly.

VII. The entire

who is made a partaker of the grace of God is also a special preservative against sin. I venture to say, though it may be controverted, that the man who believes the glorious doctrines of grace is usually a much higher style of man than the person who has no opinion upon the matter. It is a hopeful sign when minds begin to roam among lofty truths. The man who has been taught of God to think will not so readily sin as the being whose mind is buried beneath his flesh. The man has now obtained a different view of himself from that which led him to trifle away his time with the idea that there was nothing better for him than to be merry while he could. He says, "I am one of God's chosen, ordained to be His son, His heir, joint-heir with Jesus Christ. I am set apart to be a king and priest unto God, and as such I cannot be godless, nor live for the common objects of life." He rises in the object of his pursuit; he cannot henceforth live unto himself, for he is not his own, he is bought with a price.

Is there a sinner here, a guilty sinner, one who has no merit, no claim to mercy whatever; is there one willing to be saved by God's free grace through believing in Jesus Christ? Then let me tell thee, sinner, there is not a word in God's Book against thee, not a line or syllable, but everything is in thy favor. "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners," even the chief. Jesus came into the world to save thee. Only do thou trust Him, and rest in Him. I will tell thee what ought to fetch thee to Christ at once, it is the thought of His amazing love.

A PROFLIGATE SON

had been a great grief to his father; he had robbed him and disgraced him, and at last he ended by bringing his gray hairs with sorrow to the grave. He was a horrible wretch of a son; no one could have been more graceless. However, he attended his father's funeral, and he stayed to hear the will read; perhaps it was the chief reason why he was there. He had fully made up his mind that his father would cut him off with a shilling, and he meant to make it very unpleasant for the rest of the family. To his great astonishment, as the will was read it ran something like this: "As for my son Richard, though he has fearfully wasted my substance, and though he has often grieved my heart, I would have him know that I consider him still to be my own dear child, and therefore, in token of my undying love, I leave him the same share as the rest of his brothers." He left the room; he could not stand it, the surprising love of his father had mastered him.

He came down to the executor the next morning, and said, "You surely did not read correctly?" "Yes I did; there it stands." "Then," he said, "I feel ready to curse myself that I ever grieved my dear old father. Oh, that I could fetch him back again!" Love was born in that base heart by an unexpected display of love. May not your case be similar? Our Lord Jesus Christ is dead, but He has left it in His will that the chief of sinners are objects of His choicest mercy. Dying He prayed, "Father, forgive them." Risen He pleads for transgressors. Sinners are ever on His mind; their salvation is His great object. His blood is for them, His heart for them, His righteousness for them, His heaven for them. Come, O ye guilty ones, and receive your legacy. Put out the hand of faith and grasp your portion. Trust Jesus with your souls, and He will save you. God bless you. Amen.

DR. MOFFAT'S TWO MARVELLOUS ESCAPES.

SINCE the death of Dr. Moffat, whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 23d, numerous anecdotes have been related of him by personal friends and officers of the Missionary Societies. Two of these, which are of thrilling interest, are depicted on the next page.

A SAVAGE CHIEF.

The early trials of the little band of Christian pioneers in Kuruman were increased by a long drought, for which they were blamed and cursed. It was said that their chapel-bell frightened away the clouds; and even Mr. Moffat's black beard was imagined to have something to do with the unkindliness of the heavens. The feeling, indeed, fomented and intensified by the professional "rain makers," became so stormy against the missionaries, that they were informed they would be driven out of the country if they did not speedily take themselves away. The chief who conveyed this message stood at their cottage door, quivering a spear in his right hand in an imposing manner, delivering the decision which had been arrived at in a secret council; while Mrs. Moffat stood calmly with a babe in her arms watching the crisis, for such undoubtedly it was.

As fearlessly as David before Goliath and the Philistines, strong, too, like him, in the Divine power on which he threw himself and his cause, with a steadfast, unflinching gaze the missionary looked the spear-bearing chief straight in the eyes, and said with the utmost deliberation: "We were unwilling to leave you. We are now resolved to stay at our post. As for your threats, we pity you, for you know not what you do. We have suffered, it is true; it is no more than we are prepared to expect from whose who know no better. If resolved to get rid of us, you must take stronger measures to succeed, for our hearts are with you. You may shed my blood, or you may burn our dwelling; but I know that you will not touch my wife and children; and you will surely reverence the gray head of my venerable friend (pointing to Mr. Hamilton). As for me, my decision is made, I do not leave your country." Then, throwing open his waistcoat, he stood erect and fearless. "Now, then," he added, "if you will, drive your spears to my heart; and, when you have slain me, my companions will know that the hour is come for them to depart." "These men," said the chief to his twelve armed attendants, "must have ten lives. When they are so fearless of death, there must be something in immortality," and he departed to tell those whom he represented of the missionary's intrepidity.

A TIGER AND A COBRA.

In one of his early journeys in Africa, Mr. Moffat had a providential escape from a tiger and a serpent. He had left the wagons and wandered to a distance among grassy openings in quest of game. He had a small gun on his shoulder, which was loaded with small shot; an antelope passed, at which he fired, and slowly followed the course it took.

After advancing a short distance he saw a tiger staring at him between the forked branches of a tree, behind which his long spotted body was concealed, twisting and turning his tail like a cat just going to spring on its prey. It was a critical moment, for the missionary had no ball in his gun. He, therefore, moved about as if in search of something on the grass, taking care to retreat at the same time.

After getting, as he thought, a suitable distance to turn his back, he moved somewhat more quickly, but in his anxiety to escape what was behind, he did not see what was before, until startled by treading on a large cobra serpent asleep in the grass. It instantly twirled its body round his leg, when he leaped from the spot, dragging the venomous and enraged reptile after him; and while the reptile was in the act of throwing itself into a coil preparatory to striking, Mr. Moffat, without turning round, drew his gun to his shoulder and shot it. Seizing its tail, he took it to his people at the wagons, who, on examining the bags of poison, asserted that had the creature struck him he could never have reached the wagons. The serpent was six feet long.

These narrow escapes from death were only two out of many which the devoted missionary had in the course of more than half a century of labor for God in Africa. But though dangers were thick on every hand, he went calmly on with his work unmoved. In perils from wild beasts and still more savage men, discouraged by the apathy of those who should have aided him, he worked with a single eye to God's glory and the salvation of perishing souls. The spiritual darkness around him filled his heart with longing to let in the Light of the World. God kept him safely until his work was done.

A REMARKABLE FAITH CURE.

Miss Carrie F. Judd, of Buffalo, N. Y., publishes in her Triumphs of Faith, an interesting letter from Mary L. Helms, dated Norfolk, N. Y., June 14th, 1883, in the course of which she describes her restoration to health as follows:

"For years I have been a great sufferer, caused by an inflamed stomach, which, finally, after I had tried a number of physicians and a great variety of medicine to no purpose, settled into a form of chronic inflammation. For years I have suffered thus, and it has been a wonder to my friends and physicians and to myself that I could endure such suffering. For years my only relief was in taking morphine, but never to have the habit confirmed; then tried the homœopathic treatment. At times I would rally and God seemed to give me strength for special duties.

"Last autumn my complaint assumed a new form, and, to all human appearance, my work was done. Indeed, I desired it should be; I thought I would rather go and be with Jesus. The usual remedies were used, but to no purpose. My convictions were strong that in God alone was my help. I did not ask to be cured; I thought I did not desire it. I only asked that the terrible suffering might be stayed. I was relieved, and, much to the surprise of all, I began to gain, but I could not say it was Jesus alone that had raised me; I did not give God the glory for what He had done.

"God laid His hand on me again, and my sickness returned with more than its former severity. I recognized the kind hand of my heavenly Father in this stroke. I saw more than ever the necessity of a clean heart—a full consecration to God of all my powers of soul and body. I did not even now ask to be healed, I only prayed that I might be wholly the Lord's. For two weeks I wept and prayed. My kind heavenly Father gave me strength to read. I read His Word and everything my strength would allow that would give me light. The experience of others gave me new strength. My Blessed Jesus seemed standing at my bedside, talking like some dear friend, and with each promise would say, 'It is yours, only believe;' all the while showing me one idol after another and saying, as to Peter, 'Lovest thou Me more than these?' until my heart seemed truly like a nest of unclean birds. Jesus said to me, 'This cometh out only by prayer and fasting,' and so for several days I fasted and prayed.

"On Friday morning, March 31st, while reading the 32d Psalm, I felt that through faith in Jesus I could claim these promises as my own, and Jesus seemed to say, 'Whether is it easier to say, Thy sins are forgiven thee, or, Arise and walk?' Great light and peace filled my soul, and, with this peace, bodily health returned. I seemed to move as by magic and breathe an atmosphere of love. I felt as though I wanted to tell the world what great things God had done for me. I am still rejoicing in His blessed presence, living by faith in the Son of God, rejoicing in Jesus as my Saviour and Physician, for, surely, Himself 'took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses.'"

A MOTHER'S HOPES FRUSTRATED.

(See Illustration.)

Two ladies, mother and daughter, were in a handsomely-furnished room in a brown-stone house in a fashionable locality. They were moving restlessly about, as if reluctant to sit down to the breakfast which had been placed on the table. Now and again one of them would go to the window and look out as if in expectation of some one whose coming had been delayed. Presently a firm, vigorous step was heard on the pavement, and there was a ring at the bell. In a few minutes the door opened and a stalwart young man of some two and twenty years entered.

"Frank, what can have detained you so?" asked the elder of the two ladies. "Alice and I have been waiting for you nearly an hour."

There was an unwonted pallor on the young man's face and a gravity in his manner that was not habitual with him, which both ladies noticed. He leaned heavily on the table as he answered in solemn tones: "Mother, Ernest is dead. I have just come from his bedside. I called last night to inquire how he was, and found that he was in extreme danger. He begged that I would see him if I called, and I went up and I remained with him all night. He died only half an hour ago."

"Poor fellow," said Alice; "how very sad. Such a promising young man and so wealthy, too. It must be a terrible blow to his father. All his hopes were centred in his heir."

"Yes," said Frank Belton, "and they are shattered now. The poor man is almost beside himself with grief, and I think the mother is worse still. She is a good Christian woman, but it will take some time to reconcile her to this loss."

"I do not doubt that," said Mrs. Belton, looking fondly at the speaker, the thought evidently crossing her mind of what her own feelings would be if she were to lose her son. "I can sympathize with her sincerely, though I knew little of him. It is a melancholy end to so much anticipation; but I should not be surprised if his death improved your prospects, Frank. I know it appears selfish to say so, but it is not really selfish, for I wish with all my heart the young man had lived. It is of no use wishing in such matters, and it does seem likely that his father's firm will offer you a partnership instead of a salary now."

Mrs. Belton's Hopes Frustrated.

"Ah, mother," Frank answered, "you are always anxious on my account, but I am afraid you will be disappointed. Mr. Meritt will offer me the partnership, I believe; indeed, I do not see how they can manage without some active young man in the firm, but I shall not accept it. I shall never be a lawyer now."

"Not accept it! Never be a lawyer!" repeated Mrs. Belton, rising in astonishment and clasping her hands to keep down her excitement. "What can you mean, Frank?"

"Simply, mother, that grand as the profession is, I cannot follow it. I must preach the Gospel. It is my duty, and I dare not trifle with my conscience. I never saw it clearly until now."

Mrs. Belton stood aghast. She was speechless for a moment, and stood looking reproachfully at her son. At last she said: "Frank, have you lost your senses? Do you mean that you will give up voluntarily a prospect that does not come to one man in a thousand? With your talents and such a position at your age there is no office beyond your reach. You might sit in the Senate yet or even become President before you die. Do you know what you are giving up to be a clergyman, with perhaps not three thousand dollars a year for a salary, and that precarious?"

"Yes, mother," he said, "I have counted the cost. I had a long talk with Ernest last night. You know we have been very intimate friends, almost like brothers, and have often talked together of our brilliant future, though not so much lately, since we knew what religion really meant. But last night Ernest wanted to see me principally on that matter. He wanted to tell me that, standing, as he did, on the brink of the grave, the brilliant career we had sketched together had lost all its roseate hue. He said he could see nothing satisfactory in it at all, and should not follow it if he were to recover. He begged me with his dying breath to give my life wholly to God's service, and, mother, with God's help I will do it."

"Frank, you astonish me," Mrs. Belton said; "I thought you had too much manliness to act on the impulse of a moment. This feeling will pass away, and then you will regret this insane step."

"No, mother, never, God helping me. It is not the impulse of a moment; I have often meditated this course. Ernest's appeal only confirms me."

His sister Alice had sat looking at Frank anxiously while this dialogue was going on; she now rose, and throwing her arms around his neck kissed him, and told him she would ever pray that God would give him strength to keep his resolution. "You are right, Frank," she said; "it is a far nobler thing you do than anything else you could have done. May God bless you."

The worldly mother, thus deserted by the only ally who could have influenced her son, sat down in despair, weeping tears of disappointment. But the time came when she too rejoiced in Frank's decision, and was content when she saw him a useful and successful minister of the Gospel, even though she knew his name would never become famous nor his wealth and station in society attain the eminence she had hoped for.

MRS. CHANTREY'S SECRET.

A SERIAL STORY.

In Despair.

IT was early in June when they set sail; and as the vessel floated down the Channel somewhat slowly against the western wind, Ann Holland spent most of her time on deck, watching, often with dim eyes, the coasts of England, as they glided past her. She could still hardly realize the change that had torn her so completely away from her old life. It made her brain swim to think of Upton, and the old neighbors going about the streets on their daily business, and the church-clock striking out the hours; and the sun rising and setting, and the days passing by, and she not there. It felt all a dream to her; an odd, inexplicable, endless dream, which never could become as real as the old days had been. Her thoughts were all busy with the past, recalling faces and events long ago forgotten; she scarcely ever looked on to the end of the voyage. The sea was calm, and the soft wind sang low among the rigging, while point after point along the shores stole by, and were lost to sight almost unheeded, though she could not turn her steadfast, sorrowful gaze from them till she could see them no more. Yet when Mr. Chantrey, reproaching himself for bringing her, asked her if she repented, she was always ready to say heartily that she would not go back, and leave them, for the world.

Charlie alone of them all was quite happy in the change. For the last nine months he had been constantly at school; seldom going home, and then but for a day or two, when his mother was at her best. The boy found himself all at once set free from school restraints, restored to his father and mother, who had no one else to interest them; and with all the delights of a ship and a voyage added to his other joys. He was wild with happiness. There was not one thing left him to wish for; for even his mother's nervous state of health could not cast any gloom upon his gladness. He had grown accustomed to think of her as a confirmed invalid; and when she came on deck he would sit quietly beside her for a little while, and lower his clear young voice in speaking to her, without feeling that his short-lived self-control damped his pleasure. But she was not often there long enough to test his devotion too greatly.

Sophy Chantrey was passing through a season of intense misery, both of mind and body; more bitter even than the wretchedness she had felt when she could indulge the craving that had taken so deep a hold upon her. There was nothing voluntary in her abstinence, and consequently neither pleasure nor pride in being able to exercise self-command. Her health was greatly enfeebled; and her mind had been weakened almost to childishness. She felt as if her husband was treating her cruelly; yet she could see keenly that it was she who had brought ruin upon his future prospects, as well as those of her boy. She had never been able to sink into utter indifference; and she could not forget, strive as she would, all the happy past, and the unutterably wretched present.

Here, on board ship, there was no chance for her to procure the narcotics, with which she had lulled her self-reproaches formerly. Her longing for such stimulants amounted almost to delirium. She could not sleep for want of them; and all day long she thought of them, and cried for them, until her husband and Ann Holland could scarcely persevere in refusing them to her. It seemed to them at times as if she must lose her reason, the little that remained to her, and become insane, unless they yielded to her vehement entreaties. Even when, after the first week was gone, and the craving was in some measure deadened, her spirits did not rally. She would lie still on deck when her husband carried her there, or on the narrow berth in their cabin, with eyes closed, and hands listlessly folded, an image of despair.

"Sophy!" he cried one day, when she had not stirred, or raised her eyelids for hours; "Sophy, do you wish to kill me?"

"I have killed you," she muttered, still without moving, or looking at him.

"Sophy," he answered, "you are dreaming. Look up, and see me here alive, beside you. Life lies before us yet; for you and me together."

"No," she said, "don't I know it is death to you to be tied to me as you are? I am a curse to you, and you hate and loathe me, as I do myself. But we cannot get rid of each other, you and I. Oh, if I could but die, and set you free!"

"I do not hate you," he answered, tenderly; "you are still very dear to me. I do not wish to be free from you."

"Then you ought," she cried, with sudden passion; "you ought to hate that which degrades and shames you. I am dragging you down to ruin; you and Charlie. Do you think I do not know it? Oh, if I could but die. Perhaps I may live for many, many years yet; live to be an old woman, a drunken old wretch! Think what it will be to live for years and years with a lost creature like me. It is death, and worse than death, for you."

"But why should you be lost?" he asked; "have you never thought of One who came to seek and to save that which is lost?"

"Yes; He found me once," she said, in tones of despair, "He found me once; but I strayed away again, wilfully, in spite of His love, and all He had done for me. I knew what He had done, and how He loved me; yet I went away from Him wilfully. I chose ruin; and now He leaves me to my choice."

"This is the delusion of a sick brain," he answered; "you have no power to think rightly of our Lord. Listen to what I can tell you about Him, and His love for you."

"No," she interrupted; "none of you others know, you people who have never fallen like me. You do not know what it is to feel yourselves given up, and sold to sin. You and Ann Holland think you can save me by keeping temptation out of my way; but I know that as soon as it comes again I shall be as weak as water against it."

"Have you no wish to be saved, then?" he asked, his heart sinking within in him at her hopeless words.

"Wish to be saved!" she repeated; "did the rich man in torments wish to be saved? He only asked for one drop of water to cool his tongue but for a moment. He knew he could not be saved, and he did not pray for it."

"Do you think that I have no wish for your salvation?" he asked. "Am I leaving you in your sin? Have I done nothing, given up nothing, to secure it? Has Ann Holland given up nothing?"

"Oh, you have," she cried. "You are doing all you can for me, but it is useless."

"Christ has done more," he said. "His love for you passes ours infinitely. Then if you have not wearied out ours, can you possibly exhaust His? He can stoop to you in all your misery and sinfulness, if you will but stretch out your hand toward Him. There is no sin He will not forgive, and none He cannot conquer, if you will but rouse yourself to work with Him. Against your own will He cannot save you."

"I will try," she murmured.

Yet time after time the same subject, almost in the same words, was renewed. Sophy's enfeebled brain could not long retain the thought of a divine love and power, which was ceaselessly though secretly striving to reclaim her. There was no opportunity for her to exert her own will, for she could not be tempted in her present circumstances, and the strength gained by such an exertion was impossible to her. Again and again, with untiring patience, did Mr. Chantrey give ear to her despairing utterances, and meet them with soothing arguments. But often he felt himself on the verge of despair, doubtful of the truths he was trying so earnestly to implant again in her heart. In the smooth happy days of old, both of them had believed them. But now he asked himself, Does God indeed care? Does He see and know? Is He near at hand, and not afar off?

Their vessel had entered the tropical seas, and a profound unbroken monotony reigned around them. They had not sighted land since the shores of England had sunk below the horizon. A waste of waters encircled them, and a dead calm prevailed. Through the sultry and hazy atmosphere no rain fell in cooling showers. Day after day the sea was of perfect stillness, and an oppressive silence, as of death, brooded over the low, regular heaving of the waters. The dry, torrid heat was exhausting, and the ship with its idle sails made but little way across the quiet sea. Mr. Chantrey's weakened frame suffered greatly, and even Ann Holland's brave and cheery spirit almost sank into despondency.

"If it hadn't been for Mrs. Chantrey," she thought mournfully, "we should all have been at Upton now, as happy as the day's long. The summer's at its height there, and the harvest is being gathered in. How cool it would be under the chestnut-trees, or under the church walls! Mr. Chantrey's sinking, plain enough, and what is to become of us if he should die before we get to that foreign land? Dear, dear! Whoever would go to sea if they could get only a place to lay their heads on land?"

It was a dreary and monotonous time. After the sun had gone down, red and sullen, through the haze, and when the ship left a long track of phosphorescent light sparkling behind it, Mr. Chantrey would pace up and down the deck, as he had often walked to and fro in the churchyard paths in the starlight. He had many things to think of. For his wife his hope was strengthening; a dim star shone before him in the future. Her brain was gradually regaining clearness, and her mind strength. Something of the old buoyancy and elasticity was returning to her, for she would play sometimes with her child merrily, and her laugh was like music to him. But how would it be in the hour of temptation, which must come? She said her craving for stimulants was passing away; but how would she bear being again able to procure them? He would watch over her and guard her as long as he lived, but what would become of her if he should die?

This last question was becoming every day more and more urgent. The exhausting, oppressive heat and the protracted voyage were sapping his strength, and he knew it. The fresh sweet sea-breezes on which he had reckoned had failed him, and he was consciously nearer death than when he left England. He longed eagerly for life and health, that he might see his wife and child in happier circumstances before he died. To leave them thus seemed intolerable to him. What was he to do with his boy? He could not leave him in the care of a mother not yet delivered from the bondage of such a fatal sin. Yet to separate him harshly from her would almost certainly doom her to continue in it. If life might be spared to him only a few years longer, he would probably see her once more a fitting guardian for their child. The growing hope for her, the dim dread for himself—these two held alternate sway over him as he paced to and fro under the southern skies.

Captain Scott, his friend, urged upon him that there was one remedy open to him, and only one on board the ship. The long stress and strain upon his physical as well as his mental health had weakened him until his strength was slowly ebbing away; his heart beat feebly, and his whole system had fallen under a nervous depression. Now was the time when, as a medicine, the alcohol, which was poison and death to his wife, would prove restoration to him. Could he but keep up his vital powers until the voyage was ended, all would be well with him. His life might be prolonged for those few years he so ardently desired. He could still watch over his wife, and protect his child during boyhood, and die in peace—young perhaps, but having accomplished what he had set his mind upon. But Sophy? How could she bear this unexpected temptation? He did not suppose he could effectually conceal it from her, for of late she had clung to him like a child, following him about humbly and meekly, with a touching dependence upon him, striving to catch his eye and to smile faintly when he looked at her, as a child might do who was seeking to win forgiveness. She was very feeble and delicate still, her appetite was as dainty as his own, and the heat oppressed her almost as much as himself. Yet that which might save him would certainly destroy her.

Day after day the debate with Captain Scott was resumed. But there was no real debate in his own mind. He would gladly take the remedy if he could do so with safety to his wife, but not for a thousand lives would he endanger her soul. Not for the certainty of prolonging his own years would he take from her the merest chance of overcoming her sin. To do it for an uncertainty was impossible.

There was hope for him still, if the vessel could but get past these sultry seas into a cooler climate. One good fresh sea-breeze would do him more good than any stimulant, and they were slowly gliding to latitudes where they might meet them at any hour. Once out of the tropics, and around the Cape of Good Hope, there would be no fear of exhausting heat in the air they breathed. All his languor would be gone and the rest of the voyage would bring health and vigor to his fevered frame. Only let them double the Cape, and a new life in a new world lay before them.

His brain felt confused and delirious at times, but he knew it so well that he grew used to sit down silently in the bow of the ship, and let the dizzy dreams pass over him, careful not to alarm his wife or Ann Holland. Cool visions of the pleasant English home he had quitted forever; the shadows and the calm of his church, where the sunshine slanted in through narrow windows made green with ivy-leaves; the rustling of leaves in the elm-trees on his lawn in the soft low wind of a summer's evening; the deep grassy glades of thick woods, where he had loved to walk; the murmuring and tinkling of hidden brooks—all these flitted across his clouded mind as he sat speechless, with his throbbing head resting upon his hands. Often his wife crouched beside him, herself silent, thinking sadly how he was brooding over all the wrong and injury she had done him, yet fearing in her humiliation to ask him if it were so. Her repentance was very deep and real, her love for him very true. Yet she dreaded the hour when she must face temptation again. She could not even bear to think of it.

But shortly after they had passed the southern tropic, as they neared the Cape, the climate changed suddenly, with so swift an alteration that from sultry heat of a torrid summer they plunged almost directly into the biting cold of winter. As they doubled the Cape a strong north-west gale met them, with icy cold in its blast. The ropes were frozen, and the sails grew stiff with hoar-frost. Rough seas rolled about them, tossing the vessel like a toy upon their waves. The change was too sudden and too great. All the passengers were ill, and David Chantrey lay down in his low, narrow berth, knowing well that no hope was left to him.

THE CHILD SAMUEL.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 23, 1 Sam. 3. Golden Text, ver. 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Samuel's Youthful Ministry—Not in Contact with God—A Common Parental Mistake—Why the Days were Without a Vision—God's View of Eli's Sin—Heinous Sins of Ministers—God's Awful Silence—The Call of the Lord—A Docile Listener—His Knowledge of the Lord—The Terrible Revelation—Eli's Submission—According to Law not Grace—The Great Need of the Time.

HANNAH'S gift of her son to the Lord was accepted. Samuel was a Levite (1 Chron. 6 : 33-35), and although according to the order, the Levites did not commence their ministry until they were from twenty to thirty years of age (Num. 4 : 23, 30, 35, 39, 43, 47 ; 8 : 24 ; 1 Chron. 23 : 3, 27), yet "Samuel ministered before the Lord, girded with a linen ephod." It is evident that he was very young when his ministry began, for "his mother made him a little coat, and brought it to him from year to year, when she came up with her husband to offer the yearly sacrifice" (Ch. 2 : 13, 19). It was evidently a thing out of the common order that one so young should be permitted to minister, but Eli recognized it as the Lord's will, and blessed Elkanah and his wife for "the loan which is lent unto the Lord." So it was that "the child Samuel ministered unto the Lord before Eli." Whatever Eli directed, Samuel was ready to do, but it was to please Eli, for "Samuel did not yet know the Lord."

BEING A CHILD

It is not unusual for parents to be much mistaken about the spiritual state of their children. Some children have naturally a kind of religious tendency, obey easily, have very few fits of naughtiness, love prayer and hymns, and naturally take up religious language from those who surround them ; yet many of such children do not yet "know the Lord," there has been no real coming in contact with God. There are others whose natural disposition is just the reverse : self-willed, inclined to question and oppose, contradictory, having no natural reverence, no one dreams of counting such as these to be converted children, until some very real change does take place. Yet it sometimes happens that these latter children have more real understanding of their own hearts, and more real acquaintance with God, than those who are naturally more docile. Samuel's unblamable life as a child was no proof that he knew the Lord, and his ministry was before Eli, not yet before the Lord.

"And the word of the Lord was precious [or scarce] in those days, there was no open vision." The history of the previous chapter accounts for this. The sons of Eli, who seems to have been both judge and priest, were "sons of Belial, they knew not the Lord" (Ch. 2 : 12), and their life was so scandalous that "men abhorred the offering of the Lord." The Lord had sent "a man of God" to warn Eli, and show him that he was responsible for the sin of his sons. True, Eli had reproved them, but only with weak words ; he had still permitted them to exercise their office, and bring the most terrible reproach upon the Lord through their life of sin. God sees sin far otherwise than we do : it must have been an awful moment for Eli when the messenger of God said to him, "Wherefore kick ye at My sacrifice and at Mine offering, which I have commended in My habitation ; and honorest to make yourselves fat with the chiefest of all the offerings of Israel My people?" Much as Eli had grieved over the sin of his sons, he had probably not recognized that he was honoring these licentious young men above the holy God whom they dishonored, yet such was his sin before God. When those who are in the ministry are unholy in their lives, worldly, selfish, money-loving, slaves of position, of pleasure, etc., God counts this sin honoring themselves or their children above Him. To be permitted to serve God is the greatest honor which can be bestowed upon man ; if such service does not absorb all else, if it is not in itself enough of position, of honor, of pleasure, then it is clear that whatever else divides the heart is honored above God.

Thank God, it is not often we hear now of inebriate ministers of the Gospel, or of immorality in connection with the ministry. But oh, how often we hear of worldliness, of fashion, of evil temper, of pride, of debt among ministers as well as others. No wonder, then, that the Word of God is precious, no wonder that there is generally so great a lack of power. The writer of Ps. 74 says (ver. 9.) : "We see not our signs : there is no more any prophet : neither is there any among us that knoweth how long." No punishment, no trial can be greater to a child than the refusal of his father to speak to him ; and this was the position at this time in Israel. There are some, even believers, who do not seem conscious of this lack ; they seem to get on very well having only second-hand transactions with God ; and yet when it comes to the point, one finds them in a great uncertainty about the will of God, and knowing little of the strong confidence of those who walk in the light of His countenance.

Without doubt Eli had known precious communion with God, but now God spoke no more directly to him. But He had declared to him that He would raise up a faithful priest, that should do according to that which was in His heart and in His mind (Ch. 2 : 35). Did it ever strike Eli that the boy Samuel was the chosen of God? We are told "Samuel grew before the Lord," and again "the child Samuel grew on, and was in favor both with the Lord and also with men."

What was his age at the time when it is difficult to ascertain, but that he had not done growing is sure. It was far gone into the night ; the night lamp was still burning, when the Lord called, "Samuel." The boy, knowing no one else was at hand, "ran to Eli, and said, Here am I ; for thou calledst me. And he said, I called not ; lie down again." Had Samuel been like many children, very deficient in obedience, he would not have moved at the first call ; and when Eli said, "I called not," he would have argued the point, and insisted, "But I am sure you did call." Yet all Samuel's docility and obedience was no proof that he knew the Lord ; Samuel knew what it was to pray to God, but as yet he had never known a distinct communication from God to him. He lay down, but a second time the same voice called him, and a second time he went to Eli, and yet a third time, and then only it was that "Eli perceived that the Lord had called the child." Oh, it must have been hard for the old man, once God's chosen messenger, to know that a mere boy was now chosen before himself to receive communications from Israel's God, and that because of his own unfaithfulness! But he directed Samuel, "Go, lie down ; and it shall be, if He call thee, that thou shalt say, Speak, Lord ; for thy servant heareth."

Samuel went and lay down ; but we may well believe there was not much sleep for him ; he must have been overwhelmed with the deep condescension of the great God of the universe, that He should make known His thoughts to a growing lad only half educated, such as he! But this is ever God's way. He hides these things from the wise and prudent, and reveals them unto babes (Matt. 11 : 25). God needs not our wisdom ; for the foolishness of God is wiser than men (1 Cor. 1 : 25). "If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise" (1 Cor. 3 : 18). "Except ye be converted, and become as little children (simpler, smaller, more completely nothing), ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 18 : 3). God cannot mix His wisdom with ours, man must fall back when God comes on the scene ; thus a child is more fit to receive His thoughts than a man who has thoughts of his own to lay aside.

"The Lord came, and stood, and called as at other times, Samuel, Samuel. Then Samuel answered," oh, how differently now that he had really heard the voice of God, "Speak, for thy servant heareth." "My sheep hear My voice," they do not only pray, but they hear God speak. Samuel now

"KNEW THE LORD."

His great joy, however, in thus holding real intercourse with God, must have been somewhat tempered by the communication made him by the Lord about Eli's sin and God's judgment upon his house. It must be now with Samuel a choice between the Lord and Eli. Whenever a young believer first knows a real interchange of thought with God, there is always a call for separation. It may be from the world, or it may be, as with Samuel, a call to some obedience to the Lord, which may seem likely to separate us from those whom we most esteem in the Lord. It is not improbable that the conduct of Hophni and Phinehas had been a burden on the heart of the young priest, but his loyalty to Eli, who had been till now his one tie to the Lord, and who had always represented the mind of God to his natural mind, this must have silenced Samuel's thoughts on the subject. And now was made to him by God Himself, that Eli was not all which he had imagined, and Samuel must be weaned from Eli to follow God only.

THE TERRIBLE REVELATION

The hours must have passed slowly until the morning broke. He must meet Eli ; he "opened the doors of the house of the Lord :" but he "feared to show Eli the vision." God always makes the way for His children to be true and loyal to Him : "Eli called Samuel, and said, Samuel, my son, . . . What is the thing which the Lord hath said unto thee? I pray thee hide it not from me ; God do so to thee, and more also, if thou hide anything from me of all the things that He said unto thee. And Samuel told him every whit, and hid nothing from him. And he said, It is the Lord ; let Him do what seemeth Him good." It was the law ; and the law knows no mercy. Blessed be God, in grace there is provision which the law knows not. Alas! unfaithful parents, parents which have not restrained their children, are not peculiar to the days of Eli and Samuel ; "disobedience to parents," which is a sign of the last days (II Tim. 3 : 2), is terribly prevalent among us, and that in all so-called Christian lands. But where a parent knows and owns his fault and puts himself and his children into the hands of God, there is both power and will in Him to bring order out of confusion, and to conform both parents and children to Himself.

After the revelation of the Lord to Samuel, he still "grew," but not only physically, for "the Lord was with him," he was now in communion with God, and He "did let none of His words fall to the ground." God could not find a grown man or woman in all Israel little enough in their own eyes to be channels of His thoughts to the people, He must needs choose this boy. And all the people were conscious of it ; for "all Israel from Dan even to Beersheba knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord. And the Lord appeared again in Shiloh ; for the Lord revealed Himself to Samuel in Shiloh by the word of the Lord." What is the great need of the church in the present day? A child-like, self-empty spirit, a spirit too much occupied with the Lord to criticise other Christians, the want of this keeps back the power of Pentecost. Lord, revive among us the child-spirit and the child-faith which may not hinder thee. Amen.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

China and France Still Confront Each Other in menacing attitude. China is pushing forward preparations for war with extraordinary vigor. All the garrisons are being reinforced, the fortresses strengthened, and the camp on the Tonquin frontier massed in effective position. She has now twenty thousand troops all armed with the best European weapons ready for action in that camp and sixty formidable vessels in Tonquin waters. Meanwhile the Marquis Tseng, the Chinese minister is negotiating with the French Secretary of State with the object of effecting a pacific settlement. The Chinese government has sent imperative instructions to Marquis Tseng to demand the withdrawal of the treaty which France effected with Tonquin, and this demand has been met with a firm refusal. France, however, offers China guarantees for the integrity of her frontier. The greatest uncertainty exists in Europe as to the probable course of events. Some observers declare that war is inevitable, while others hope that it may yet be averted. England is strenuously exerting herself to maintain peace. If war should break out she would almost certainly be involved. The London Daily News states that it has reason to believe that the Marquis Tseng clings as strongly as ever to the hope of European arbitration between China and France, in view of the enormous preponderance of the trade of England, Germany and even of America over that of France in the East. It is thought that the cabinets of the neutral Powers would be fully justified in offering their friendly services to France and China.

The Funeral of the Count de Chambord, on September 3d, was an imposing ceremony. All the inhabitants of Frohsdorf attended; there were several princely mourners; and five thousand French royalists, French deputations, bearing banners and wreaths, and workmen's delegates from Paris, Lyons and Brittany brought up the rear. The route of the procession was lined with infantry. Fifty thousand foreigners are said to have been present to witness the obsequies. The Count de Paris, whom the deceased pretender recognized as his heir, did not attend the funeral, and his absence, and the cause of it, have disturbed the harmony which was believed to have been established in the rival royalist camps. The Countess de Chambord, who appears to have been a very suitable wife to Henri V., refused to allow the Count de Paris to occupy the place of chief mourner at the funeral. He, as the acknowledged head of the House of Bourbon, could not consistently occupy a lower place, so did not attend at all. The Orleanists bitterly resent the action of the countess, while she, disregarding the arrangement her deceased husband made with the Count de Paris, proudly refuses to admit to her presence "the representatives of a royalty proceeding from revolution."

Ivan Tourgenieff, the Famous Russian Novelist, is dead. He died at Bougeval, in France, on September 3d, after a long illness. He was sixty-five years of age. To him more than to any other man Russia owes what progress she has made during the past quarter of a century. He was a man of remarkable literary ability, and being profoundly moved by the miseries of the poorer classes of his countrymen he set himself to the task of making their condition known. Considering the best means for the purpose he wrote a series of novels depicting the life of the serf and the poor farmer as he had witnessed it. His word-pictures were pathetic and thrilling, and were widely read. They were a revelation to Russia and to Europe. Until they appeared no one in Europe knew anything of Russian peasant life, and even the Russian statesmen were densely ignorant as to the actual condition of the poor. Tourgenieff's novels found their way into the castles of the nobles and even into the imperial palace. There they were read by the Czarewitch, afterward Alexander II., who was deeply moved by the stories, and was drawn into sympathy with the serfs. He caused inquiries to be made which confirmed Tourgenieff's statements, and on succeeding to the throne he commenced the series of measures which ultimately issued in the emancipation of the serfs. Tourgenieff's plain speaking eventually brought upon him the wrath of the emperor, who banished him, and he died in exile.

An Insult to the King of Italy has been Given by M. Rochefort, the French journalist. In an article published in his journal, the Intransigeant, he accused the king of having pocketed the money subscribed by the French people for the Ischia sufferers, while he was at the same time urging Germany to annihilate France. An Italian officer waited upon M. Rochefort and demanded satisfaction for the insult to his king, but M. Rochefort refused to grant him a hostile meeting. At a meeting of a committee of the Ischia survivors, held in Naples on September 7th, a resolution was adopted declaring that they would refuse all proffers of aid, on the ground that when charity is offered them in order to serve as a pretext for insulting their king they feel that it is their duty to reject such charity, not only from France, but from the whole world.

The Volcanic Eruption in Java, on August 26th, has involved a loss of life not easily computed. An official report has not yet been published. The number of natives killed at Bantam, Batavia, and Lampong is estimated at thirty thousand. The number of Europeans lost is unknown. The garrison and the Dutch Resident at Telokbetong were saved. Terrible distress prevails at Telokbetong, as it is unapproachable by the sea, owing to the bay being filled with banks of pumice stone. The telegraph line from Batavia to Telokbetong was destroyed. The Marquis of Ripon, the Viceroy of India, sent two agents to Java to ascertain the extent of the calamity and the condition of the sufferers who escaped death, but are in danger of starvation. Some of the towns on the island are inaccessible by reason of the masses of lava surrounding them, and it is supposed that all the inhabitants must be dead.

The Jordan Canal is a Prominent Topic in European journals. In a recently published account of the physical changes it would produce, it is stated that the fall from the Gulf of Akabah to the Dead Sea is about thirteen hundred feet, and if, as supposed, this be continuous from end to end or nearly so, a very short cutting will suffice to bring the waters of the Red Sea into the Jordan Valley. This stream, it is calculated, would fill the whole ravine in about three years. The river Jordan, the Dead Sea, and Lake Tiberias would all disappear, with some three hundred square miles of land, principally on the western side of the ravine as now existing, but in their place would be a vast inland sheet of water fertilizing the neighboring desert with the rainfall produced by the evaporation from its surface. Not a mere canal would thus be created, but a wide, open channel, traversing Palestine from north to south, navigable in every sense of the term, with safe harbors here and there on either side. Many students of prophecy believe that the project is destined to bring about a literal fulfilment of the forty-seventh chapter of Ezekiel, in which mention is made about bringing out the waters toward the East country into the desert and then down to the sea. It mentions, moreover, the healing of the waters and the appearance of a great multitude of fish, both of which results are promised in the prospectus of the projectors of the canal scheme.

A Christian Home in Madagascar is Described by a correspondent of the London Standard, who recently visited it. He thus writes to his journal: "Living with Mrs. Stebbings in her own home, and learning the ideas, the manners, and the graces of an English lady, are a score or two of Hova girls. Modest and graceful young women the majority of them are, and possessed in some cases of a quaint beauty peculiar to their race, which refinement and education have enhanced. The young ladies of this school are in high demand in the Hova marriage market. As wives it has already been discovered they are very different from the ordinary Hova girl. One such letter, asking for the hand of the senior damsel, arrived while I was at the station. The writer piously based his claim on the advice given in the scriptural text, 'Ask and ye shall receive,' which he duly quoted —a manner of wooing that he evidently considered would prove as convincing to the missionary's wife as to her pupil. The evening of my stay at this station I shall not soon forget. The young girls sang and played to each other, while others stitched and knitted. English hymns we sometimes had, and at others their own simple Hova melodies. At one table three young girls assiduously indited letters to brothers and relatives at Mojanga for me to carry with me. It was, in short, the most striking of my experiences in Madagascar."

The Spiritual Darkness of China was Described at a recent meeting in London of the China Inland Mission. The Secretary of the Mission, in bidding a public farewell to a missionary then setting out for China, said that "in the great empire of China there is but one missionary to every million of inhabitants. The missionary about to depart is bound for the province of Hu-nan, which contains a population of some 18,000,000, and in which is resident but one Protestant missionary, though others had been there and gone away. Other missionaries are being trained for labor in China, among whom are several ladies, some of whom are paying their own expenses. As much of the work of the mission in China can be carried on only by ladies, the society is doing its best in this respect."

The Luther Festival.—Preliminary Festivities in connection with the Luther commemoration, which is to be kept throughout Protestant Germany next November, were held on August 8th in the town of Erfurt, where the great Reformer lived eight years as a student and a monk. The entire town was gayly decorated with flags, garlands, and triumphal arches. The streets were crowded with visitors, more than 20,000 persons having arrived by special trains. Of the students about 1000 were present, the German universities having sent deputations in some cases a hundred strong. The Hereditary Prince of Saxe-Weimar arrived early in the morning. The procession consisted in all of about 3000 persons. It was marshalled in five divisions, subdivided into forty-four sections, a large number of the students were on horseback, but a still larger number were on foot. The school girls were conspicuous in their white attire, and elicited much enthusiasm. The procession, after a march of two hours, arrived at the Domplatz, in the midst of which, on a raised pedestal or platform, was a gigantic bust of Luther. Here there were upward of fifty thousand spectators assembled, and the crowning point of the festival was the singing of Luther's famous hymn, "Ein' feste Burg," by the assembled multitude, accompanied by the music of eight collective military bands. After this, the Court Chaplain, Rogge, spoke ardently against Romanism, which, he said, appeared now to be advancing more than ever.

The Condition of Society in England Occasions alarm in intelligent observers. Society in all its ranks contains elements of fermentation which, it is feared, will betray their presence and development by an awful and universal explosion. Mr. Raikes, M.P., is not usually regarded as a pessimist, but at a large meeting held on August 1st, he said: "The outlook of public affairs, although we try to take the most cheerful view we can, is sufficiently menacing to make any one naturally shrink, if duty would allow it, from recapitulating the long tragedy of errors of which the present Parliament are the authors. I do not recollect any period when the condition of affairs at home and abroad gave ground for greater apprehension. There is a revolutionary spirit in some parts of the country which may be difficult to quell."

THE indefatigable worker whose portrait appears on the first page of this number was a man to whom the whole English-speaking world was largely indebted. The problems involved in the relations of capital and labor have perplexed the wisest philosophers of our time, and many schemes have been devised by Henry George, William Godwin Moody and others to solve them, but the intelligent observer is conscious that they are not yet solved. The tendency of the world is continually toward the reduction of wages to a point at which the lot of the workman is most deplorable. Very soon, here, as in Europe, the workingman will labor from early morning until late at night for a pittance which will barely keep him in food and clothes, and which gives him no opportunity of laying aside any savings for sickness or old age. Capitalists, as we saw in the recent strike of Western Union operators, are stronger than their employés. There are more workers than can be employed, and the result is that there is competition for employment and consequent reduction of wages. This condition of society is noticed with alarm by those who are concerned for the welfare of society, and the question is asked on every hand, "What will the end be?"

This question Mr. Smithies took into consideration, and the result was an effort to grapple with it in one of its most serious branches. The workingman in England at the commencement of Mr. Smithies's career was ignorant, unthrifty, and too often drunken. Thus the speed with which he was being carried downward in the social scale by the forces we have mentioned, he was accelerating. This tendency Mr. Smithies set himself to check. Wages might inevitably tend to decrease—that problem he left to others —but the workingman might be taught how to make the best use of what he did earn. He might be forced to realize that his habits of drinking, smoking, and general wastefulness were foolish and stupid ; that to indulge in them was bad for himself and his family, and that he might be better off if he would.

Mr. Smithies undertook the duty of getting that idea into the workingman's head, and his success has been extraordinary. By pictures, by parables, by pithy, humorous teaching, the same lessons of industry, sobriety, thrift, Sabbath observance, and mutual helpfulness were taught, and thousands of homes were transformed by them. He was one of the greatest moral teachers of modern times, and deserved all the honor the world could give him. On July 20th last he finally laid down his pen, and went to his long rest, but his works follow him, and he had the supreme satisfaction, which any man might covet, of knowing that he left the world better for his having lived in it.

PRACTICAL HELP.

Years ago two Christian gentlemen in London were engaged in earnest conversation about the case of a man of some repute who had yielded to the temptation of strong drink. "Can nothing be done?" said the country brother to his friend. "Why, you see," replied the London friend, "ministers don't like to speak with him now lest their church members should hear of it and suspect them." "Is there, then, no Christian man," rejoined the other, "in this great London of yours who can afford to dare to look upon a dark case and have mercy upon it?" The country brother was turning away disgusted. "Stop! I have it!" And the Londoner sat down, wrote a hasty note, which he gave to his friend, saying, "If there is a man—mark me, I do not say in London, but in all the world—who can give true help in a case of this kind it is the gentleman to whom this note is your introduction." The envelope was addressed T. B. Smithies, Esq.

When the bearer of the note arrived at the address indicated he was shown into a room where seven or eight persons, in every stage of impatience, waited to see, not an M.D., but Mr. Smithies. An author with a bundle of temperance copy ; a gentleman who bore a suspicious little memorandum book of the kind commonly used to enter subscriptions in ; a tall full-blooded African ; and a thin, white, nervous minister who had a meeting to arrange. All these unbusiness-like persons had business with Mr. Smithies, "urgently private" or "public" business as the case might be. Whatever the matter was with them, they all went in, one by one, into Mr. Smithies's room, as if he had been a fashionable physician, and all of them came out hopeful and smiling after a short, a very short consultation. Our country brother's turn came at last, and he carried in his note and his "case" to the friend of "British workmen." He saw a gentleman of five and forty, of open smiling countenance and truly courteous manners. The first shake of the hand seemed to warn the visitor against prolixity of statement, and at the same time encouraged him to proceed. Mr. Smithies grasped the case in two minutes, made a few pencil notes, and then gave the right advice. He also put a gold coin into the stranger's hand, to enable the advice to be carried out, and did so without any solicitation having been made to him for pecuniary aid. Such was Mr. Smithies in his labor.

Thomas Bowater Smithies was born in the city of York, England, in the month of August, 1815, so that he had nearly attained the sixty-eighth year of his age when "he fell asleep in Jesus." He was surrounded by the prayerful solicitudes of a loving home, and he gave his heart to the Saviour, and himself to His service, while he was still very young.

EARLY TEMPERANCE EFFORTS.

He was engaged for some years at York as a clerk in an insurance office, but before and after business hours he diligently and successfully sought to further the cause of temperance. It was while he was thus engaged that Mr. Smithies discovered the power of well-displayed printer's type. The temperance society with which he was connected, though composed of conscientious and earnest people, was too poor to print the announcements of its meetings, so Mr. Smithies and hs fellow-workers used to go round regularly to the barbers' shops, lawyers' offices, and other places where placards were displayed to the public gaze, to beg them when they had served their purpose. (This scene is depicted in our frontispiece picture, numbered 1.) From these superannuated placards Mr. Smithies cut the letters, and with these letters he constructed appropriate and effective notices for his society. He pasted them down so artistically that they invariably attracted attention, and he thus learned an art of great service to him in the more important work of his after-life.

Some time during the year 1850, Mr. Smithies, then nearly thirty-five years old, removed from the city of his birth and labors, and became a clerk in London. The enlarged life and busy enterprise of the British metropolis seemed to set his soul on fire ; and while saddened by spectacles of misery and wickedness perpetually thrust under his notice, he determined for Christ's sake and with His help to do something to mitigate the one and counteract the other.

FIRST LITERARY VENTURE.

Prompted by this resolve, therefore, and directing his efforts at the outset almost entirely to the entertainment and instruction of the young, he employed the little capital he had acquired by the most rigid economy, in commencing, in 1851, The Band of Hope Review, a monthly sheet costing one cent, which from its first number has always been conspicuously characterized by the general excellency of its wood-cuts. It speedily became manifest that Mr. Smithies possessed the indescribable tact without which no man, however otherwise dowered by nature, can be a successful editor, and his little publication secured the cordial appreciation of its readers, and soon reached a paying circulation. As funds came in they were unselfishly re-invested in improvements and in well-directed efforts to gain a much larger number of patrons.

The success of the little sheet induced him to extend his efforts, and in January, 1855, appeared the first number of one of the most successful and useful of English periodicals—The British Workman. At once it excited attention, it secured the support of many influential friends of the working classes, it became evident that it would do valuable service, and, accordingly, in 1856, its editor relinquished business for literature. The new paper still grew in usefulness and popularity, and in 1860 its circulation had become so great that it was possible to commence in it the series of cartoons, or large pictures, still continued, the costliness of which is rarely suspected by their admirers.

THE ILLUSTRATED JOURNAL.

Among the moral and spiritual forces which are being exerted upon the world, a considerable place must be given to illustrated religious literature. This the universal popularity of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and other journals abundantly proves. The work of the artist catches the eye of the careless and awakens curiosity, and then the religious teacher has a chance of reaching the conscience and the heart. Immeasurable good has been effected by this instrumentality. Cases come to our knowledge almost every day. We speak "words of truth and soberness" when we declare that by it hundreds of thousands of homes have been made happier, because by it godless and intemperate parents have been won to sobriety, to industry, to attendance upon public worship, to the study of the Word of God, to prayer, and to the observance of all those duties and amenities on which the happiness of the home depends. By the grace of God, moral miracles have been wrought by the illustrated Gospel tract, and the illustrated religious journal.

BREAKFASTS FOR THE POOR.

Recognizing with humble gratitude that God was wonderfully blessing the instrumentality with which he had now altogether identified himself, Mr. Smithies, in the exercise of a wise discretion, extended his efforts, and there appeared in quick succession, the Earlham tracts and the Starlight temperance series of tracts, both of which enjoyed at once an immense circulation, and were characterized by the same ingenious and liberal use of pictorial illustrations. Then came at intervals the Children's Friend, the Infants' Magazine, the Family Friend, and the Friendly Visitor. Nor was he content with literary work alone. In other ways he sought to do good to those who had no helper. One of these ways was the occasionally providing of free breakfasts for them, which were followed by earnest, religious addresses. (One of these breakfasts is illustrated in our frontispiece picture.)

VISIT TO THE PITCAIRN ISLANDERS.

As an instance of the universal favor with which some, at least, of Mr. Smithies's publications were received, and of the comparatively hidden nooks and corners of the world to which they found their way, we may mention that when Sir Charles Dilke visited the Pitcairn Islanders some years ago, he was met by two bright-eyed lads, Adams and Young, descendants of the Bounty mutineers. Adams asked, "Have you a Sunday at Home or a British Workman?" We do not know whether Sir Charles had either of these with him, but we do know that the nature of the question struck his mind with the force of a considerable surprise. (The panel of our frontispiece picture numbered 2 depicts the scene just referred to.)

MRS. SMITHIES.

To his mother, by that time an aged Christian lady, the son was so devotedly attached, that it used to be said, that for her sake he remained single. When she died a few years ago, he, aided by some friends, erected to her memory a into a good business, besides money and property. He squandered every penny of the money, sold the property, and ruined the business, and died the death of a drunkard. The mother is now living broken-hearted, and in almost abject poverty."

Saved from a Den of Iniquity.—Mr. Henderson said: "Some weeks ago a poor girl came to my door begging, and I learned that she came from the country, and had taken to evil courses to earn a living. Her sister was then living an abandoned life. The same evening I heard the details of the sad story, and at once went to the den of iniquity where the sister lived, and going down on my knees prayed God to save the inmates. The sisters both left the house with me, and, though they preferred to get a situation in Glasgow, I persuaded them to go home to their father in Clackmannanshire, and he now gratefully and joyfully writes me that both his daughters have accepted Christ as their Saviour, and are living modest, pure, and promising lives."

Trophies of Tract-Reading.—At one of the noonday meetings Mr. Sloan mentioned the following encouraging incident: "I was much struck with the appearance of a woman in a meeting lately; she was so rough-looking, yet tidy and clean in her dress and person. When I spoke to her she told me that she was a laundress, and that a lady for whom he was working gave her a tract and spoke a few kind words at the same time. She and her husband were nominally Roman Catholics, but they both read the tract, and by the power of the Holy Spirit were awakened and converted to the Lord Jesus by its means. Tract distributors should take courage, and although in many cases they may not reap where they have sown, yet the seed will always grow in some spot, to the praise and glory of Divine grace."

A Devil's Lie Exposed.—Mr. Morrison, Missionary to sailors, related: "Not long ago, we were singing the hymn, 'I'll praise Him all the time,' in the open air, when a big, drunken man, about six feet two inches in height, staggered among the workers and came into the meeting. He promised to come back again, but I didn't expect him to come. He did return, however, and gave himself to Christ." Mr. Jack, rising, said: "I wish to confirm what Mr. Morrison has said. I spoke with this man on his second visit. He was sober, but smelled strongly of drink. I learned that he had some objections which he thought absolutely prevented him being a Christian, and I therefore inquired, 'What is your difficulty?' He answered, 'I have sinned against the Holy Ghost, therefore there is no forgiveness for me.' 'My brother, if you had done so, you would have no feeling of sin left. You are anxious to be saved. I tell you of a Saviour who is able and willing to save you. Will you trust Him?' 'I will trust Him now,' was his reply, and I am told that he is going on well."

A Suicide Stopped.—"A Man Came to me in the Hall in James Morrison Street, and said, 'I have come to bid you good-by, Mr. Scott.' 'Are you going away?' I inquired. 'Yes,' he said, 'I am going to America.' 'Have you taken Christ?' I asked. 'Yes,' he replied, 'years ago; I would like to tell you how it took place. I was passing the Gospel Tent on my way to the Clyde to drown myself, and heard the refrain, "I will guide thee with Mine eye," coming out over and over again, and my mind kept repeating it, but I went on to the clump of trees above the suspension bridge. As I stood on the brink of the river, it flashed through my mind, "Is God guiding me to do this deed? No, He is not." With that I turned away and crossed over to the wash-houses at the east end of the Green, and sat down on the seat. Almost immediately another man came and sat down alongside, saying, "You seem out of sorts." I gave him no answer, but he put his hand in his pocket, took out a shilling, and gave it to me, saying, "I don't know anything about you, but you are in low water." I thought, "It is certain that the Lord has guided me here," so I got a bed and something to eat. Next day I got work, but I have never seen the man who helped me since then.' The Lord 'guided' him to a good situation in the United States, where he is living a life of faith upon the Son of God, who loved him and gave Himself for him."

TWOFOLD FULFILMENT OF PROPHECY.

A BIBLE-READING.

By Rev. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, Mass.

A School Needing to Learn Perspective—Double Fulfilment of Prophecy—I. The Word "Generation"—II. The Time of the End—The Known World Enlightened — III. The Outpouring of the Spirit—Attendant Signs—Zechariah's Confirmation.

A BLIND girl, who had never seen from her birth, had her eyes operated upon, and the film that had grown over them removed. Her vision was perfectly recovered, so that she could see as well as any in the family; only there was this singular defect, she had no idea of distance, and consequently she would reach out for an orange lying on the table, and the next moment for an apple hanging on a tree on the other side of the street. In a word, she had in her vision; the near and the remote seemed to her to lie upon the same plane. There is a school of interpretation growing up to-day which resembles this blind girl, in the peculiarities of its prophetic vision. It has no perspective in its pictures of the future; it throws all the predictions of the New Testament upon one plane, like the objects in a Chinese painting—huddles the ages and dispensations all together in the foreground, telling us that the second coming of Christ has taken place, and that the kingdom has already come.

Seizing upon a few statements of our Lord, such as shall not pass away, till all these things be fulfilled," it asserts that the predicted second advent must have occurred within the lifetime of our Lord's contemporaries. All this comes from their having no eye for perspective in their prophetic scheme. The simple fact is, that almost all the great predictions of the Bible have a double fulfilment—a near and remote, a spiritual and a literal. Bearing this truth in mind, the whole matter of interpretation becomes exceedingly simple; and we discover where we stand between past and future fulfilments of Scripture. Let us give a few examples of this double fulfilment, to make the matter plain.

I. "Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled" (Matt. 24 : 34). "All these things" here include the events of our Lord's coming and kingdom, we believe. And hence, as we have seen, some have hastily concluded that these events actually came to pass in the days of those then living. The real truth is, that the twenty-fifth of Matthew mingles predictions of the destruction of Jerusalem and of the end of the world in the same discourse. Now, doubtless, the destruction of Jerusalem was a solemn type and presage of the end of the world. It was "the end of the age"—that is, of the Jewish age; and as such it very strikingly prefigured the "end of the age" which is the harvest when Christ shall come to gather the wheat into His garner, and "burn the chaff with unquenchable fire."

We believe that Canon Farrar has hit the exact truth when he has said of this perplexing passage, that our Lord chose a word of double meaning. The word genea [generation] often means those living at a given time; and it means, as several times used in the New Testament, "race" or "nation." Now, it is perfectly true that the generation then living witnessed the end of the age, and the solemn type and prefigurement of the Judgment Day is the destruction of Jerusalem. But that generation, the Jewish race, was not to pass away till the literal end of the age, and the literal coming of Christ in judgment should occur. Looking at the text thus, and regarding the divine method of twofold fulfilment, all becomes plain, and we can see how in the light of it Christ has come providentially, and is yet to come literally.

II. Take another illustration. Christ says, "And this Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and

THEN SHALL THE END COME"

(Matt. 24 : 14). Now, so early as the A.D. 64, the Gospel had thus been preached. Paul, writing to the Colossians, said, "The Gospel which ye have heard, and which was preached unto every creature which is under heaven." Must not the end have come, then, immediately after? The end of the Jewish age did immediately follow. But this was but a miniature fulfilment. The then known world had heard the Gospel; but now evangelization is taking a wider sweep; it is preaching the Gospel to all nations, literally and exhaustively. And thus the great end, the termination of this Christian dispensation, is approaching.

III. Still another instance to the point may be found in Joel's prophecy of

THE OUTPOURING OF THE SPIRIT.

"It shall come to pass afterward that I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh," etc.; and then follows the accompanying signs and wonders—the sun turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, etc. On the Day of Pentecost, when the Spirit was poured out, we hear Peter saying, "This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel." And many have therefore supposed that the giving of the Spirit on the Day of Pentecost was the exhaustive fulfilment of Joel's prediction. We suppose it to be only a miniature fulfilment. For the signs in the sun and moon our Lord distinctly connects with His second advent; and we see no reason to believe that they have yet occurred.

We judge that there will be a great world-wide and final outpouring of the Spirit in connection with our Lord's coming again, and the conversion of the Jews. For mark Joel's explicit "afterward." The connection shows that this afterward is subsequent to the restoration and conversion of Israel. Isaiah says the same, declaring that the desolations of Zion shall continue "until the Spirit be poured upon us from on high" (31 : 15). And Zechariah, in describing the conversion of Israel in connection with Messiah's coming again, declares God's Word—"I will pour out upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and of supplications" (12 : 10). Thus we believe that Pentecost was the first and partial fulfilment of Joel's prophecy, and that the full and final accomplishment will be in connection with the Lord's return.

reminds us of another instance in his prophecy: "And they shall look upon Me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for Him" (13 : 10). John quotes these words in connection with the piercing of Christ at the crucifixion: "And again another Scripture saith, They shall look on Him whom they pierced" (19 : 37). But this, surely, was not the final application of the prophecy. It was a partial fulfilment; and the Day of Pentecost, when the people's hearts were pricked under Peter's preaching of Christ crucified, "whom ye have taken and by wicked hands have crucified and slain," was a still closer fulfilment. But after all this we hear the words of John in Patmos: "Behold He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him, and all the tribes of earth shall wail because of Him." Thus the final, full, and literal accomplishment of this prediction is yet to come. It will occur in connection with our Lord's literal, personal second coming.

These are but examples which the student of Scripture may multiply at length of what we mean by twofold fulfilments of prophecy.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50 per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to

THE MANAGER,

CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York

NOTICE.

Many subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who are laboring to extend the sphere of its usefulness, wish us to afford them the same facilities as were placed at their disposal last year. It appears that the concession in price then made, enabled them to introduce the journal to persons and families to whom it proved a blessing. God used it as a means of conversion in not a few cases; in others it gave comfort and encouragement to tried and afflicted believers; and ministers and lay preachers, to whom our friends sent it, acknowledged their indebtedness for help in their labors to the hints and suggestions contained in its pages.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has no higher object than that which its friends thus state was achieved last year. The same opportunity is therefore cheerfully given this year. Any subscriber wishing to introduce THE CHRISTIAN HERALD where it may do good, may send to THE MANAGER, 63 Bible House, New York, for which sum the paper will be mailed to any address in the United States or in Canada every week from September 1st until the end of 1883. Will our friends pray that God will use each number for the advancement of Christ's Kingdom?

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Significant Address has been Issued by the Independent Republicans of Massachusetts. It has more than local importance, because it represents the feelings of a large portion of the dominant party in all the States, and of that immense mass of voters who do not pledge their allegiance to any party, but take a patriotic interest in the welfare of the nation. In the course of the address, the signers say: "Office as a public trust, to be administered for the benefit of the people, and not of the party, is what the people rightfully demand. And any party that would replace the present administration must be pledged to something purer and better. The time has passed when a nomination means an election, and the people are more critical than ever before of the men and the principles offered to their choice. As independents we rejoice at this, and no desire for temporary success will lead us to the support of weak or untrustworthy men. Party platforms have become traps for the unwary, and party professions are to be trusted only so far as the character of the nominations afford a guarantee of earnest devotion to the reforms needed in the State and nation. The independent voters whom we represent stand ready to assist any party with honest and right principles, but they are equally ready to withhold their votes from any party that weakens in its efforts to obtain the reforms which the people demand. Reform in the civil service, reform in the methods of taxation, economy in State affairs, and more careful legislation the people will have, through parties now existing or over the remains of parties which lack the ability or the desire to secure these reforms." This declaration deserves the careful study of practical politicians who have hitherto relied on the old system of tactics for success at the polls.

The Relief Ship Proteus, while on its Voyage to Lady Franklin Bay, has been crushed in the ice. The Proteus was laden with stores for the Greely Arctic Expedition, and was under the command of Captain Pike. The utmost anxiety is now felt as to the safety of the expedition, from which nothing has now been heard for two years. The Proteus sailed from St. John, Newfoundland, on June 29th, and arrived at Cory Island on July 16th. In attempting to penetrate Smith's Sound she was caught in the ice, and on July 23d she was crushed and sank in four hours. The crew took to the open boats, in which they were exposed for thirty-one days, and travelled over a thousand miles to Upernavik, where they were taken on board the relief ship Yantic. This is the second failure in the attempt to carry relief to Lieutenant Greely and his companions at Lady Franklin Bay. Last summer the Neptune failed to reach them, and this year Lieutenant Garlington, who commanded the relief party which sailed in the Proteus, was instructed to exhaust every endeavor to reach them or communicate with them this summer. Their stock of provisions must now be getting very low. Lieutenant Greely had imperative orders to retreat this fall by land if not relieved, but that mode of retreat will involve considerable danger and hardship as well as the abandonment of public property. Lieutenant Garlington was instructed to land stores at Littleton Island, so that in the event of Lieutenant Greely retreating he might find relief there, but there appears to have been some misunderstanding, as the Proteus passed the island without landing the stores, and sank with them on board.

The System of Civil Service Reform Inaugurated by President Arthur when he was Collector of the New York Custom House has been continued by Collector Robertson. In a recent report, that officer says: "I have removed from office but seventeen employés since I have been collector, and all these removals were for sufficient cause. Eight were for intemperance, three were for continued absence without leave, one for neglect of duty, one for sleeping at his post, two for passing baggage without proper examination, and two upon charges in financial matters. Every appointment has been made under the operation of the civil service rules. When I became collector there were sixty persons temporarily filling positions. These places have since been permanently filled by candidates who have passed the requisite examination." How marked this improvement is may be realized by the fact that under a former collector, out of 903 officers employed 830 were removed; another made 338 removals in eighteen months, and another 510 removals in sixteen months.

The Convocation of the Colored Clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church assembled in New York on September 12th. Rev. Alexander Crummell, D.D., presided. Among the resolutions adopted was one declaring that "In order to put the colored race on an equal footing with the white in regard to morality and intelligence, the Bishops of the Episcopal Church, together with the Missionary Board in New York City, have been requested to lend their efforts toward the erection of colored churches, parish schools, and theological seminaries throughout the country, where the colored youth can be properly fitted for the ministry." Dr. Crummell, the President of the Convocation, is Rector of St. Luke's Church, Washington, the largest colored congregation of the Episcopal Church. He is one of the most distinguished colored clergymen in this country. He was born in New York, is a graduate of Cambridge University, England, was Secretary of State in Liberia, and President of the Liberian University.

Princeton College was Re-Opened, after the summer vacation, on September 13th. The religious service was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Duffield. President McCosh made a few remarks. He stated that there had been 200 applicants for admission to the college. Twenty of these are from other colleges, and entered for the most part the junior class here. The freshman class will probably number about 150. The School of Philosophy will be opened. The trustees expect soon to secure a separate professor for the chairs of moral philosophy, jurisprudence and political economy. Dr. McCosh then called attention to the fact that hazing was no longer popular in the college, and warned the sophomore class that any attempts at amusement in that direction would be severely dealt with.

New Cases of Yellow Fever Continue to Break out in the Navy Yard at Pensacola, Fla. On September 12th six new cases and two deaths were reported, and on September 15th, three new cases but no deaths. The statement that the disease was introduced by pilots is contradicted in an affidavit signed by fifteen pilots on the bar.

A Memorial Institute for the Promotion of temperance and education is being erected in Brooklyn on the corner of Broadway and Willoughby Avenue. It is designed as a memorial to the late Hon. William E. Dodge, the eminent New York philanthropist, and will be similar in character to the Cooper Institute. Mr. Benjamine J. Warner is building it, and intends to expend $100,000 upon it. The first floor will be devoted to stores, and on the upper floors will be reading-rooms, class-rooms, and large halls for the use of the temperance societies, good templar lodges, etc.

The Twenty-Sixth Anniversary of the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting is to be celebrated today. On September 20th, 1857, the first meeting was held, and since that time every day at noon there has been a meeting. Requests for prayer have come in from every quarter of the world, and a vast multitude of letters have been received, testifying that the prayers have been answered. The missionary who usually conducts the service entered on his seventy-fifth year on September 3d.

The Arrival of Mr. W. Forbes in Canada is announced. He is one of the most effective and successful evangelists and Gospel temperance speakers of modern times. He intends paying a visit to the United States at the close of his Canadian engagements, and will probably speak in most of our chief cities. His addresses are full of anecdote and apt illustration, and his intense earnestness and genial humor delight all classes of hearers. Mr. Forbes's success in England has been phenomenal, and both in London and the provincial towns the places in which his meetings have been held were crowded with enthusiastic audiences, and much good was done. We strongly urge our readers to lose no opportunity of hearing him. A portrait of Mr. Forbes was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 2d, with a short sketch of his life and work. At present, applications to Mr. Forbes should be addressed to the Y. M. C. A., Montreal. Or they may be sent to this office, and we will forward them to him.

Five Dollars have been Received at this office from a subscriber at Denbigh, Ont., in aid of the fund for supplying THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to colored ministers in the South. Also ten dollars from Cambridgeport, Mass., from a subscriber who desires it to be used in sending the paper to "those who have not read it, that they may learn from it, not only the way of salvation from sin, but may be saved from the woes that are coming upon the earth." Both sums are devoted to the purposes which the donors respectively indicate, and we pray that in both, God's blessing may follow.

A Curious Recovery of Eyesight is Reported in an Alabama journal. It appears from its statement that about seven years ago Captain Thompson, who is the pattern-maker at the Lynn Iron-works, Birmingham, Ala., and captain of the Birmingham Rifles, received a blow on the left eye, which destroyed the sight of that orb, although it did not change its outward appearance. On September 6th, while at work, Captain Thompson noticed that he involuntarily shrank or dodged as he moved past objects on his left-hand side. This was a novel experience, and he wondered why he should be so peculiarly nervous. Presently, however, he had occasion to place his hand to his right eye to rub some dust from it. Then he discovered, as he closed his right eye, that the old-time darkness did not surround him. He could see with the eye which had been totally blind for seven years. In regard to this phenomenon the physicians of Birmingham say that the sight was obscured by a coagulated particle of blood under the iris, which has at length dissolved. Thus it appears that the cause which prevented Captain Thompson seeing with that eye was an impediment within it, and in this the case resembles that of the spiritually blind. When the Holy Spirit removes the veil, the soul perceives the truth which before was hidden from its view (II Cor. 3 : 14–18).

An Appropriate Monument is to be Erected to the memory of the late Dr. Joseph Barratt, of Middletown, Conn., the eminent scientist who was the first to discover the famous fossil marks in the red sandstone of the Portland quarries. The monument will consist of two large fossil stones, the larger of which weighs three thousand pounds. It is in the shape of a tablet, on the upper side of which the forms of the trunks of two trees stand out in great perfection. These are half in the stone and half exposed, and show on the outside in perfect detail all the markings of the original trees that filled the space they occupy. This stone is to be dressed on the four edges and laid as a tablet on a well-founded base, and in the space between the tree-trunks a deep mortise is to be made to receive the second stone, which is to be set upon this. The second stone is in the form of a flattened pyramid, one side being thickly covered with well-defined bird tracks of the usual type, and the other side being sufficiently clear to bear an inscription. Thus the pursuit to which the eminent geologist devoted his attention will be fitly represented on his last resting-place. To the earnest Christian worker the form of the stone that will mark his tomb is of little moment, but we are assured that his victories will be fitly symbolized in the honor bestowed by his Master (Daniel 12 : 3).

A Scientific Blunder Appears to have been made in an important study. Learned medical theorists have informed the world that certain dreaded diseases are produced by the presence in the human system of minute living creatures to which they gave the name of "Bacteria." M. Pasteur and other eminent chemists who studied the subject, made many experiments in breeding and cultivating these disease germs, and the theory has been widely accepted. On September 14th, however, Dr. Rollin R. Gregg, of Buffalo, N. Y., published through the Associated Press the result of an experiment of his own. He states that by boiling a quantity of healthy blood he obtained all the forms of bacteria. Other experiments in analyzing healthy blood gave the same results. From these experiments Dr. Gregg concludes that all the bacteria of disease are forms of fibrine. If Dr. Gregg's argument is correct, it would appear that bacteria are present in the blood of every one, and consequently if, as we have been taught, they are disease germs, then they are doing their fatal work in all our bodies. The soundness of this theory of physical disease must be left for the scientists to decide, but we know that a parallel theory in spiritual matters is sound. Not a human being enters the world without the germs of a sinful life in him, and these are in constant activity and development, in spite of careful training and education, until by the miraculous agency of the Holy Spirit the man is born again (Rom. 7 : 18–25).

The Romance of a Freedman is Described in a Georgia journal. Thirty years ago Kelly Smith, negro, was sold in North Carolina and taken by his new owner to Georgia, leaving behind him a wife and baby boy. Since that time he had not seen nor heard from his family. He is now employed on a turpentine farm near Worth, Ga. A short time ago some hands from North Carolina were sent to work on the same farm, and among the rest a negro named John about thirty years old. As was natural, Kelly Smith made inquiries about the people in his old home, and pretty soon he ascertained that he was talking to his own son, whom he had not seen in three decades. From him the old man learned that his wife was still living, and though she supposed her husband was dead had not married. He is now corresponding with her, and believes he will be able to induce her to join him and his son in his new home. The discovery of the relationship existing between the two men thus strangely brought together must have produced a sudden change in the feelings they had toward each other when they supposed they were strangers. A similar though far deeper change comes over the heart of a man to whom is revealed the fact that God is his Father, ready to receive and welcome him (Isa. 63 : 16).

A Startling Discovery in a Mine was Made by a miner in the Cornell Colliery at Scranton, Pa., on September 12th. He was in the act of loading some coal that he had blown down the day before, when he stumbled across the bodies of two men. He could see by the light of the lamp which he carried in his hat that the bodies were terribly mangled. An investigation showed that every bone in the bodies of the men had been broken, and that coal-dust had been literally driven through their flesh as if fired from a gun. They were identified as two newly-engaged workmen who had descended the pit the first time a few days before. They were conducted by a guide to the chamber in which they were to work, and had not been seen afterward. It is thought they must have been at work when a blast was fired in an adjoining chamber which penetrated the wall of coal and buried them under the falling débris. The discovery of the bodies shocked all the miners who, though rough fellows, would not wittingly have injured their fellow-workmen. There is reason to fear that in that day when the secrets of all hearts are made known, it will be found that many souls have been injured by the carelessness and unwatchfulness of inconsistent Christians (Eph. 5 : 11–15).

A Fall from the Stage of a Theatre into the cellar has caused serious injuries to several actresses and actors, and might have resulted in the death of some of them. On September 10th there was a rehearsal at the Fourteenth Street Theatre of a play to be produced in the evening. In the course of the rehearsal a part of the stage was raised, to represent a bridge, and on this ten members of the company were standing, when it suddenly gave way and they were precipitated in a heap into the cellar below. Ambulances were called for, and the injured persons were taken to the New York Hospital, where they received surgical attention. It is thought that all will recover, though one lady's injuries will prevent her going on the stage again. The details published respecting the circumstances of the sufferers excite sincere commiseration and sympathy. Unhappily, the history of theatres furnishes many instances of similar catastrophes. But the most deplorable are those which have occurred both before and behind the footlights, in which the fall was metaphorical, but the consequences were real and eternal. These disasters have been so frequent that we may wisely give to every one, especially to young people, the same advice that the chief officers of Asia gave to Paul (Acts 19 : 31).

THE KING'S WEIGHINGS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Talk no more so exceedingly proudly; let not arrogancy come out of your mouth: for the Lord is a God of knowledge, and by Him actions are weighed." —1 Samuel 2 : 3.

The Refuge of the Early Believers—Hannah's Delight in God's Attributes—I. The Process of Judgment—Not as Man Dreams—The Atheist's Twin Brother—Not as Man Judges—Wrong to Measure Actions by Results—Two Sets of Weights—The Weighing a Searching Business—By the Law—According to Sincerity—Motives Taken into Account—And Circumstances—Done Personally—Story of a Banker—Weighing in Progress—Results to be Published—II. The Consideration Humbling—III. The Position Indicated—A Strange Process.

IT is very beautiful to see how the saints of old time were accustomed to find comfort in their God. When they came into sore straits, when troubles multiplied, when helpers failed, when earthly comforts were removed, they were accustomed to look to the Lord and to the Lord alone. Thus Hannah thinks of the Lord, and comforts herself in His name. By this means they were made strong and glad; they began to sing instead of sighing, and to work wonders instead of fainting under their burdens, even as here the inspired poetess sings, "My heart rejoiceth in the Lord, mine horn is exalted in the Lord." To them God was a reality, a present reality, and they looked to Him as their rock of refuge, their helper, and defence, a very present help in time of trouble. Can we not at the outset learn a valuable lesson from their example? Let us do as they did; let us and stay ourselves upon Him when heart and flesh are failing.

LEAN UPON OUR GOD,

Hannah, who was once a woman of a sorrowful spirit, had so learned to delight herself in God, that she could dwell upon the different points of the divine character with joyful adoration. Like others of God's instructed people, she was very happy in the thought of God's holiness. Notice the second verse: "There is none holy as the Lord." Hannah also tuned her heart to celebrate the power of Jehovah, saying, "Neither is there any rock like our God." One of the leading ideas in the metaphor of a rock is strength, abiding endurance, unmoving stability, unconquerable power. Let us also rejoice in the Lord God Almighty, and delight in the mighty God of Jacob, the Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle. Hannah touched, in her rapturous hymn, upon the wisdom of the Lord, and sang thus, "For the Lord is a God of knowledge," or of "knowledges;" for every kind of knowledge is with Him. Hannah also derived comfort from the fact that God is strictly just; for she says with delight, "By Him actions are weighed." It is to this that I would turn your attention. May the Holy Spirit direct our meditations.

I. The staple of our discourse will consist of a consideration of of divine judgment, which is continually going on: "The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by Him actions are weighed." The figure of weighing suggests a thorough testing, and an accurate estimating of the matters under consideration. Solomon saith, "All the ways of a man are clean in his own eyes; but the Lord weigheth the spirits." God sees men's actions, notes them, thinks upon them, and deliberately forms an estimate of them. "For the ways of man are before the eyes of the Lord, and He pondereth all his goings."

Our first note here shall stand thus—this is not as man dreams. Many imagine that God takes no note of what is done among the sons of men; indeed, their God does not appear to be a personal, intelligent existence, at all; or, if intelligent, they boast that He is too great to mark the trivial actions of men; that is to say, in order to make God great, they would make Him blind. Their idea of His greatness would seem to be loftiness, impassiveness, and a measure of ignorance; our notion of greatness is the reverse; we believe in a great God to whom all things are known and by whom the least matters are observed. The atheist cries, "No God;" and he who would deny to God universal knowledge is twin brother to him. As good have no God as a God who does not know. "Jehovah is a God of knowledge, and by Him actions are weighed."

This text plainly rebukes those who say—God is too merciful to take much account of what we do, poor creatures that we are, shot out of the back of a tumbril into the midst of a society all in chaos, which tempts us to indulge the passions of our nature. They dream that God will surely wink at such inconsiderable things as the actions of men; but surely it is not so, since it is written, "The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by Him actions are weighed." The great and glorious God does not forgive sin because He does not know of it, or does not remember how sinful it is; but this is the wonder of His mercy, that He blots out the sins of His people with the fullest knowledge of their foulness. After having weighed sin, noted its motive, marked its meaning, and considered its consequences, the Lord nevertheless forgives it for Jesus' sake. Do not fall into any error on this point, or imagine that the Lord thinks little of human guilt, and therefore readily pardons it. No. "The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by Him actions are weighed."

Consider, next, that this form of procedure is

NOT AS MAN JUDGES.

By men actions are judged flippantly, but "by God actions are weighed." By men actions are more frequently counted. Such a man has done this, and that, and that, and that, and that; what a wonderful man he is! Yes, but by God human deeds are not so much measured in the bushel as weighed in the scale. A man's life may be made up of countless bubbles, each one brilliant as the rainbow; but what a collapse there will be when the Lord comes with the balances to weigh the deeds done in the body!

By men actions are frequently measured as to apparent bulk, and persons placed in certain positions bulk very largely upon the public mind; their doings fill the newspapers, though they are empty enough in themselves. You scarcely get a day's issue of a journal but what something is reported of a man of mark; not that what he has done is by any means surprisingly good, or wise, or benevolent, but it is done by him, and therefore it must be emblazoned. Men and women must have something to talk about, and certain persons are selected for observation, and therefore to their lives an exaggerated importance is attached. Let no such person delude himself; at the bar of the acts of princes and peasants, of lords and laborers, shall have an equal trial, and shall be tested in the self-same scales.

Constantly men measure actions by their brilliance. Oh, it was a splendid action; it was so dashing, so unlooked for, so extraordinary! Was it right and pure and holy? If not, the light of genius cannot save it from condemnation. He who gave £10,000 to a fund did a brilliant act of charity; and yet the legacy may not have weighed so much as the two mites that made a farthing which were all the poor widow's living. He who silently adores the Lord may have given Him a greater weight of praise than he whose charming voice led the great congregation. The godly life of a poor bedridden woman may have been more highly esteemed of the Lord than the flaming eloquence of the great preacher. Ah me! how easily are we deceived by appearances! but not so the Lord; for "by Him actions are weighed."

Men are exceedingly apt to measure actions by their consequences. How wrong it is to measure actions by results, rather than by their own intrinsic character! A man upon the railway neglected to turn a switch, but by the care of another no accident occurred. Is he to be excused? Another man was equally negligent, certainly not more so; but in his case the natural result followed—there was a collision, and many lives were lost. This last man was blamed most deservedly, but yet the former offender was equally guilty. If we do wrong and no harm comes of it, we are not thereby justified. Yea, if we did evil and good came of it, the evil would be just as evil. It is not the result of the action but the action itself which God weighs.

You have all admired Grace Darling because of her gallant act in rescuing mariners from a wreck; but suppose she had not saved a single sailor, and had been herself drowned, would she not have been equally a heroine? Of course she would. Her success had nothing to do with the excellence of her design; the moral weight of her conduct lay in the self-sacrificing courage which led her on such a howling, murky night to risk her life upon the cruel waters for her unknown fellow-men. Had she been swallowed up by the remorseless deep, her action would have weighed as much before the throne of God as when she landed the saved ones at the lighthouse.

If a man gives his life to convert the heathen, and he does not succeed, he shall have as much reward of God as he who turns a nation to the faith. Two ministers have labored in the same field; the first preached the Gospel faithfully, but saw scant results; the second, following him, found the rough work done, and reaped full sheaves from the field. The thoughtless are apt to think the second man greatly superior to the first, but it is not so; one soweth and another reapeth. When God comes to weigh the actions of men, He may give greater praise to the sower than to the reaper. We have up our fellow-men—odd, I mean, as compared with our self-measurement. Usually we have two sets of weights—one for ourselves, and a second for our friends. When we place ourselves in the scale we weigh pretty heavily; we are full weight, and a little bit over. It is very different with our fellow-men; they may really weigh more than we do, but we adjust the machine in such a way that it is greatly to their disadvantage. But by God "actions are weighed" truly, honestly, righteously, and the result is very different from the judgment of men.

I would now have you note that this weighing is

A VERY SEARCHING BUSINESS.

"By Him actions are weighed." A man enters a goldsmith's shop, and says, "Here is old gold to sell. See, I have quite a lot of it." "Yes," says the goldsmith, "let me weigh it." "Weigh it? Why, look at the quantity; it fills this basket." What is the goldsmith doing? Looking for his weights and certain acids by which he means to test the metal. When he has used his acids, he puts the trinkets into the scale. "You are not going to buy by weight?" "I never buy in any other way," says the goldsmith. "But there is such a quantity." "That may be, but I buy by weight." It is always so with God in all our actions; He estimates their real weight. We may hammer out our little gold, and make a great show of it, but the Lord is not mocked or deceived. Every dealing between us and God will have to be by a just balance and standard-weight.

And in what way will He weigh it? The weights are somewhat of this sort. The standard is His just and holy law, and all which falls short of that is sin. Any want of conformity to the law of God is sin, and by so much our acts are found wanting. Remember this, ye who would justify yourselves.

The Lord also inquires how much of sincerity is found in the action. You acted in such a manner, and therein you were right; but did you do this in pretence, or from force, or in sincerity and in truth? In worship did you heartily adore? In charity did you give cheerfully? You did give your gold; was it with the motive of doing good, or that your name might be in the list, or because it would not look well for your name to be left out? That which is not done sincerely has no weight in it. It is weighed in the balances and found wanting.

The Lord also weighs actions according to their motives. He asks not only what you did, but why you did it? Was self the motive force? The preacher weighs his sermon this morning, and asks his conscience whether he seek alone the glory of God. Will not you, my brethren, weigh what you are doing in this world? To what end are you living? What wind is filling your sails? You have been kept from outward transgressions; your life has been moral and pure in the sight of men; but have you lived for God's glory? Have you sought to obey God and please Him? Have you been moved by love to God and man? Have you been in heart God's servant? If not, if another motive has ruled you, his servant you are whom you have obeyed. To be in the fear of the Lord is solid living; all else is froth.

Sometimes actions may be

which surround them. Men are not to be considered good if their surroundings forbid their being what they would like to be. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." Yonder man has been strictly faithful. Yes; but he could not have made a sixpence by being false, or it may be he would have lied heavily. Another man is placed where the whole custom of his trade is knavery, and he takes a firm stand, and at great risk refuses to swerve from strict integrity. Now, this second man will bear weighing, but the first will not. Are not some children so carefully brought up from their childhood, happily for them, that their character is never discovered until they get out into life, and are tempted? and then it is seen that the truthful boy was a little hypocrite, and the thoughtful girl was as frivolous as any of the giddy throng. So you see that the fruit of tender culture may not always be what it should be or what it seems to be.

It is wonderful how amiable we all are until we are irritated. What a deal of patience we have when we have no sickness to bear! I had enough and to spare till my pains multiplied, and then my stock ran very low. I am afraid that most of us have a great quantity of fictitious goodness which arises out of our favorable circumstances, and has no other foundation. Now God judges with this before Him, for He places some men amid and others in positions of special advantage; this He takes into account in the weighing. Many a man thinks himself a Joseph, and the only reason is that no Potiphar's wife has tried him; many a man has never been an Achan because no wedge of gold or goodly Babylonish garment has come in his way. Multitudes of men are honest because they never had a chance of making a grand haul by setting up a bubble company—which is the modern mode of thieving. The lion in the Zoological Gardens is very good because he is behind iron bars, and many a man's goodness owes more to the iron bars of his position than to his own heart and motive.

Another weight to put in the scale is this—Was there any godliness about your life? I may be speaking to men in Exeter Hall whose lives are such that they think themselves examples, and yet their lives are spoiled from end to end by a grievous flaw. This point must be inquired into. You are to be weighed by God, and this will be the main matter—Has God been recognized in your life? This is the inquiry to test us all—Is God the main object of our living? do we throw ourselves with intensity into the pursuit of that which will glorify His blessed name. If not, the scales of the sanctuary will soon discover that we are sadly wanting. Thus, you see, in different ways God searches deeply into the life of man, and woe to that man who cannot bear the weighing; the greater his pretensions the more terrible his dismay when the scales refuse him.

This weighing of our lives must be exceedingly accurate because it is by God Himself. Notice my text: "The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by Him actions are weighed." He will judge righteous judgment. He is a God of knowledge, and therefore He knows not only thine outward deeds, but thy secret designs and desires. Moreover, He knows the standard of right; with Him are the weights and the scales. Therefore knowing what our actions are, and what they ought to be, He readily enough discovers our discrepancies and mistakes, and there will be no possibility of our escaping His infallible decision. I wonder we are so ready to deceive ourselves as we are; I wonder that so many count it worth their while to deceive their fellow-Christians and their ministers. It is a poor ambition to live a life of deceit. Be what you seem to be, and seem to be what you are. Ah me! I fear that many professors live a life of utter falsehood, comforting themselves with a lie.

I once heard a story (I do not know if it is true) of an old banker who said to his son to whom he bequeathed the business, "This is the key of our large iron safe; take great care of it. The bank depends upon that safe; let the people see that you have such a safe, but never open it unless the bank should be in the utmost difficulty." The bank went on all right as long as the iron safe was fast closed, but at last there came a run upon it, and in his greatest extremity the young gentleman opened it, and he found in it—nothing at all. That was the stock of the bank; poverty carefully concealed, imaginary wealth winning confidence, and living on the results. Are there not many persons who all their lives long are doing a spiritual banking business, and deriving a considerable income of repute from that which will turn out to be mere nothing? Beware of driving a trade for eternity upon fictitious capital, for failure will be the sure result.

Again, I want you to notice that this weighing is carried on at this present time—"By Him actions are weighed." Not only shall they be weighed at the last great day, but every minute they are being weighed. How mean must a hypocrite feel to himself if he believes that he has never once deceived God! He knelt in prayer, but he did not pray; God knew that he did not, and perceived the insult. At service-time he sang with the assembly, but his heart was never in communion with God, and the Lord knew it. He never established a repute with heaven. His conduct was understood at all times, and he was always branded as false-hearted.

"By Him actions are weighed." Please remember, dear hearers, that this is of us—not of open sinners only, but of those who are considered saints. You are getting old I see, my friend, but not too old to have your actions weighed. Old age is venerable, but it cannot screen you from inspection. "Oh," said an old man the other day, "you can trust me; I am past temptation." Gray hairs should not talk such nonsense; you can be tempted still; and your actions are still weighed as well as those of that silly boy whom you blame for his rashness. And you, good sir, who have been a professor of religion for forty years, and who when you rise up to pray stand like a cedar in the garden of God, your actions are still examined, and if you are rotten at heart, it is no matter how green you seem to be with the verdure of apparent grace, you will in due time be detected and destroyed.

And one day, to conclude this point, the King's weighings will be published—set up where men and angels shall read them. Oh, can you bear it that the whole of the secrets of your soul should be made public in the market-place of the universe; that the actions which seemed so admirable should have their secret motives searched out and should be seen to be leprous with selfishness? Can you endure to have your secret sins laid bare; your private designs, deep intentions, and evil purposes set out in the open daylight? Can you bear to have your envyings, jealousies, plottings, lyings—all held up to public gaze? With what shame will the wicked cover their faces when all their hidden things shall be read out and published through the streets of the universe! Then shall they be ashamed and confounded, while everlasting contempt shall be poured upon them.

II. It is now time for me to observe the humbling nature of this consideration. "Talk no more so exceeding proudly; let not arrogance come out of your mouth; for the Lord is a God of knowledge, and by Him actions are weighed."

The fact of divine judgment on ourselves should forever

others. When you see any one found out in wrong-doing, do not act as if you were his executioner. When you pass by a person who has lost his or her character, do not straighten your back and disdainfully regard him as the mire of the streets. Do not act the part of the very superior person. "By Him actions are weighed." Your actions are none too good. Perhaps there is not so much difference between you and the person whom you condemn, if all were known. You and the sinful one are not the least alike as to your outside wrappings and labellings, for you are labelled "saint," and she is labelled "a fallen woman"; but if all were known, and all is known by God, the man without fault himself who would dare to cast the first stone is not sitting in your seat.

Next, I think we must give up all idea of speaking proudly in the presence of God. Our good works, what are they when weighed? They look very pretty indeed as we set them out in array; but when God puts them into the scales they look very different. I remember a good man who said when he was dying that he once began to separate his good works from his bad works, but he found them so much like one another in the light of eternity, that he ceased separating them, and threw them all over, and determined to float to heaven on the cross of Christ. This was wisely done, for our best things are so stained with sin, and the whole of a holy life is worth so little in the way of merit, that the short cut of the whole matter is just to cry, "God, be merciful to me a sinner," and rest ourselves on Jesus Christ alone. Dear friend, if ever you have had the weighing process carried on in your own heart I know you have given up all hope of being saved by your own merit or strength. May the Lord carry on the weighing process in your consciences till you glory only in the Lord, and every false, pretentious thing is banished forever.

III. In closing, let us briefly consider the position in which all this leaves us. If God weighs our actions and we are thereby found wanting, and can only cry, "Guilty" in His sight,

WHAT THEN?

Then we are in God's hands. That is where I wish every one of my hearers to feel himself to be. But who is the Lord? First, according to Hannah, He is a God of salvation. "My spirit hath rejoiced in thy salvation." Salvation for sinners, salvation for the guilty, salvation for those that are weighed in the balance and found wanting; free pardon, full remission, gracious acceptance, even for the worst and vilest; this is the gospel of the blessed God. How sweet to be in the hands of a God who is able to save, and delights to save, and makes it His glory to save!

Next, according to Hannah's song, He is the God who delights in reversing the order of things. He throws down those who are on high, and sets up those that are down. "He hath filled the hungry with good things; and the rich He hath sent empty away." Is not that a hint to you to be empty, to be hungry, to be poor and needy? Down, pride! Down! Down! Humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God, and He shall exalt you in due time.

Once more, this God is one who delights to carry on strange processes in the hearts of His people. "The Lord killeth, and maketh alive; He bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up. The Lord maketh poor, and maketh rich; He bringeth low, and lifteth up." See! This is God's way of making men live—He kills them. This is God's way of giving them resurrection—He brings them to the grave; this is God's way of making men rich—He first makes them poor; this is God's way of lifting men up—they are first brought down.

Are you brought down this morning? Be of good courage; this is the royal road to comfort in Christ Jesus. Is the Holy Ghost making you conscious of sin? He does so that you may be conscious of pardon. Do you feel condemned? The Lord condemns you now that you may not be condemned with the world. Are you black, and foul, and vile in your own sight? It is that you may wash and be whiter than snow through the Lord Jesus. Oh, how I rejoice to meet with a real sinner! Sham sinners are a vexation, but those who are really and truly so are precious in our sight. We hear of the bonâ-fide traveller; give me the bonâ-fide sinner.

"A sinner is a sacred thing;
The Holy Ghost has made him so."

He who is made to feel that he is truly lost is well-nigh saved. Christ died for such. "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." Oh, thou who art really a sinner, catch at that word!

God grant you may find salvation now, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

WORK IN THE HOP-GARDENS.

AMONG the numerous and various agencies employed by Mr. C. H. Spurgeon for reaching the masses, is an evangelist who labors among hop-pickers in the County of Kent. Those people, who every year work in the hop-gardens, were some time ago notorious for their mental and spiritual ignorance and their carelessness in all religious matters. Their need was made known in the press, and Mr. Spurgeon immediately undertook to support an evangelist to work among them during the season. Mr. J. Burnham, the evangelist in question, thus writes of his work this year:

"Many of your readers are already familiar with the character and work of our 'Hop-Pickers' Mission;' but for the information of the uninitiated, allow me briefly to state our case, and recapitulate the programme of work undertaken by this mission.

"The hops ripen in September, and, when ripe, need picking promptly, or the quality would be seriously depreciated by the mould, and the quantity diminished by fickle winds. To make the best of their crops, the farmers are glad to avail themselves of the help of many thousands of the poorest (and often most degraded) from the back slums of our cities and towns. The grouping of these myriads for the hop-picking affords a grand opportunity for taking the Gospel to them, an opportunity which has given birth to

'THE HOP-PICKERS' MISSION.'

"The work is as varied as it is interesting. Day after day we visit the hop-gardens with a good supply of Gospel literature, and spend the time in talking or reading to the pickers over the bins, and distributing tracts, etc. On Sunday mornings we divide our strength, one brother preaching in the village, another taking the Sunday-school service, two others preaching in neighboring village stations, while another, with the help of a few senior scholars, is visiting the 'strangers' encampments, singing and speaking for Jesus."

Work in the Hop Gardens.

EVENING AT HOME IN CHINA.

(See Illustration.)

THE sketch of a Chinese family at home, which appears on this page, represents a scene very familiar to missionaries laboring in that vast empire. Since so many lady missionaries have gone thither under the auspices of the China Inland Mission, successful efforts have been made to penetrate the home life of the people. The object of those attempts is twofold. It is desired to reach those people who from various causes do not attend the public services, and to help those who do attend them by answering their questions, meeting their special objections, and encouraging them to be faithful to Christ in spite of public obloquy and persecution. In making visits to the homes of the people, the evening is the time generally chosen, and the missionary usually finds on the spacious veranda such a group as that depicted in the illustration.

In a letter recently received from Mr. B. Aitken, formerly manager of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and who is now laboring as a missionary in Calcutta, India, he describes the religious condition of China as perfectly appalling. He travelled extensively in China on his way from New York to India, and the scenes he witnessed were horrible. The spiritual darkness of the people he describes as being worse than that which existed in India half a century ago. Nevertheless, much good is being done by the self-sacrificing men and women at work there, but as compared with the vast extent of the field, the laborers are few.

An interesting account is given of Mr. Fan, one of the converts by Mr. Drake, one of the China Inland Missionaries, in a recent letter. He says: "In the autumn of last year Mr. Fan invited me to spend a month or two at his house, as several of his friends and neighbors were desirous of leaving off opium-smoking. It was January, however, before I was able to pay the visit. I found on arrival that there were several men really desirous of leaving off the habit. Only two, however, ventured to begin the treatment on the first day; others were equally anxious, but were hindered by their fears that our efforts to overcome the 'craving' would be in vain. After four or five days, some others placed themselves under treatment; and after the lapse of ten or twelve days, some men from neighboring villages, convinced of the possibility of breaking off the pernicious habit, also placed themselves under our treatment. Our host threw open his house and allowed the patients to board and lodge with him. Thus they were kept out of the way of temptation, attended our morning and evening services, and during the day received a considerable amount of religious instruction. During the month, a number of the patients were cured, a few were still under treatment, and nineteen persons, including the four members of my host's family, expressed their desire to learn more of our doctrines, and promised to meet for worship statedly on the Lord's Day. Three of this number threw away their idols altogether."

A new plan of operations is suggested by Mr. King, who is one of the most active of the China Inland Missionaries. He writes: "I want to suggest to you a plan for commencing work which I believe would prove successful. If there were sufficient capable native Christians, and I had the means, I believe that by it we might open out-stations within a year in the principal prefectures of this province, namely, Hing-gan, Fung-ts'iang, T'ung-chau, Shang-chau, and Yüen-yang. These are all places of great importance. As, however, both men and means are scarce, we must go softly. When the church at Han-chung gets thoroughly energized, there will be no lack of the workers.

PLAN PROPOSED.

"My plan is this: I would not attempt to open a chapel at first, but would send a couple of men to open a shop, and call it Kiu-shï-t'ang [Salvation Hall—a title often taken by native medicine shops, and occasionally used for Protestant chapels.] The natives should sell suitable medicines, and especially remedies for curing opium-smokers. After a time, shorter or longer according to circumstances, the selling of tracts and useful books might be added. If the Christians were faithful and earnest, I should hope that many souls would be won for Christ. By very slow degrees a resident missionary and a chapel might be introduced, if desired; but in many places visitation and supervision would suffice. I should say $150 or $175 would be required for the first year, including the deposit on the house and the stock needed to commence with. Subsequently, $125 a year would cover needful expenses, and soon half or more of this might come in from the profits. If only the natives do all they can, they will have abundant opportunities of talking with the customers on the subject of the Gospel. The books published by the Hankow Tract Society and the Shanghai American Press, on religion, science, history etc., would sell well."

RACHEL FERGUSON'S APPEAL.

(See Illustration.)

A YOUNG lady lay sick of a dangerous malady in the house of a prominent merchant in a western city. All that wealth and scientific skill could do for her benefit had been tried, but without avail. The sands of life were fast running out, and if she had not had the certain assurance of a mansion beyond the skies, her lot would have been but a sad one. As it was, she contemplated the near approach of death with equanimity, satisfied that, for her, it was only the passage to a better life. The physician then attending her had prescribed stimulants, but these Rachel Ferguson had steadily refused to take. She knew, as he did, that they could not save her life, and she preferred to bear the pain rather than resort to such means of alleviating it. Her parents and friends called her firmness on this question obstinacy, but refrained from pressing upon her in her enfeebled condition anything obviously distasteful to her.

During her illness she asked several times that one of her friends, a Mrs. Stafford, should be sent for. Mrs. Stafford was away from home, but on her return, learning of her sick friend's desire to see her, she came at once. On her arrival Mrs. Ferguson took her aside before she went to Rachel's chamber, and said: "I do not know why my daughter is so anxious to see you, but she has asked many times after you. I think you have more influence over her than any other of her friends; will you use it for her good?" Then she told her of Dr. Pelter's advice and of Rachel's refusal to follow it.

"Ah! Emily," said the sick girl, as Mrs. Stafford entered the room, "I am so glad to see you; I have been hoping these many days you might come before it was too late."

"Do not speak so, Rachel," Mrs. Stafford said; "I hope you are better than you think. If you are a docile patient and obey your physicians, there may be many years of life before you."

"No, Emily, I am not deceiving myself with false hopes; I know that I cannot recover. I should have liked to live if it had been God's will, but He knows best, and I am quite content to go. At first it seemed very hard to leave so many dear and affectionate friends and all the joys of life, but that is past now, and I am ready to go when the time comes."

"But we would rather you did not go, Rachel. Life will never be quite the same for me, if you die. And think of your father and mother; it is like death to them to part with you. Are you sure you are doing all you can to get well? I hear that Dr. Pelter has recommended at least one remedy you have not tried."

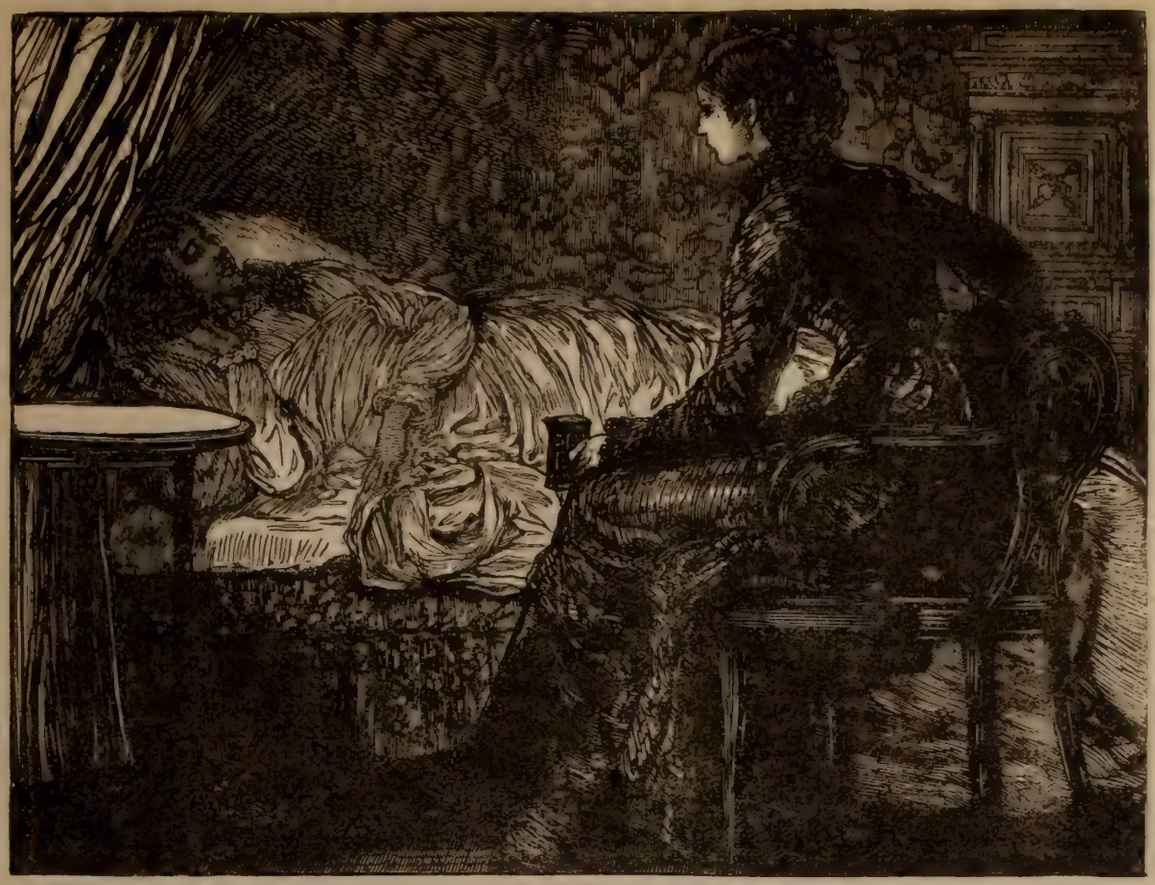
"It is only one, Emily, and it would not have cured me; it was only to help me to bear the pain. No, I have not taken that, but I have taken all his medicines."

"I wish you had tried it, Rachel, for all our sakes. See here," Mrs. Stafford said, rising and going to a small table in the room on which medicines and the delicacies an invalid might fancy, were standing, "I have just poured a little wine into this goblet, and I am going to see you drink it. I drink three or four times as much every day, and it does me good. Come now, oblige me."

"It grieves me to refuse you anything," said the sick girl, "but I cannot take it. Do not urge me; it would do me no real good. I have resolved not to touch it while I live, and it was chiefly about that that I wanted so much to see you. Emily, I would so like you to abstain from it, too."

"Why, my dear girl? I think it is a very pleasant and harmless thing for me. If I were ever in danger of becoming too fond of it, I should give it up immediately. Abstainers seem so odd and unsociable. I dislike being conspicuous."

"I think," said Rachel, "that is a cross we may easily bear for the sake of others. Your example may do more good to the poor slaves of the glass than you think. I pray God you may never become a slave yourself. Do think of it, Emily, when I am gone, and if you can make the sacrifice, I am sure you would be happier. But there is something more important still. I wish you would give your heart to the Saviour, Emily."



Rachel Ferguson's Last Interview with Mrs. Stafford.

Mrs. Stafford's face became grave. These serious subjects were distasteful to the lady, all whose joys and pleasures were found in social gayety. She was silent a few moments, and then said: "I expect I shall think of these things some day, but I want a few more years of pleasure before I settle down into a staid and solemn old lady."

"That is just the answer I should have given a year ago," said the sick girl. "This illness has opened my eyes. If I were well to-morrow I would not go back to the world. There are no pleasures or joys in it equal to those Jesus gives to those who love Him, and there are still higher delights in reserve. I am going away from earth, Emily, but I could not bear to die without telling you of this, and assuring you solemnly that the truest happiness lies in serving Christ. Promise me you will think of this and pray for yourself as I have prayed for you."

"Yes, my dear, I will," said Mrs. Stafford, leaning over and kissing her friend. "I must go now, but I will come again soon."

Mrs. Stafford went away solemnized and uncomfortable, but she had engaged to be at the theatre that night to see a new burlesque. It was a very amusing piece, and when she returned the serious impressions were gone. A few days afterward she called again at the house of her friend, but she learned that Rachel had died triumphantly only a few hours before, rejoicing in hope of a glorious immortality. Mrs. Stafford was shocked and saddened, but again there was some amusement to neutralize the good influence working within her. The most urgent of all matters for any human being was again postponed.

* * * * * *

Ten years later, one cold winter night, there was a call at the hospital telephone for an ambulance. In a few minutes "the case" was brought in. A bedraggled woman under the influence of liquor had fallen in attempting to board a car, and had been run over by a passing truck. The surgeons examined her, and found that she was fatally injured. There was no hope. That was their verdict, and it was true in a spiritual as well as a physical sense. The next day she was conscious, and was told that she must die. "No hope!" she cried, in a hoarse voice. "No hope! Dying! I cannot die."

But she did die. A degraded woman, divorced for drunkenness, a vicious, bad woman whom none cared to own. In ten years it had come to that. Mrs. Stafford had put off the Holy Spirit's pleading until it was too late, and she lay dead and unclaimed in her poor hospital bed, while her soul was—where?

MRS. CHANTREY'S SECRET.

A SERIAL STORY.

Almost Shipwrecked.

MR. CHANTREY was no theoretical Christian preacher. To him the doctrines he had taught were living, active principles. God was not an abstraction but a living Being to whom he prayed and whom he called "Father." Yet this was a trial to him. It was no easy matter to say, "Thy will be done." Far away from the village he loved, from the old church where he had ministered, from that well-remembered spot where his child lay buried, he must lie down and die.

Truly, his lot was a bitter one. He might even now be sitting in his library, or standing at the bedside of some dying parishioner, smoothing the way to the dark river and cheering the fainting heart in the last conflict. But he was banished, and banished, too, for the sake of another. His wife's sinful weakness had forced this fatal journey upon him. For love of her—to save her he had surrendered all he held dear in this world. Weak and delicate as he was he had braved the dangers of the deep and the terrors of a rapid passage through widely varying temperatures, that he might remove her from the scene of her fall and temptation.

But now it seemed the sacrifice had been made in vain. He felt sure he must die there in that stifling cabin with the storm howling above his head and the icy waves roaring around him. Die, and leave his work undone. Die, and leave his wife alone to sink back into her sin and shame and his boy to the care of a woman who was too weak even to control her appetites. It was hard, but the sick man never lost his faith in God. He fought out his battle with the tempter, and with a firm voice said, "Thy will be done."

Sophy Chantrey was left along to nurse her dying husband, for Ann Holland was lying ill in her own cabin, ignorant of his extremity. Captain Scott came down for a minute or two, but he could not stay beside him. His presence was sorely needed on deck, yet he lingered awhile, looking sorrowfully at his friend. Sophy watched him with a clearer and keener glance in her blue eyes than he had ever yet seen in them.

"What is the matter with him?" she asked, following him to the cabin door.

"As near dying as possible," he answered, gruffly. He believed that a good life had been sacrificed to a bad one, and he could not bring himself to speak softly to the woman who was the cause of it.

"Dying!" she cried. There was no color to fade from her face, but the light died from her eyes, and the word faltered on her lips.

"Yes," he answered, "dying."

"Sophy, come to me," called her husband, in feeble tones.

She left the captain, and returned at once to his side. The low berth was almost on the floor, and she had to kneel to bring her face nearer to his. It was night, and the only light was the dim glimmer of an oil-lamp, which the captain had hung to the ceiling, and which swung to and fro with the lurching of the ship. The wind was whistling shrilly among the rigging, and every plank and board in the vessel groaned and creaked under the beating of the waves. Now and then her feet were ankle-deep in water, and she dreaded to see it sweep over the low berth.

In the rare intervals of the storm she could hear the hurried movements overhead, and the shouts of the sailors as they called to one another from the rigging. But vaguely she heard, and saw, and felt. Her husband's face, white and haggard and thin, with his gray hair and his eyes sunken with unshed tears, was all that she could distinctly realize.

"Sophy," he said, "do not leave me again."

He held out his hand, and she laid hers into it, shuddering as she felt its chilly grasp. Her head fell on to the pillow beside his, and her lips, close to his ear, spoke to him through sobs.

"Is there nothing that can be done?" she cried. "It is I who have killed you. Must you really die for my sin, and leave us?"

"I think I must die," he said, touching her head softly with his feeble hand. "I would live for you if I could—for you and my poor boy. Sophy, promise me while I can hear you, while you can speak to me, promise me you will never fall into this sin again."

"How can I?" she cried. "I have killed you, and now who will care?"

"God will care," he said, faintly, "and I shall care; wherever I may be I shall care. Promise me, my darling, my poor girl!"

"I promise you," she answered, with a deep sob.

"You will never let yourself enter into temptation?"

"Never!" she cried.

"Never taste it; never look at it; never think of it, if possible. Promise," he whispered again.

"Never!" she sobbed; "never! Oh, live, and you shall see me conquer. God will help me to conquer, and you will help me. Do not leave us. O God, do not let him die!"

But he did not hear her. A faintness and numbness that seemed like death, which had been creeping languidly through his veins for some time, darkened his eyes and sealed his lips. He could not see her, and her voice sounded far away. She called again and again upon him, but there was no answer. The deep roar of the storm on the other side of the frail wooden walls thundered continuously, and the groan of the straining planks grated upon her ear as she listened intently for one or more word from him.

Was she then alone with him, dying? Was there no help, nothing that could be at least attempted for his help? Through the uproar and tumult she caught the sound of some one stirring in the saloon. She sprang to the door, and met Captain Scott on the point of opening it.

"Come," said she frantic with terror; "he is dead already."

The captain bent over the dying man, and with the promptitude of one to whom time was of the utmost value passed his hand rapidly over his benumbed and paralyzed body.

"No, not dead," he exclaimed; "but he's sinking fast, and there's only one remedy. You can leave him to die, or you can save him, Mrs. Chantrey. There is no one else to nurse him, and every moment is precious to me. Here's a brandy-flask. Give him some at once; force a few drops through his teeth, and watch the effect it has upon him. As he swallows it give him a little more every few minutes. Watch him carefully; it will be life or death with him. If I can get down again I'll come in to see you, but I am badly wanted on deck this moment. There's enough there, but not too much, remember. Get him warm, if possible. God bless you, Mrs. Chantrey."

He had been busily heaping rugs and blankets upon his friend's insensible form; and now, with a hearty grasp of the hand, and an earnest glance into her face, he hurried away, leaving Sophy alone once more.

A shudder of terror ran through her, and she called to him not to leave her; but he did not hear. She stood in the middle of the cabin, looking around as if for help, but there was none. The craving, which had been starved within her by the forced abstinence of the last few weeks, awoke again with insufferable fierceness. She was cold herself, chilled to the very heart; her misery of body and soul were extreme. The dim light and the ceaseless roar of the storm oppressed her. The very scent of the brandy seemed to intoxicate her, and steal away her resolution.

If she took but a very little of it, she reasoned with herself, she would be better fitted for the long, exhausting task of watching her husband. How would she have strength to stand over him through the cold, dark hours of the night, feeble and worn out as she already felt herself? For his sake, then, she must taste it; she would take but a very little. The captain had said there was not more than enough; but surely he would give her more, to save her husband's life. Only a little, just to stay the intolerable craving.

Sophy poured out a small portion into the little horn belonging to the flask. The strong spirituous scent excited her. How warm, and strong, and useful it would make her to her husband in his extremity! Yet still she hesitated. Suppose she could not resist the temptation to take more, and yet more, until she lost her consciousness, and left him to perish with cold and faintness? She knew how often she had resolved to take but a taste, enough to drive away the painful dejection of the passing hour; and how fatally her resolution had failed her, when once she had yielded. If she should fail now, if the temptation conquered her, there was no shadow of a hope for him. When she came to her senses again he would be dead.

Why did not somebody come to her help? Where was Ann Holland, that she should be away just at the very moment when her presence was most desirable and most necessary? How could Captain Scott think of trusting her with poison? How could she do battle with so close and subtle a tempter? So long a battle, too; through all the dreary hours of the storm! Only a little while ago she had made a solemn promise never to fall into this sin, never to enter into temptation. But she had been thrust into temptation unawares, in an instant, with no one to help her, and no time to gather strength for resistance.

Even David himself could not blame her if she broke her promise. It should be only a taste; it could not be more than that, for the flask was not full; and now she came to think of it she could not get on deck to ask the captain for more, because the hatches were closed. That would save her from taking too much. She would keep the thought before her that every drop she swallowed was taken from her dying husband, for whom there was barely enough. She could only taste it, and she did it for his sake, not her own.

She lifted the little horn to her lips; but before tasting the stimulant, she glanced round, as she had often done before, to see if any one was looking at her; a stealthy cunning movement, born of the sense of shame she had never quite lost. Every nerve was quivering with excitement, and her heart was beating quickly. But her glance fell upon her husband's face turned toward her, yet with no watchful, reproachful eyes fastened upon her. The eyelids half closed; the pallid, hollow cheeks; the head fallen back upon the pillow, looked like death. Was he then gone from her already? Had she suffered his flickering life to die out altogether, while she had been dallying with temptation?

With a wild and very bitter cry Sophy Chantrey sprang to his side, and forced a few drops of the eau-de-vie between his clenched teeth. Again and again, patiently, she repeated her efforts, watching eagerly for the least sign of returning animation. Every thought of herself was gone now; she became absorbed between alternate hope and dread. He was alive still; slowly the death-like pallor was passing away, faint tokens of returning circulation tingled through his benumbed veins. The beating of his heart was stronger, and his hands seemed less icily cold. But so slowly, and with so many intermissions, did the change creep on, that she did not dare to assure herself that he was reviving.

Now and then the scent made her feel sick with terror; for she knew that his life depended upon her unceasing attention, and the tempter was still beside her, though thrust back for the time by her newly-awakened will. "I will not let him die!" she cried to herself; yet she was inwardly fearful of failing in her resolution, and leaving him to die. Would the daylight never come? Would the storm never cease?

It was raging more wildly than ever; and Captain Scott found it impossible to go below, even though his friend was probably dying. Sophy was left absolutely alone. It seemed to her like an eternity, as she knelt beside her husband, desperately fighting against sin, and intently watching for some sure sign of life in him. He was not dead, that was almost all she knew. The night was dark still, and very lonely. There was no one who saw her, none to care for her; and her misery was very great.

Was there none who cared? A still small voice in her own soul, long unheard, but speaking clearly through the din of the storm around and within her, asked, "Does not Christ care? He who came to seek and to save that which was lost? He whom God sent into the world to be the Captain of salvation, and to suffer being tempted, that He might be able to succor all those who are tempted?" For a moment she listened breathlessly as if some new thing had been said to her. Christ really cared for her; really knew her extremity in this dire temptation; was ready with His help, if she would but have it. Could it be true? If He were beside her, witnessing her temptation and her struggling, seeing and entering into all the bitterness of the passing hours, why! then such a presence and such a sympathy were a thousand times greater and better than if all the world beside had been by to cheer her. Why had she never realized this before? He knew; God knew; she was not alone, because the Father Himself was with her.

She had no time to pray consciously, in so many words of set speech; but her whole heart was full of prayer and hope. The terror of temptation was gone; nay, for the time, the temptation itself was gone, for she was lifted up far above it. She could use the powerful remedy on which her husband's life depended with no danger to herself. Her thoughts ran busily forward into a blissful future. How happy they would all be again! How diligently she would guard herself! Her life henceforth should be spent as under the eye of God.

At last the morning dawned, and a gray light stole even through the darkened port-holes—a faint light, but sufficient for her to see her husband's face more clearly. His heart beat under her hand with more vigor, and the color had come back to his lips. She could see now how every drop he swallowed brought a more healthy hue to his face. He had attempted to speak more than once, but she laid her hand on his mouth to enforce silence until his strength was more equal to the effort. At last he whispered so earnestly that she could not refuse to listen.

"Sophy," he said, "is it safe for you?"

"Yes," she answered; "God has made it safe for me."

(To be concluded.)

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 30. Golden Text, Psalm 107 : 43. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Wrong Point of Observation—Consequent Perplexity—The Tranquilizing Light—Losses Apparent, not Real—The Law and the Leader—The First Manifestation of Power—Possession Beyond Faith—Failures Across Jordan—Decreasing Self-Dependence—Progressive Revelation—Safety in Christ's Life—Education for Union—Praying and Believing.

"WHOSO is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving kindness of the Lord." It is always so that when men observe circumstances apart from God, they are filled with bitterness, perplexity, trouble, or despair. Their point of observation is self—how things affect me, what relation they bear to me, and always in reference to time, not eternity. Looked at in this light, every sickness is an injury done to me by some higher power, every bereavement is a cruelty. If in business everything does not bow to me, then the God whom I profess to call my God is tantalizing me; I am doing the best for myself, He is thwarting me at every turn. This is the general idea of God which men have who do not know Him. But let the revelation of a God of love, a God who loves me be made to me, One who spared not His own Son, but freely gave Him up for me, let me be persuaded of the love this God has for me, let me have come under its warmth, let me place every confidence in a God personally known and trusted, let me believe that He, seeing the end from the beginning and looking right on into eternity, makes all things to work together for my good—then things will all be seen in the light of His love, and I shall "understand the lovingkindness of the Lord."

Our lessons for the past quarter began with which God wrought for His trusting people. The death of Moses was no real loss, but a great gain, making way for Joshua, to whom the real conquest of the land of Canaan was committed. Perhaps many of us, on looking back to an apparent loss, may ponder and see in its results the wonderful and unspeakable lovingkindness of the Lord. Moses seemed so necessary to the children of Israel, he had led them out of Egypt, when their bondage to the Egyptians was broken, he had led them through the wilderness, but Moses could not give them one bit of their promised possessions. "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ" (John 1 : 17). Many of us have learned by the law how terrible was our state of sin by nature; we have been brought out from it, and into the wilderness experience of fighting with the world, the flesh, and the devil, with alternate victory and defeat; marvellously sustained, yet always longing for a peace, a joy, a satisfaction which we did not, as yet, possess. But when Moses gives way to Joshua, when we become dead to the law by the body of Christ (Rom. 7 : 4), then it is that Jesus, our Joshua, takes things into His own hands, and a new life in Christ opens up within us. All is now changed; there is no more wandering over and over again the same ground, no more consciousness that something of judgment and condemnation attaches to the experience we are passing through. The old spirit of drive, urging, whipping, pushing us on to action, is supplanted by the blessed consciousness that "all things are possible with Him" who is our Leader.

THE FIRST MANIFESTATION of God's power on behalf of the children of Israel was when they reached the Jordan. Here an apparently insuperable barrier lay in their way. "They had the experience of the Red Sea," you will say. True, but only two of those who had passed through the Red Sea were present here—Caleb and Joshua. God did not repeat Himself, He did not make the waters to stand up like a wall on either side as He had done when He divided the Red Sea, but the nether waters of Jordan flowed away and only the upper waters stood still until the people were passed over. Jordan means the river of judgment, and the children of Israel were to experience all the judgment of their past lives rolled away, and all judgment of the present stayed back by the ark of the covenant which stood still in Jordan. Jordan passed, every new step was possession, "Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon that have I given you." When Jesus has His right place as the Leader in our life, then there is lasting gain in every hour's experience, every step of ground is an entering into possession of our heirship with God and joint heirship with Christ. We may lack, we do lack most sadly the faith to claim it; but all the land of promise is most really ours. Led by Jesus, the engines to destroy our difficulties are songs of praise. The fortified walls of Jericho cannot stand against them. If, instead of surveying our difficulties at home, in the office, in our church, in our state of health, etc., we put our Joshua to the front, and glory in the glad certainty that He has undertaken all, then we cannot but be filled with joy and thanksgiving, and the mightiest walls fall down before us. The tempers, the self-will, the inconsiderateness, the contradiction, the misunderstandings of others, and our own soreness about them, all fall conquered and overcome, when our praise bears witness that all the care of these things is gone into the hands of the Almighty God.

BUT THERE ARE FAILURES,

too, in the land of promise, different from those in the wilderness. There was the temptation at Ai to self-dependence and at the same time there was a falling into sin, a covetousness, not of leeks, onions, garlic, or flesh, as in the wilderness, but a sacrilegious appropriation of God's portion for self, a withholding that which He had judged, and above all duplicity in concealing the sin. Oh, how this teaches us that even in the path of habitual victory we are not in a state on which we can rely, it is not ourselves, however much changed, who can keep us, we are more dependent on the Lord than ever, it is Himself who is our Power and our Victory, He keeps us, and our song will be Jesus only. It is most appropriate that in the land of promise, the mind of God should be made fully known; the law was read on Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim. As our experience of the power of God on our behalf becomes more and more known to us, He opens our eyes to read and understand His mind in the Scriptures; and He writes His law upon our hearts. While under the law, we are sometimes almost afraid to know the real mind of God, because the impossibility of living up to it presses so strongly upon us. But where the glorious "I can" supersedes the sigh of "I ought," which was the old experience, then we want to know more of the mind of God, that by His prevailing grace we may do it. And if the mind of God is made known to us by some faithful friend who has seen us in danger, or noticed our mistakes, there is no feeling of mortification or of wounded pride when we have laid over on our Joshua Jesus the responsibility of keeping us in the will of God. Therefore, there can be no purpose in keeping ourselves self-deceived or in seeking to keep others deceived about us. In all these lessons we have seen the deep, unutterable love of Jesus brought out in type. In the cities of refuge we learned through the meanings of the names how Christ alone was our Refuge, and He perfectly so as our Holiness, our Strength, our Fellowship—for God and man meet in Him—our Fortress, our Height of witness, our Joy. But that which He is to us as our City of Refuge we shall never fully know until our union with Him is fully consummated hereafter; "Himself" means more every day.

But Joshua, after all, was but a type of Jesus, and Joshua must die. While he lived, Israel followed and served the Lord, and he said, "As for me and my house we will serve the Lord." Blessed type! All who are really the household of Jesus do serve the Lord. He is the "Son over His own house; whose house are we?" (Heb. 3 : 6.) But when Joshua died, Israel forsook God; again the type is so true, it is which keeps us faithful; their leader dead, then followed fall after fall, sin after sin. Bless God, our Jesus can never die, but those who live their own life in any sense, any life but His, must sooner or later fall away; the life, the power, the faithfulness, the love are in Jesus and not in us. True, judges were raised up, and there is much to learn from them. In Gideon we have seen how fully God chooses the foolish, weak, base, despised things of the world, even the things which "are not," to bring to naught things which are, that no flesh should glory in His presence. We have seen that Gideon had nothing to boast of, neither riches, position, power, nor talent; his very faith in God was of the weakest and most trembling kind, there was nothing in him but his very nothingness to commend him to God; and yet he was made mighty, even a mighty man of valor. Again in the case of Samson, strong though he was, it was the strength of faith as a man consecrated to God, and nothing in himself, and his death did more for Israel than his life.

In the history of Ruth and Naomi, we were led to see in type the bride of Christ and her with Him. First the full decision to leave her own country and her father's house, then the true spirit of discipleship in her tenacity of love to Naomi, developing a heart not self-centred, but whose centre was in another. Then the disinterested serving, not for gain and the true humility which led her to take the lowest place, and marvel at the kindness which was shown to her; all this, unconsciously to herself, fitting her for a position of honor. How little do we know how perfectly the Lord has adapted the circumstances of our lives to work together as instruments to repress or to develop, as He sees it is needed. We may not know the issues of every trying circumstance, we may not discover the meaning of every hour in which the tension of our faith may be at the highest pitch; but He may be bringing out through all this our acquaintance with Him and a repose of trust in Him, which will make Him joy over us with singing. He seeks to unite us even now with Him in a union always more intimate and real; it is beyond conception, words cannot speak, but the heart filled with Jesus knows what it is.

Our last two lessons for the quarter were the praying mother and the child Samuel; the one answers to the other. Praying mothers who are also believing mothers, counting, not on their prayers, but on the faithfulness of God, may look to have prophet sons, obedient to the Lord. Faith may be much tried, sorely tried, but the mother's "hand upon the throne of the Lord" (Ex. 17 : 16, margin) is the claim for the Lord's hand upon her son. God is faithful; He will never fail a mother who counts upon Him. And Samuel, the child, yet the chosen one, oh, how he teaches us the wisdom of God, who has "hid these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in Thy sight" (Matt. 11 : 25, 26). Amen.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Republican Agitation in Europe is Causing general uneasiness among the crowned heads and their nobles. The Paris correspondent of the New York Herald, in a letter cabled last week, said: "The moment has at last arrived when it is no longer possible to conceal the fact that Europe is becoming honeycombed with the germs of republican aspirations. These are now latent, but at the slightest encouragement are ready to burst forth into burning activity, causing a political cataclysm analogous to the physical commotions at Ischia and Batavia. The battle cries are no longer Germany and France, Slav and Teuton or Latin, but the great issue is between divine right on the one hand and civil liberty on the other. The Holy Alliance and the compact of divine right at Laibach was followed by the revolutions of 1848, and the consequent hegira of crowned heads—Kaiser Wilhelm himself riding away from Berlin disguised as a postilion. Just as the Holy Alliance of 1883 is stronger and more solid than that of 1815, so will the coming reaction be more far-reaching and intense than that of 1848, for the explosive force of revolutions, like that of gunpowder, is in mathematical proportion to the resistance." These, be it remembered, are the words of the correspondent of a secular journal, and describe the results of his observations of the movements now pulsating through Europe. Students of prophecy more than twenty years ago arrived at the conclusion that such a time was approaching, and that it would be marked by aspirations after a Republican form of government. The attitude of Prince Napoleon, too, is precisely that expected from him. In an interview published in the Paris Figaro, the prince said: "My conduct depends entirely upon the conduct of the Count de Paris. If the Count de Paris does nothing I shall do nothing. That would be like answering a letter that had not yet been received. If the Count de Paris issues a manifesto I shall issue a manifesto. If the Count de Paris leans toward the Right I shall lean toward the Left. If the Count de Paris adopts as his programme the will of his father, the Duke of Orleans, then I shall go, if need be, as far as socialism."

Negotiations for a Settlement of the Difficulty between China and France were carried forward last week, but without definite result. It is believed that England is mediating, as the representatives of both the hostile Powers were in conference with Lord Granville, the British Secretary of State, on Saturday, and long communications were subsequently telegraphed to Paris and Pekin. There has, however, been no cessation in the preparations for war. France continues sending reinforcements to the army in Tonquin, and China is laying in stores and concentrating her troops on the frontier. The situation is critical, but if the mediation of England has been accepted, it is not hopeless. England would be certain to exert herself to the utmost to arrange the difficulty peaceably, as in the event of a conflict she would probably become involved.

Alarming Riots Occurred at Canton on September 10th. The Chinese are aggrieved by the conduct of France in Tonquin, and their animosity extends to Americans and English and Germans. To the Chinaman every one outside of China is a foreigner, and he draws no distinction between nations. There is consequently danger that if war with France should break out, missionaries and merchants of other nationalities would suffer. It was so in the recent riots. A quarrel arose between a Portuguese half-caste employed as a watchman on the quay and a Chinaman. A struggle ensued, and the Chinaman was pushed into the river and drowned. A boat of the British steamer Hankow picked up the body and carried it on board. They also took on board the Portuguese, the latter being taken out of reach of the excited mob, who set fire to the buildings. A terrible panic took place. Ladies and children, many only half dressed, and some in a fainting condition, were hurried on board the ships through a threatening crowd. No attack, however, was made upon them, the mob being more intent upon plunder than upon taking life. Stores were burst open and houses set on fire. Ten English establishments, one American, one French and two German were burned to the ground, and two English, one German and one French house were sacked by the mob. A party, consisting of nine Germans and three Englishmen, opened fire upon the crowd. The latter returned the fire, and four or five Chinese were killed and many wounded. When the fray had lasted half an hour the Chinese troops arrived and dispersed the mob. The consuls have made a joint formal complaint to the viceroy of the delay in sending troops after notification had been given of the tumult. Outbreaks at other treaty ports are apprehended.

The Platforms of the Radical Party in Great Britain show rapid progress. That recently put forward by the candidate of the party for member of Parliament for Manchester comprises the abolition of the House of Lords, adult manhood suffrage, the payment of members of Parliament, the disestablishment of the Church, the abolition of Parliamentary oaths, secular free and compulsory education, and local self-government for Ireland. As will be seen this platform shows a wider divergence between the Radicals and the Whigs than exists between the Whigs and the Tories. The divisions in the party will be thoroughly discussed at the approaching conference at Leeds, and an effort made to adjust them. The basis proposed by Mr. Chamberlain, the Radical chief, will be that the entire party accept the platform as the ultimate object of its efforts, on condition that the Radicals subordinate the more extreme measures for the present to insure a united front at the polls.

The Liquor Business of the Episcopal Church of England is not so extensive as was supposed. An inquiry shows that the property belonging to the Church, which was rented to liquor sellers, has been in many cases disposed of, and in others has been used for other purposes. There is, however, much still to be done in the way of reform, and Canon Wilberforce continues his vigorous attack upon the holding of public houses, a number of the most prosperous gin-palaces being still maintained under the direct administration of the Church. Strenuous efforts have kept this scandal quiet and prevented the impairment of the Church revenues, which the application of a remedy would entail. Those efforts are likely to be defeated by the agitation led by Canon Wilberforce, and the Church will be forced to get rid of all its liquor stores. The loss in money will be heavy, but there will be an immense gain in influence.

Mr. Philip Phillips, the "Singing Pilgrim," and his son have just completed fifty successive Services of Sacred Song in Rev. T. G. Smith's Evangelical Church, Amsterdam. A few earnest Christians of influence and wealth invited Mr. Phillips to give these services, believing they would do good, and at the same time counteract some of the demoralizing influences and amusements which generally accompany an International Exhibition.

The Luther Celebration in Germany Gathers strength as it proceeds. Wittenberg, where the great reformer taught in the university, held its quatre-centennial anniversary on September 13th. Colossal busts of Luther and Melanchthon had been placed on the balcony of the Town Hall and on stands throughout the city. The Emperor's bust in front of the Town Hall was decorated with flowers. Portraits of Luther and mottoes from his sayings and writings were displayed in many windows. The number of visitors is estimated at 50,000. They came principally from Thuringia, Saxony, and Brandenburg. Delegates from Hungary, Austria, and France also took part in the celebration. On arriving at Wittenberg the Crown Prince Frederick William, with Prince Albrecht and Herr Von Gossler, Minister of Ecclesiastical Affairs, drove direct to the Stadt-kirche and attended divine service. Over 1000 clergymen filled the church. After the reading of the liturgy, Superintendent-General Schultz delivered the festival sermon, taking his text from St. Matthew 21 : 42, 43. The royal party then proceeded to the Schloss-kirche, where the Crown Prince placed a splendid laurel wreath upon Luther's grave. The party afterward inspected the archives in the Town Hall relating to the Reformation.

Mr. Hartland, a Devoted Young Missionary of the Baptist Missionary Society, who went out to the Congo with Mr. Comber and others about four years ago, has succumbed to a severe attack of dysentery. Amid acute suffering of body, his mind was kept in a state of almost seraphic joy and peace. His dying words to his beloved fellow-workers were: "Christ is all in all. Let me go, my friends. Don't hold me back. I must go. I want to go to Him. 'Simply to Thy cross I cling.' Let me go." His struggles then ceased, and he was gone.

A Mohammedan Witness for Christ.—The Pastor Jacob of Oroomiah, Persia, writing to his son, in Manchester, England, narrates the following: "I have a young Mohammedan friend, whose name is Koola Bak. For nearly a year and a half he has been coming to my house to hear the Word of God. Some wicked people went and complained to their Great Moshtahed, or priest, who sent for him and asked what was his faith. He replied, 'In Jesus Christ.' Upon hearing this the Moshtahed rose up in great rage and beat him with his stick on the head. He was then bound upon a beam and beaten by three servants with switches until the blood gushed out of his back and feet. Shortly afterward the young man came to my house with his bleeding body, and told me all about it. He said to me: 'Pastor, I will not give up Christ, even if I am to be killed. I believe that He is able to deliver me from these wicked people.' A few days after this incident took place, the Moshtahed sent a gift to the young man and asked his pardon. The next day the Moshtahed with his brother visited the young man's house, and they still tried to win his heart, but he boldly said, 'No, it is impossible for me to forsake Jesus.' So they left him and went their way."

A Little Girl in a Tiger's Skin.—Miss Ada Leigh, writing from Paris, calls attention to the cruelties practised upon young children in training them for various performances. She says: "In visiting one of the haunts of the poor in Paris the cry of a child in pain arrested us. The sound of blows guided us to the door of an adjoining apartment, where a man was forcing a little girl into a tiger's skin, in which she was to perform. Besides the child's natural recoil at being clothed in such a garment, the skin was too tight for the muscles of her arms, so that her cry of fear was mingled with pain. Finding that the child did not belong to the man, and that its mother, an English gypsy, was then on a tour with some foreign troupe, we prevailed upon the man to give it to us—in fact, it would have been difficult to separate us, so tight was the grasp of the affrighted child. The man assented, only bemoaning that she had nearly burst the skin and spoiled his profits. The little girl was a merry inmate of our children's home for nearly two years, then, more than reluctantly, we gave her up to her gypsy mother, who appeared indignant at the cruel initiation of her child into the art of amusing a thoughtless crowd."

MADAGASCAR has now for several months occupied an unusual interest in the attention of the world. This is due to the fact that the peaceful progress of the island in civilization, under Christian influences, has been suddenly arrested by the domineering action of the French in the island, and the arrest and imprisonment of Mr. G. A. Shaw, one of the agents of the London Missionary Society, for alleged political offences. (His portrait appears on our front page.) Happily he has been set at liberty, and will soon resume his evangelistic work at Tamatave. But recently a telegram was received at the Missionary Society's House in London, stating that the Queen of Madagascar had died on July 13th. We avail ourselves, therefore, of the double event to refer to some of the incidents which marked the reign of the late queen, and the circumstances which have given to the name of Mr. Shaw such publicity.

There are only two islands in the world larger than Madagascar. It is situated not far from the African Continent, and is 980 miles in length and 360 at its greatest breadth, extending over an area nearly twice as large as the British Isles, and has a population of about 3,000,000. In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for January 25th, 1883, we gave an account of the original heathen condition of the country, and the introduction of Christianity, together with several instances of suffering and martyrdom heroically sustained by some of the earliest converts to Christ.

THE LATE QUEEN,

whose portrait appears on our frontispiece, was named Ranavalona II. She succeeded to the throne, at the death of her sister Rasohérina, on April 1st, 1868. After she had been elected queen she adopted the Christian religion. The late queen, while her deceased predecessor lay in state, read portions of an old Bible, which for some time lay on a table in the palace, and from the perusal of that Book the queen decided to embrace the faith for which many distinguished people of her country had suffered loss of life. (This incident is illustrated in the picture between the two portraits on our front page.) One of her first acts, as sovereign, was to issue a proclamation closing all Sunday markets, which was generally obeyed.

THE CORONATION.

The great national transaction equivalent to coronation in other countries, but here called the showing or presenting of the sovereign, took place on September 3d, 1868. The queen, with a hundred ladies of rank, ascended a richly decorated platform, and appeared before her people. She was enthusiastically cheered. Then, surrounded by the high-officers of her kingdom, she took her seat beneath the canopy, on the front of which were inscribed in shining letters the Malagasy words signifying, "Glory be to God;" on the other sides, "Good will among men," "On earth peace," and "God shall be with us." On one hand of her Majesty stood a small table with the crown, on the other a small table bearing a handsome Bible, sent to her predecessor, Radama II., whose portrait was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 25th, 1883, by the British and Foreign Bible Society. The queen wore a white satin dress, embroidered with crowns in gold, in the making of which, it is said, sixty native workpeople had been employed for a long time. Around her were the scarlet-clothed ladies of the royal family, and the members of the English and French missions.

The chief point of interest undoubtedly was the absence of all idols or charms, for Ranavalona II. was the first Malagasy sovereign who was crowned without these heathen appendages. A white silk flag, with the initials of her Majesty's name, and a royal crown superseded the idolatrous emblems, while the presence of the Bible and mottoes from the Word of God were a striking declaration of the change produced in public opinion since the death of the first queen of that name, only seven years before, when Christianity was proscribed, and its professors cruelly persecuted. The most notable event of the following year was the burning of the idols, which was fully described in our previous narrative.

EDUCATION AND REFORMS.

From the very outset of her reign Ranavalona II. showed an earnestness in seeking the welfare of her people, which is unusual in the character of royal personages. Under her sway education made rapid advances, and in the principal schools of the provinces there are now about 150,000 scholars. Frequently the queen displayed her interest in this work by personally distributing prizes to the pupils. (One such occasion is represented in panel numbered 2 of our frontispiece picture.) According to the native law, which previously operated, all the men in Madagascar were liable to government service in lieu of taxes. The late queen enacted, however, that teachers and others occupied in education should be exempt from such service. Other enlightened changes which she brought about involved the extinction of considerable vested interests. Officers were accustomed to secure to themselves the services of men of lower grade, and many had thus acquired command of a thousand subordinates, but by a new law thirty was the maximum number allowed to the highest officer in the country. This reform was hailed with general satisfaction.

EMANCIPATION OF MOZAMBIQUE SLAVES.

Reforms were also introduced in the army, and the system of life service was abolished, the longest period now required being five years. Many alterations in the administration of justice were likewise made, the old system being regarded as corrupt. Litigation was frequently kept pending for years, bribery was common, and suitors unable to pay costs were in consequence sold into slavery. Under the new system the decision formerly resting with the judges was placed in the hands of a jury of twelve and a chief judge. The late queen has laid the foundations of constitutional government, and the important offices which she established are now held by natives educated in the college at Antananarivo. In 1877 Queen Ranavalona effected the emancipation of all the Mozambique slaves in her dominions, and the importation of slaves was declared illegal. Though domestic slavery still exists, it has been shorn of its worst features, and the public slave markets have been abolished. A few facts gathered from the past history of the island will show how radical were the changes effected.

During the persecution of the reign of Ranavalona I. many of those convicted of Christianity were to the view of the people every market day for months together, in order to intimidate others from following their example. They were thus "made a gazing-stock" and "had trial of cruel mockings," having frequently to endure the insults and contempt of a heathen mob, but in many instances their courage and steadfastness induced some of the bystanders to examine "the new doctrines for themselves," and finally to embrace the truth of which these faithful confessors were not ashamed. (The picture numbered 3 on our front page depicts one such scene.)

Not far from Antananarivo, the capital, there is a small village called Ambohitany. This was the seat of the idol Ramahavaly, who was considered the second in dignity and importance among the national gods. This idol was regarded as the patron or protector of serpents, and numbers of them are said to be found in the neighborhood of the village.

SERPENTS SET FREE.

For some alleged offence given to the idol, the followers and guardians of Ramahavaly were allowed to surround the house of Mr. Lyall, an English missionary, and set free a number of serpents in his courtyard. Being obliged to leave his dwelling, and proceed under a guard to a village at some distance, he was followed by the keeper of the idol who carried his god upon a pole covered with scarlet cloth. Behind him walked fifty athletic men, walking two abreast, having their bodies uncovered to the waist, each man bearing in his hand a serpent, which he held by means of a small quantity of straw. They moved along in profound silence, each man carrying the serpents frequently lifting the hand in which the reptile was carried, and exhibiting it to the spectators as it twined its slimy folds round his hand and arm. The people were thus impressed with the idea that the British resident was peculiarly obnoxious to the idol, and that the serpents were its emissaries and the visible agents of its vengeance. (See division of our frontispiece picture numbered 4).

A PECULIAR WAR-DANCE.

The Malagasy have a kind of dance, but it consists more in posturing and movements of the hands and arms than of the feet. Both sexes join in the amusement, but they do not dance together, as in the European waltz or polka. One of the tribes called the Sakalavas have a peculiar and picturesque dance, in which parties of men represent the various movements assumed in war. Thus, the attack, the conflict, the pursuit, the rejoicing after victory, etc., are all shown by a kind of dance action. Their guns, which are long, and studded with brass-headed nails, are repeatedly thrown up in the air and caught again in one hand, while a handkerchief or scarf is waved in the other. (Such a dance is shown in our frontispiece picture, section No 5.)

The 28th of March, 1849, will long be remembered as a terrible and yet a glorious day in the religious history of Madagascar. Nineteen Christians were condemned to death. Fifteen of them were sentenced to be

HURLED FROM A PRECIPICE.

Wrapped in mats, and with mats thrust into their mouths to prevent their speaking to each other or to the people, these fifteen heroic martyrs were hung by their hands and feet to poles, and carried to the place of execution. But the attempt wholly to stop their mouths failed, for they prayed and addressed the crowd as they were borne along. Thus they reached Ampamarinana. A rope was then firmly tied round the body of each, and, one by one, fourteen of them were lowered a little way over the precipice, which was a sheer depth of 150 feet. While in this position, and when it was hoped by their persecutors that their courage would fail, the executioner, holding a knife in his hand, stood waiting for the command of the officer to cut the rope. Then for the last time the question was addressed to them, "Will you cease to pray?" But the only answer returned was an emphatic "No." Upon this the signal was given, the rope was cut, and in another minute their mangled and bleeding bodies lay upon the rocks below.

HOW ONE OF THE CONDEMNED ESCAPED.

One only of the condemned was spared. A young woman, who was very much liked by the queen, was placed where she could see her companions fall, and was asked, at the instance of the queen—who wished to save her, but could not exempt her from the common sentence against the Christians—whether she would not worship the gods and save her life. She refused, manifesting so much determination to go with her brethren and sisters to heaven, that the officer standing by struck her on the head, and said, "You are a fool! you are mad!" They sent to the queen and told her that she had lost her reason, and should be sent to some place of safe keeping, which was accordingly done.

THE FATE OF FOUR NOBLES.

A more terrible fate was reserved for the remaining four. They belonged to the class of Andrians, or nobles; and as, by the traditional usages of the country, it was deemed unlawful to shed the blood of persons of this rank, by a refinement of cruelty they were condemned to be burned alive. This sentence was carried out at Faravohitra. They were allowed to walk to their death. With wonderful composure and confidence, these four Christians, one of whom was a woman, mounted the hill, singing some of those hymns which had been their joy in former times and were their solace now. There was no wavering, no shrinking back from the fiery ordeal. They reached the place, calmly gazed upon the preparations for death, and meekly surrendered themselves to be fastened to the stakes. Just then

A REMARKABLE PHENOMENON OCCURRED.

An immense rainbow, forming a triple arch, stretched across the heavens. One end appeared to rest on the posts to which the martyrs were tied. The rain in the mean time fell in torrents, and the multitude who were present on the occasion were so struck with amazement and terror at the occurrence, that many of them took to flight. The pile was kindled, and then from amid the crackling and roaring of the fire were heard, not the sounds of pain, but the song of praise. That scene (see No. 6 in our frontispiece picture), and the hymn which these martyrs sang as they rose in their fiery chariot to heaven, will never be forgotten in Madagascar. But prayer followed praise. "O Lord," they were heard to cry, "receive our spirits; for Thy love to us has caused this to come to us; and lay not this sin to their charge!" Thus another company was added to "the noble army of martyrs," and yet another proof afforded of the power of the love of Christ to make men and women faithful unto death.

THE CAUSE OF QUARREL WITH FRANCE.

The French have behaved like brutal freebooters in the island. They originally recognized the authority of the Hova dynasty over the whole island, but have recently set up a claim based on a treaty made with another tribe who had no right to make it. That treaty gave the French the power to hold land in perpetuity while the Hovas have good reason to refuse that privilege to any foreign power. Finding that the foreigners made the land they occupied a pest to the island, a centre from which spread drunkenness and other vices, the Hovas insisted on some means of checking the nuisance. They, therefore, refused to sanction the treaty, but were willing to encourage the residence of foreigners by granting them leases for thirty-five years, which would be renewed if the settlers conducted themselves decently. The French demanded the privileges granted in the treaty with the Sakalavas. Hence the quarrel and the conduct of France, which is a disgrace to any nation calling itself civilized.

The French at length proceeded to violent measures. They bombarded and destroyed the ports of Amorokanga and Mojanga, on the north-west coast of Madagascar. These acts of hostility were watched at Antananarivo with dismay. The Malagasy people resented the outrage deeply. A war spirit was aroused, and they determined to resist, with all their power, this attack upon their country.

NOBLE CONDUCT OF THE QUEEN.

This unprovoked attack by the French upon the ports was looked upon as a declaration of war; and on Friday, May 25th, the French residents were ordered to leave Antananarivo by the following Wednesday. The action of the late queen in this matter deserves attention. The general wish of the officers was that they should be turned out of the capital at once, and a message to that effect was sent to the queen. The reply of her Majesty was: "The French call us barbarians, and, if we do as you suggest, perhaps we should prove ourselves to be so. But we are not barbarians. We are Christians, and we must remember, even at this trying time, that we are so, and act as becomes Christians. They gave our friends at Mojanga an hour. We will give their friends five days, and not a hair of their heads, remember, is to be harmed. If they cannot get palanquin-bearers to take them to the coast, I will provide them with bearers and with a guard to see them safe to Tamatave." Accordingly, the French residents were conducted in safety to the coast.

ARREST OF MR. SHAW.

On Friday, June 16th, the French established themselves in complete authority in Tamatave, with a French commandant, French custom-house officers, and French patrol. Notices, headed "Republique Française," setting forth the various decrees of Admiral Pierre, decorated the walls and fences of the foreign residents. In one of these the inhabitants were informed that Tamatave was in a state of siege, and all consular offices were annulled, and stringent regulations regarding the customs and walking in the streets after certain hours were to be enforced by expulsion and other pains and penalties.

The bombardment and occupation of Tamatave was thus completed. The greatest fears were entertained by English missionaries concerning the future. Mr. Shaw, one of the missionaries, was seized and imprisoned. The charge against him by the French authorities was that during the bombardment of Tamatave he "gave intelligence to 'the enemy,' and allowed some of the natives to find shelter in his house, and organized an ambulance corps for the succor and relief of the wounded." There have been negotiations upon the case between the English and French Governments, and he has since been released.

Christian work, in Tamatave at least, if not throughout the country, is now, in consequence, brought to a standstill. The civilization and Christianity of Madagascar are imperilled, certainly hindered. But God has already shown Himself gracious, with a peculiar grace, to Madagascar. Through days and long years of darkness did He bring His people with an exceeding glory, and He will not leave either the workmen or the work in this period of new emergency. We pray that the period of gloom through which the island has been passing will prove to be only the presage of a brighter and more blessed era than it has yet experienced.

THE FOUR DAVYS.

By Rev. Charles Courtenay.

MR. WILLIAM DAVY.

If any should fancy that William Davy's path was a remarkably easy and smooth one, let me undeceive them at once. The devil did not let him alone, you may be very sure. To tell the plain truth, the fight was as hard a one as ever man had. There were times when he almost despaired of keeping down the awful cravings which seized him. People sometimes wondered why he now and then broke into a run when on one of his errands. And sometimes, too, when heavily weighted. It was an odd freak of William's which they couldn't understand at all.

But if they had had their eyes about them they might have seen that it was only when in the neighborhood of a grog shop that he ran. Hot and weary as he was with his work, it was a sore temptation to him to enter. And, moreover, there were not unfrequently old boon companions of his about, who would be only too delighted to entangle him again in the drink snares.

But if you had asked him, about this time, whether he would have dispensed with his difficulties, you would have been startled perhaps to hear that he thanked God with all his heart that his path was so toilsome. You will be curious to know why.

Suppose we ask William himself. If there is any subject on which he is communicative it is just this one.

"Well, you see, when I signed the pledge I felt so awfully feeble, that though I wasn't in any way religious, I was ready to do anything to get strong. I didn't seem to get on much till I found out that everything I wanted the Lord Jesus was waiting to give me, if I would only take Him for my Saviour. Well, the long and the short of the matter is, I just took the Lord at His word, and gave myself right over to Him."

I think you will agree with him, that his thankfulness rested on as good and broad a foundation of reasonableness as any man could require. And now came effects which nothing else could ever produce to the same depth and degree. His face brightened up marvellously. The old worn, gloomy expression passed quite away. It had now become as sunshiny a face as you could wish to see. Indeed, his whole figure was changed. It became more erect and firm. It gathered dignity. It was manly to a degree.

But what of his prospects in life? How were his earthly circumstances affected? Well, in quite as marked a way as were his face, figure, mind, and manners. First, his wages were advanced. It was only fair that a man who seemed to do two men's work should be paid more wages. Then his position was changed for a better one, for his master could not fail to see that his services could be used to far more advantage in a higher and more responsible post. Indeed, William Davy, with his shrewdness and business capacity, became after a while almost indispensable.

Of course the distance between him and his old companions became wider than ever; so wide now, that even the little measure of familiarity which remained disappeared. They did not venture to call him "William" now. It was much too familiar. They were obliged, in spite of themselves, to dub him "Mr. William Davy."

WILLIAM DAVY, ESQ.

"Nothing succeeds like success," it is often. and I think truly, said; at least, events seemed to prove it, for Mr. William Davy was mounting the hill almost as fast as at one time he descended it.

Before long an opening occurred of just the sort of business as would suit him, and which, as he had now a little capital of his own, he felt justified in taking.

How hard he worked! Morning, noon, and night he was at it. And all, of course, without beer. Trust him not to make strong drink a friend again. He used to say that it was total abstinence which enabled him to work so hard.

And how his business prospered! It seemed as if everybody had entered into a conspiracy to do all they could to make Mr. William Davy a rich man. But then they always got a good article for their money, which no doubt brought them again, and others with them.

How many times he enlarged his place of business I should hardly like to say. Again and again he was driven to advertise for new hands, so great was the pressure of business.

It was hardly likely that so successful and so keen-witted a man should escape public work. And so we find him before long elevated to an important post in the government of the town, and his advice sought on innumerable subjects. By and by he had made money enough to build a nice little house outside the town, where he might enjoy the country air. This, of course, necessitated the purchase of a horse and carriage, for the distance was too great to be walked every day. Indeed, his prosperity was most marked, and seemed to be ever on the increase.

There is little more to add, I think, except that there came a time when he retired from business with a very handsome fortune, and with his wife and family enjoyed the rest he so richly deserved.

Perhaps it may be of interest, however, to notice that now his letters were addressed to

"WILLIAM DAVY, ESQ."

A TIGHT GRIP.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, September 23, 1883.

"And his hand clave unto the sword."—II. SAM. 23 : 10.

A Valiant General—Magnificent Fighting—The Imbedded Sword-hilt—A Coward's Sword Easily Dropped—A Tight Grip on the Gospel Weapons—The Bible a Damascus Blade—Worth Gripping—A Criminal's Significant Avowal—The Nothingarian Creed—Eleazar's Self-forgetfulness—A Wounded Musician's Anæsthetic—A Blind Author's Device—The Song of Madagascar Martyrs—Eleazar's Hard Hitting—Knoxes Needed in the Church—Refined Christian Warfare—A Rigid Grip—An Aged Statesman's Death—The Testimony of Venerable Christians—The Scars of Battle—The Shame of the Unscarred.

A GREAT general of King David was Eleazar, the hero of the text. The Philistines opened battle against him, and his troops retreated. The cowards fled. Eleazar and three of his comrades went into the battle and swept the field, for four men with God on their side are stronger than a whole battalion with God against them. "Fall back!" shouted the commander of the Philistine army. The cry ran along the host: "Fall back!" Eleazar having swept the field throws himself on the ground to rest, but the muscles and sinews of his hand had been so long bent around the hilt of the sword that the hilt was imbedded in the flesh, and the gold wire of the hilt had broken through the skin of the palm of the hand, and he could not drop this sword which he had so gallantly wielded. "His hand clave unto the sword." That is what I call magnificent fighting for the Lord God of Israel. And we want more of it.

I propose to show you this morning of the sword and how the sword took hold of Eleazar. I look at Eleazar's hand, and I come to the conclusion that he took the sword with a very tight grip. The cowards who fled had no trouble in dropping their swords. As they fly over the rocks I hear their swords clanging in every direction. It is easy enough for them to drop their swords. But Eleazar's hand clave unto the sword.

O my friends, in this Christian conflict we want a tighter grip of the Gospel weapons, a tighter grasp of the two-edged sword of the truth. It makes me sick to see these Christian people who hold only a part of the truth, and let the rest of the truth go, so that the Philistines, seeing the loosened grasp, wrench the whole sword away from them. The only safe thing for us to do is to put our thumb on the Book of Genesis and sweep our hand around the Book until the New Testament comes into the palm, and keep on sweeping our hand around the Book until the tips of the fingers clutch at the words: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." I like an infidel a great deal better than I do one of these namby-pamby Christians who hold a part of the truth and let the rest go.

By miracle God preserved this Bible just as it is, and it is

A DAMASCUS BLADE.

The severest test to which a sword can be put in a sword factory is to wind the blade around a gun barrel like a ribbon, and then when the sword is let loose it flies back to its own shape. So the sword of God's truth has been fully tested, and it is bent this way and that way, and wound this way and that way, but it always comes back to its own shape. Think of it! A Book written eighteen centuries ago, and some of it thousands of years ago, and yet in our time the average sale of this Book is more than twenty thousand copies every week, and more than a million copies a year. I say now that a book which is divinely inspired and divinely kept and divinely scattered is a weapon worth holding a tight grip of.

Bishop Colenso will come along and try to wrench out of your hand the five books of Moses, and Strauss will come along and try to wrench out of your hand the miracles, and Renan will come along and try to wrench out of your hand the entire life of the Lord Jesus Christ, and your associates in the shop, or the factory, or the banking house will try to wrench out of your hand the entire Bible; but in the strength of the Lord God of Israel, and with Eleazar's grip hold on it. You give up the Bible, you give up any part of it, and you give up pardon and peace and life and heaven.

I see hundreds, perhaps thousands, of young men in this audience. Do not be ashamed, young man, to have the world know that you are a friend of the Bible. This Book is the friend of all that is good, and it is the sworn enemy of all that is bad. An eloquent writer recently gives an incident of a very bad man who stood in a cell of a Western prison. This criminal had gone through all styles of crime, and he was there waiting for the gallows. The convict standing there at the window of the cell, this writer says, "looked out and declared, 'I am an infidel.' He said that to all the men and women and children who happened to be gathered there, 'I am an infidel,'" and the eloquent writer says, "every man and woman there believed him." And the writer goes on to say, "If he had stood there saying, 'I am a Christian,' every man and woman would have said, 'He is a liar!'"

This Bible is the sworn enemy of all that is wrong, and it is the friend of all that is good. Oh, hold on it. Do not take part of it and throw the rest away. Hold on to all of it. There are so many people now who do not know. You ask them if the soul is immortal, and they say, "I guess it is, I don't know; perhaps it is, perhaps it isn't." Is the Bible true? "Well, perhaps it is, and perhaps it isn't; perhaps it may be figuratively, and perhaps it may be partly, and perhaps it may not be at all." They despise what they call the apostolic creed; but if were written out it would read like this: "I believe in nothing, the maker of heaven and earth, and in nothing which it hath sent, which nothing was born of nothing, and which nothing was dead and buried and descended into nothing, and arose from nothing, and ascended to nothing, and now sitteth at the right hand of nothing, from which it will come to judge nothing. I believe in the holy agnostic church and in the communion of nothingarians, and in the forgiveness of nothing, and the resurrection of nothing, and in the life that never shall be. Amen!" That is the creed of tens of thousands of people in this day. If you have a mind to adopt such a theory I will not. "I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ, and in the holy catholic church, and in the communion of saints, and in the life everlasting. Amen." Oh, when I see Eleazar taking such a stout grip of the sword in the battle against sin and for righteousness, I came to the conclusion that we ought to take a stouter grip of God's eternal truth, the sword of righteousness.

THE UNCONSCIOUS GRIP.

As I look at Eleazar's hand I also notice his spirit of self-forgetfulness. He did not notice that the hilt of the sword was eating through the palm of his hand. He did not know it hurt him. As he went out into the conflict he was so anxious for the victory he forgot himself, and that hilt might go never so deeply into the palm of his hand, it could not disturb him. "His hand clave unto the sword." O my brothers and sisters, let us go into the Christian conflict with the spirit of self-abnegation. Who cares whether the world praises us or denounces us? What do we care for misrepresentation, or abuse, or persecution in a conflict like this? Let us forget ourselves. That man who is afraid of getting his hand hurt will never kill a Philistine. Who cares whether you get hurt or not if you get the victory? Oh, how many Christians there are who are all the time worrying about the way the world treats them. They are so tired, and they are so abused, and they are so tempted, when Eleazar did not think whether he had a hand, or an arm, or a foot. All he wanted was victory.

SELF FORGOTTEN.

We see how men forget themselves in worldly achievement. We have often seen men who in order to achieve worldly success will forget all physical fatigue and all annoyance and all obstacle. Just after the battle of Yorktown, in the American Revolution, a musician wounded was told he must have his limbs amputated, and they were about to fasten him to the surgeon's table—for it was long before the merciful discovery of anæsthetics. He said, "No, don't fasten me to that table; get me a violin." A violin was brought to him, and he said: "Now go to work as I begin to play," and for forty minutes, during the awful pangs of amputation, he moved not a muscle nor dropped a note, while he played some sweet tune. Oh, is it not strange that with the music of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and with this grand march of the church militant on the way to become the church triumphant, we cannot forget ourselves and forget all pang and all sorrow and all persecution and all perturbation.

We know what men accomplish under worldly opposition. Men do not shrink back for antagonism, or for hardship. You have admired Prescott's "Conquest of Mexico," as brilliant and beautiful a history as was ever written; but some of you may not know under what disadvantages it was written—that Conquest of Mexico—for Prescott was totally blind, and he had two pieces of wood parallel to each other fastened, and totally blind, with his pen between those pieces of wood he wrote, the stroke against one piece of wood telling how far the pen must go in one way, the stroke against the other piece of wood telling how far the pen must go in the other way. Oh, how much men will endure for worldly knowledge and for worldly success, and yet how little we endure for Jesus Christ. How many Christians there are that go around saying, "O my hand, my hand, my hurt hand; don't you see there is blood on the hand, and there is blood on the sword?" while Eleazar, with the hilt imbedded in the flesh of his right hand, does not know it.

"Must I be carried to the skies
On flowery beds of ease,
While others fought to win the prize
Or sail through bloody seas?"

THE MARTYRS' SONG.

What have we suffered in comparison with those who expired with suffocation, or were burned, or were chopped to pieces for the truth's sake? We talk of the persecution of olden times. There is just as much persecution going on now in various ways. In 1849, in Madagascar, eighteen men were put to death for Christ's sake. They were to be hurled over the rocks, and before they were hurled over the rocks, in order to make their death the more dreadful in anticipation, they were put in baskets and swung to and fro over the precipice that they might see how many hundred feet they would have to be dashed down, and while they were swinging in these baskets over the rocks they sang:

"Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to Thy bosom fly,
While the billows near me roll,
While the tempest still is high."

Then they were dashed down to death. Oh, how much others have endured for Christ, and how little we endure for Christ. We want to ride to heaven in a Pullman sleeping-car, our feet on soft plush, the bed made up early so we can sleep all the way, the black porter of Death to wake us up only in time to enter the golden city. We want all the surgeons to fix our hand up. Let them bring on all the lint and all the bandages and all the salve, for our hand is hurt, while Eleazar does not know his hand is hurt. "His hand clave unto the sword."

As I look at Eleazar's hand, I come to the conclusion that he has done a great deal of HARD HITTING.

I am not surprised when I see that these four men—Eleazar and his three companions—drove back the army of Philistines, that Eleazar's sword clave to his hand, for every time he struck an enemy with one end of the sword, the other end of the sword wounded him. When he took hold of the sword, the sword took hold of him. Oh, we have found an enemy cannot be conquered by rose water and soft speeches. It must be sharp stroke and straight thrust. There is intemperance, and there is fraud, and there is gambling, and there is lust, and there are ten thousand battalions of iniquity, armed Philistine iniquity. How are they to be captured and overthrown? Soft sermons in morocco cases laid down in front of an exquisite audience will not do it. You have got to call things by their right name.

We have got to expel from our churches Christians who eat the sacrament on Sunday and devour widows' houses all the week. We have got to stop our indignation against the Hittites and the Jebusites and the Gergishites, and let those poor wretches go, and apply our indignation to the modern transgressions which need to be dragged out and slain. Ahabs here. Herods here. Jezebels here. The massacre of the infants here. Strike for God so hard that while you slay the sin the sword will adhere to your own hand. I tell you, my friends, we want a few John Knoxes and John Wesleys in the Christian Church to-day. The whole tendency is to refine on Christian work. We keep on refining on it, until we send apologetic word to inquity we are about to capture it. And we must go with sword silver-chased and presented by the ladies, and we must ride on white palfrey under embroidered housing, putting the spurs in only just enough to make the charger dance gracefully, and then we must send a missive, delicate as a wedding card, to ask the old black giant of sin if he will not surrender.

Women saved by the grace of God and on glorious mission sent, detained from Sabbath classes because their new hat is not done. Methodist churches that shook our cities with great revivals sending around to ask some demonstrative worshipper if he will not please to say "amen" and "hallelujah" a little softer. It seems as if in our churches we wanted a baptism of cologne and balm of a thousand flowers, when we actually need a baptism of fire from the Lord God of Pentecost. But we are so afraid somebody will criticise our sermons, or criticise our prayers, or criticise our religious work, that our anxiety for the world's redemption is lost in the fear we will get our hand hurt, while Eleazar went into the conflict, "and his hand clave unto the sword."

A RIGID GRIP.

But I see in the next place what a hard thing it was for Eleazar to get his hand and his sword parted. The muscles and the sinews had been so long grasped around the sword he could not drop it when he proposed to drop it, and his three comrades, I suppose, came up and tried to help him, and they bathed the back part of the hand, hoping the sinews and muscles would relax. But no. "His hand clave to the sword." Then they tried to pull open the fingers and to pull back the thumb; but no sooner were they pulled back than they closed again, "and his hand clave unto the sword." But after a while they were successful, and then they noticed that the curve in the palm of the hand corresponded exactly with the curve of the hilt. "His hand clave unto the sword."

You and I have seen it many a time. There are in the United States to-day many aged ministers of the Gospel. They are too feeble now to preach. In the church records the word opposite their name is "emeritus," or the words are, "a minister without charge." They were a heroic race. They had small salaries, and but few books, and they swam spring freshets to meet their appointments. But they did in their day a mighty work for God. They took off more of the heads of Philistine iniquity than you could count from noon to sundown. You put that old minister of the Gospel now into a prayer-meeting, or occasional pulpit, or a sick room where there is some one to be comforted, and it is the same old ring to his voice and the same old story of pardon and peace and Christ and heaven. His hand has so long clutched the sword in Christian conflict he cannot drop it. "His hand clave unto the sword."

I had in my parish in Philadelphia a very aged man who in his early life had been the companion and

ADVISER OF THE EARLY PRESIDENTS,

Madison and Monroe. He had wielded vast influence, but I only knew him as a very aged man. The most remarkable thing about him was his ardor for Christ. When he could not stand up in the meetings without propping, he would throw his arm around a pillar of the church, and though his mind was partially gone, his love for Christ was so great that all were in deep respect and profound admiration, and were moved when he spoke. I was called to see him die. I entered the room, and he said: "Mr. Talmage, I cannot speak to you now." He was in a very pleasant delirium, as he imagined he had an audience before him. He said: "I must tell these people to come to Christ and prepare for heaven." And then in this pleasant delirium, both arms lifted, this octogenarian preached Christ and told of the glories of the world to come. There, lying on his dying pillow, his dying hand clave to his sword.

Oh, if there ever was any one who had a right to retire from the conflict it was

OLD JOSHUA.

Soldiers come back from battle have the names of the battles on their flags, showing where they distinguished themselves, and it is a very appropriate inscription. Look at that flag of old General Joshua. On it, Jericho, Gibeon, Hazar, City of Ai, and instead of the stars sprinkled on the flag, the sun and the moon which stood still. There he is, a hundred and ten years old. He is lying flat on his back, but he is preaching. His dying words are a battle charge against idolatry, and a rallying cry for the Lord of Hosts as he says: "Behold, this day I go the way of all the earth, and God hath not failed to fulfil His promise concerning Israel." His dying hand clave unto the sword.

There is the headless body of Paul on the road to Ostea. His great brain and his great heart have been severed. The elmwood rods had stung him fearfully. When the corn ship broke up he swam ashore, coming up drenched with the brine. Every day since that day when the horse reared under him in the suburbs of Damascus, as the supernatural light fell, down to this day when he is sixty-eight years of age, and old and decrepit from the prison cell of the Mamartine, he has been outrageously treated, and he is waiting to die. How does he spend his last hours? Telling the world how badly he feels, and describing the rheumatism that he got in prison, the rheumatism afflicting his limbs, or the neuralgia piercing his temples, or the thirst that fevers his tongue? Oh, no. His last words are the battle shout for Christendom: "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand; I have fought the good fight." And so his dying hand clave unto the sword.

It was in the front room on the second floor that

MY FATHER LAY A-DYING.

It was Saturday morning, four o'clock. Just three years before that day, my mother had left him for the skies, and he had been homesick to join her company. He was eighty-three years of age. Ministers of the Gospel came in to comfort him, but he comforted them. How wonderfully the words sounded out from his dying pillow: "I have been young and now am old, yet have I never seen the righteous forsaken, or His seed begging bread." They bathed his brow, and they bathed his hands, and they bathed his feet, and they succeeded in straightening out the feet; but they did not succeed in bathing open the hand so it would stay open. They bathed the hand open, but it came shut. They bathed it open again, but it came shut. What was the matter with the thumb and the fingers of that old hand? Ah! it had so long clutched the sword of Christian conflict that "his hand clave unto the sword."

I preach this sermon as a tonic. I want you to hold the truth with ineradicable grip, and I want you to strike so hard for God that it will react, and while you take the sword

THE SWORD WILL TAKE YOU.

You noticed that the officers of the Northern army recently assembled at Denver, and you noticed that the officers of the Southern army recently assembled at Lexington. Soldiers coming together are very apt to recount their experiences and to show their scars. Here is a soldier who pulls up his sleeve, and says, "There, I was wounded in that arm," and shows the scar. And another soldier pulls down his collar, and says, "There, I was wounded in the neck." And another soldier says, "I have had no use of that limb since the gunshot fracture." O my friends, when the battle of life is over, and the resurrection has come, and our bodies rise from the dead, will we have on us any for God? Christ will be there all covered with scars. Scars on the brow, scars on the hand, scars on the feet, scars all over the heart won in the battle of redemption. And all heaven will sob aloud with emotion as they look at those scars. Ignatius will be there, and he will point out the place where the tooth and paw of the lion seized him in the Colisseum, and John Huss will be there, and he will show where the coal first scorched the foot on that day when his spirit took wing of flame from Constance. M'Millan, and Campbell, and Freeman, American missionaries in India, will be there—the men who with their wives and children went down in the awful massacre at Cawnpore, and they will show where the daggers of the Sepoys struck them. The Waldenses will be there, and they will show where their bones were broken on that day when the Piedmontese soldiery pitched them over the rocks. And there will be those there who took care of the sick and who looked after the poor, and they will have evidences of earthly exhaustion. And Christ, with His scarred hand waving over the scarred multitude, will say, "You suffered with Me on earth; now be glorified with Me in heaven." And then the great organs of eternity will take up the chant, and St. John will play: "These are they who came out of great tribulation and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb."

But what will your chagrin and mine be if it shall be told that day on the streets of heaven that on earth we shrank back from all toil and sacrifice and hardship. No scars to show the heavenly soldiery. Not so much as one ridge on the palm of the hand to show that just once in all this battle for God and the truth, we just once grasped the sword so firmly, and struck so hard that the sword and the hand struck together and the hand clave to the sword. O my Lord Jesus, rouse us to Thy service.

"Thy saints in all this glorious war
Shall conquer though they die;
They see the triumph from afar,
And seize it with the eye.

"When that illustrious day shall rise,
And all thy armies shine
In robes of victory through the skies,
The glory shall be thine."

Sabbath Observance in France is Increasing.—The Paris correspondent of the London Record gives some very interesting and gratifying facts indicating a growth of Sabbath observance in that city. He says that wholesale business is altogether stopped, while retail trade is greatly lessening. In most localities only one distribution of letters takes place, and most public offices are closed. The new rules for military exercises leave the soldiers free to take part or not on Sundays, as conscience dictates.

A CATECHISM ON PROPHECY.

By Walter Scott.

IN a work recently published in England the doctrines held by the majority of students of prophecy are gathered into catechetical form by the author. In the course of the series the following questions and answers occur:

Will evil increase or decrease before the Lord comes?

It will increase. "But evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." "In the last days (already set in) perilous times shall come." This inspired oracle is followed by an account of Church-corruption, in words almost precisely similar to that employed to set forth old heathen wickedness (II Tim. 3 : 1–13, with Rom. 1 : 28–32).

What Scriptures show the coming of Christ for His saints?

John 14 : 3; I Thess. 4 : 13–17; II Thess. 2 : 1. In the first, we have simply the fact stated; in the second, we have precious details given; in the third, is laid the ground of weighty warning and needed instruction; see also I Cor. 15 : 23; I Thess 1 : 10; Phil. 3 : 20, 21; Rev. 3 : 10, 11.

What Scriptures show the coming of Christ with His saints?

Rev. 19 : 11, 14; Zech. 14 : 5; Col. 3 : 4, etc. The first shows the fact in relation to the Western powers; the second, treats of it in reference to the Northern and Eastern powers; the third, reveals the blessed association of the heavenly saints with Christ in His glorious appearing; see also I Thess. 3 : 13; II Thess. 1 : 10; Jude 14; Rev. 17 : 14.

Will Christ, in the first instance, come to the Earth?

No; but to the air, where His saints—the raised dead and changed living—will meet Him (I Thess. 4 : 17); afterward to Mount Olivet, accompanied by His heavenly people (Zech. 14 : 4) and the holy angels (Matt. 25 : 31).

Will Christ personally appear on the Earth?

Yes. Personally He will appear to the Jews, whom He will bring into permanent spiritual and temporal blessing (Zech. 12 : 10); see also Mal. 3 : 1; Ezek. 43 : 7; Zech. 8 : 3, etc. He will not, however, reign on but over the earth.

Will the Jews as a nation be converted before the restoration to Palestine?

No; for when restored to Palestine the mass of the people will receive the Antichrist or false Messiah. Two-thirds will be cut off in judgment by the Lord, and a remnant alone preserved and saved (Zech. 13 : 8, 9). Unbelief and infidelity will characterize the nation prior to and when restored; their spiritual quickening and blessing is a subsequent event.

Will the Temple be rebuilt and a Jewish ritual established?

Yes. The Antichrist to come will make the Temple the seat of his worship (II Thess. 2 : 4). It is also regarded as existing with its daily sacrifice and worship, during the course of the future judgments (Rev. 11; Isa. 64 : 6; Dan. 1 : 11). The Lord, too, in His great prophetic discourse (Matt. 24 : 15), pointed to that "holy place" in future at the end of this age.

Will the old Roman or Latin Empire be resuscitated, and by whom and when?

It will. Satan will be the agent in effecting its revival, which will be accomplished after the present interval of grace is closed and the Church translated to the Father's house. Satan will then be allowed to consummate the civil and ecclesiastical apostasies; see Rev. 17 : 8 for the former, and II Thess. 2 : 8, 9 for the latter.

Into how many parts will the resuscitated Roman Empire be distributed?

Into ten kingdoms. Ireland, America, and some portions of the Continent will probably be excepted, as not formerly constituting part of the old Roman Empire. Europe generally will be the area covered by the revived Empire; see Dan. 7 : 7, 8; Rev. 17 : 3, 7–16.

Who is meant by the "little horn" of Dan. 7, and what relationship will he sustain to the Jews?

This little horn or king will head the revived Roman power, and will politically favor the Jews, taking them under his special protection. It is this future Roman prince that is referred to in Dan. 9 : 27, who will make a political league with the apostate nation for seven years, and who will also ally himself with the Antichrist or Jewish prophet and king (Rev. 13).

Who is meant by the "little horn" of Dan. 8, and what relationship will he sustain to the Jews?

This king will be the future antagonist of the Jewish people, and is the same spoken of by the prophets Isaiah and Micah as "The Assyrian."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Converted Romanist's Confession.—At Cowcaddens, the Rev. Mr. Wells said: "I was much interested in a Roman Catholic who joined my church in the Townhead. When he applied to be admitted into full membership, I inquired, 'What made you leave your own church?' He replied in language so racy and original that I remember it yet. 'Well, your reverence, I thought that when the Lord Jesus takes one in hand, He can do it all Himself, your reverence, and don't need the help of priests, saints, and all that rubbish; so I've made up my mind to leave myself with Him alone."

A Wee Scotch Lassie.—Mr. Duncan said at a recent meeting: "Some time ago a little girl waited behind among the anxious at an evangelistic meeting. A worker inquired, 'What do you want, my girl?' 'I want to be a good lassie.' That reply was a true sign of an anxious inquirer. The Holy Spirit showed her the condition of her heart in the eyes of God, and now she longed to be quite different; and Christ opened His arms and received her as she was. It is just like Him. 'Suffer little children to come unto Me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.'"

An Elderly Backslider Restored.—"When Dr. Bonar was at one of our Conferences, an elderly woman sent a message requesting him to call upon her. The Doctor visited her, and she told him that more than forty years before, she was a member of his church, but fell into sin, and since then she had never entered a church-door till two years ago, when she was truly converted to Christ at a meeting. During the forty years of her sinful career, she never forgot some of Dr. Bonar's words, and often in the midst of revelry they destroyed her pleasure, and shook her soul with terror."

A Thoroughly Happy Farmer.—"One of Our border farmers fell into financial difficulties, and prepared to go abroad. He was much disheartened by his failure, and drank to drown his misery. When the day came on which he was to sail he was so drunk that he forgot about it, and was thus short shipped. Shortly afterward he came to our meeting, and was converted. He was living in his brother's house at the time, and as after his conversion he refused to conform to the drinking-customs of the household, he was ejected from it. He is now working with his hands as a common field laborer, yet he is happier now than he was in his most prosperous days, for Christ is his companion, and in His salvation he rejoices all the day long."

A Sunday Class at a Bedside.—Mr. Hill then narrated the following incident: "Not long ago I visited a girl not yet sixteen years of age. For the last eight years she has been suffering indescribable pain from consumption of the bone. I could only sit beside her and weep as I heard her speak so sweetly of Jesus. I inquired, 'Did you never get into Doubting Castle?' 'Yes, Mr. Hill, I did.' 'Why did you go there?' 'When I was ill at first I began to think it strange that God should take away so many useful people and leave poor helpless me here.' 'How did you get out?' I said. 'Lord Jesus, give me something to do for You. That afternoon I spoke to one about Jesus, and now I have a class of eighteen who meet here once a week.' That warm-hearted Christian lying on a bed of suffering is a living rebuke to those who stand calmly by and see their brethren going down to destruction without putting out a hand to stay or turn them. She can point out on the list of names one after another who have given themselves into Christ's keeping."

A Persecuting Jewess Converted.—At a Noonday prayer-meeting, Mr. Baron said: "We have great reason to praise God for His favor in our work among the Jews of the city. Twelve months ago this week our first convert was baptized by the Rev. Dr. Bonar. His wife was bitter with anger against him, and in every way possible persecuted him, sparing no pains or labor to annoy him, thinking that for the sake of a quiet life he would abjure his new faith and return to Judaism. Her efforts, however, were fruitless, for God gave him grace to bear with meekness the daily trials inflicted upon him. This conduct told his wife of another power, of which she was totally ignorant, and caused her to search the Scriptures lest her husband might be right after all. Last week she confessed herself a Christian, and has applied for baptism into the name of Christ."

An Artist's Prayer.—At Cowcaddens, Mr. Arthur said: "There is a beautiful story about a picture which every one in this church has seen a copy of in the local picture-dealers' windows. It represents Christ knocking at a door, and standing patiently until the inmates choose to open it. The owner of the original painting took it out of the frame to have it cleaned, and noticed some Latin words written on the margin usually covered by the frame. His curiosity was aroused, and he read them, and saw they were a prayer by the painter, who is one of our greatest living artists. Translated, the prayer reads, 'Do not pass me over, O Lord!' Mr. Holman Hunt, when he finished the picture, realized its importance as a picture sermon, and being moved by the lesson it conveyed, he prayed that the Divinely patient Saviour might never leave his heart. Let this be the prayer going up from every heart, 'Do not pass me over, O Lord.'"

Two Pretended Inquirers.—Mr. R. Simpson, while addressing a Gospel Temperance Meeting recently, said: "A few weeks ago two young men came in as inquirers, and I talked to them solemnly about eternity and the judgment seat, as also of salvation from sin through faith in Christ. They literally laughed in my face and made fun of the whole thing. I said, 'Dear young friends, it won't do to spend my precious time, or take up yours, when your sins are sitting as lightly on your souls as the hair on your head.' One of the young men, though he did not say there was no God, declared there was no devil. Some days afterward he came to me and said, 'Before a week went round, the Holy Spirit showed me, not only that there is a devil, but I felt as if I had seen him.' He was now thoroughly awakened and alarmed; and God in the riches of His mercy brought both these young men to Himself."

Converted in a Stable.—The Rev. Mr. Munro said: "A young farmer in America went, at the earnest request of his father, to hear a certain minister, who preached from the text, 'Take My yoke upon you, and learn of Me, for I am meek and lowly in heart.' The sermon was the means of convicting him of sin, and he was much agitated. Next Sabbath he could not remain at home, owing to his knowledge of his unhappy state; but instead of going to hear the same man, he went to another church in which another minister spoke from the same text. Convinced before, he was now completely terrified, and had little rest that night. Next morning he entered the stable to yoke his oxen. He took the yoke off the wall on which it hung, and going into the stall, told the ox to turn round. At once the strong animal meekly turned its head to receive the yoke. The action of the ox made this thought flash through his mind: 'This poor beast is willingly doing for me what I refuse to do for Christ.' There and then in the stall he took Christ's yoke upon him, and in giving his testimony at a meeting afterward, said, 'For years that yoke has been on my neck, and I testify that the Bible is true when it says, "His yoke is easy."'"

Speech and Hearing Restored.—A Worker said: "Last night a respectable young man, who gave his name and address, told us that exactly a year ago he was standing, after a course of hard drinking which had the effect of making him nearly deaf and altogether speechless, at the corner among the crowd who were listening to the open-air singing, when a lady worker invited him to enter. He made signs that he did not understand her, so she took out her note-book and wrote on it, 'Come into the church, all are welcome.' He entered, and had conversation by means of writing in the after-meeting. He took the pledge, and, what is better, he accepted Christ's offer of salvation. He has not tasted drink since then; he is a member of Free St. George's Church, Paisley, and is an active worker in that town. His speech and hearing are completely restored to him, and being in Glasgow again, he came from the south side of the river to see the place where he was born again. For the first two months he labored under great temptation to drink, but he took the craving to the Lord, who enabled him to overcome the devil and all the desires of the flesh."

A Lady Captures Two Sailors.—Mr. Marsh related the following encouraging incident: "A young lady who, out of love to Christ, had determined in her own heart to seek sinful souls for the Master at all times and seasons, used to go out into Ratcliff Highway, London, with the sword of the Spirit in her hand, believing that she would be protected by God, and enabled to do some work for the glory of God. On one occasion she got two rough sailors under a street lamp, and spoke to them about Jesus, the Son of the living God, who was willing to save and bless them and make them happy forever. Her gentle, modest manner drew out the best part of these men's natures, and with evident interest they entered into the conversation with sincere hearts, being also moved by the power of God. The lady read John 3 : 16 to them, but they kept saying, 'We're too bad, miss; we're too bad.' And she kept replying, 'But God says it. It's not what you think or say; God says it.' At last these men, by the steady strokes of the Spirit, whose sword was wielded by a helpless woman, were completely broken down, yielded themselves to Christ, and are now rejoicing in His salvation, and serving Him."

THE RESTORATION OF ISRAEL,

Viewed in Connection with the Restitution of all Things.

By the Rev. A. C. Tris.

RESTORATION and restitution are words of similar meaning. Dr. Young's "Concordance" (page 811) renders the Greek word, "Apokatastasis," as meaning, "a putting down again, a restoration." That the restitution of all things, mentioned in Acts 3 : 21, is not a destruction, or winding up of the cosmical state of affairs, but a setting up of that which is fallen down, is obvious. The Holy Ghost solemnly declares: "That God hath spoken of it by the mouth of His holy prophets from the ages," or since the world began, and, truly, the fact that the prophets of old dwelt upon this glorious theme of happiness is plain. The restitution of all things is closely connected with the Adamic-Abrahamic and Davidic Covenants, and is bringing before our view a vista of the grand scheme and plan of Jehovah, called "the new covenant" (Jer. 31: 31–37, 17; Heb. 8 : 10, 13).

ISRAEL'S NEW COVENANT.

That new covenant belongs principally to the Jews, and will be manifested in the latter days. The words of Jehovah do not admit of any cavil: "For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord, I will put my laws into their minds, and write them in their hearts, and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people" (Heb. 8 : 10). And, looking from that standpoint, the future of Israel is closely connected with the bright hope and expectation of the groaning earth and creature, and the glorious liberty of the children of God (Rom. 8 : 19–23).

MAN A RULER.

It is an undeniable fact that the first man, Adam, was endowed with the prerogatives of a ruler, "Who should have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth" (Gen. 1 : 28). And, these prerogatives are yet the absorbing passion of all his descendants, and misrule is the universal sin of men.

It cannot be gainsayed that the elect of God (Rom. 8 : 33) have not been reinstated in the full possession, and have not come to the ruling power, which they lost in the first Adam; they are only in a state of expectation, "waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God" (Rom. 8 : 19), when the prerogatives of a ruler will be restored to them. The redemption wrought by Christ is, and will be, a finished work—a complete redemption. It commenced with and in the midst of the people of Israel, and, therefore, Israel must be restored– the work of Jesus must be accomplished as a glorious redemption in the midst of that same people, "restored Israel" (Ezekiel 37 : 21–28; 39 : 23–29; Rev. 14 : 3–5). Never was Christ yet the Husband of Israel, according to the covenant (Jer. 31 : 3); never did Christ have His marriage feast with "His wife" (Rev. 19 : 7). And also the promise given to Israel (Isa. 54 : 5), must be fulfilled: "For thy Maker is thine husband; the Lord of hosts is His name; and thy Redeemer the Holy One of Israel; the God of the whole earth shall He be called." "Then shall Jesus see the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied" (Isa. 53 : 11).

THE WAY.

This grand scheme of the restitution of all things, and the way in which it will be accomplished, is universally ignored, but it has paramount claims on the attention of devout and thoughtful Christians.

When the fulness of time came, Gabriel brought the joyful tidings to Israel that "the Christ of God" should be born. The Jewish maid heard the angelic words: "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David: and He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of His kingdom there shall be no end" (Luke 1 : 32, 33). Christ is proclaimed as a Ruler on earth and as the head of His Church, His body (Eph. 5 : 33).

CHRIST THE KING.

The proclamation of the archangel corroborates the prophecy which we find in Micah 5 : 2 that He, who should come forth out of Bethlehem Ephratah, should be "a ruler [mashal] in Israel" as one upon whose shoulder should be the government [misrah—princely power] (Isa. 9 : 6, 7). And this idea of a ruling Messiah on earth is everywhere predominant in the prophecies of the Old and New Testaments.

The prophecy of Balaam was: "That a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth" (Numbers 24 : 17). And in Ps. 110 it is said that Adonai should sit at the right hand of Jehovah, "till" He make His enemies His footstool, and then He will appear in Zion, and as a Conqueror smite "the head" of the mighty earth, the Antichrist. II Thess. 2 : 8, 9 and Ps. 110 : 6 declare the same truth. In accordance with the Abrahamic Covenant, Abraham's greatest Son must "bless all the nations of the earth" (Gen. 17 : 7; Gen. 22 : 18). And in accordance with the Davidic Covenant, David's royal Son shall sit upon His throne, and "shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth" (Ps. 72 : 8).

Let us pause before this wonderful prediction: that the Jews and the Ten Tribes of Israel, the whole house of Jacob, must be restored to Canaan; and that the Dynasty of David must be re-established (Jer. 33 : 23-26); and that He, who as the Shepherd of Israel did scatter the sheep (Jer. 31 : 10), shall gather and assemble them again as the Prince of the House of David (Ezek. 39 : 28, 29), and rule over them on the throne of David.

APOSTOLIC DOCTRINE.

That this is the true doctrine preached in the Primitive Apostolic Church is beyond contradiction. It was the decision of the Holy Spirit, expressed in the canon of the first Christian Council, held in Jerusalem (Acts 15 : 14–17), that THREE PERIODS should be seen (verse 14), "that God at the first should visit the Gentiles (the nations), to take out of them a people for His name;" then the restoration of Israel to Canaan, and the Dynasty of David (verse 16). "After this, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things, I will return, and I will build again the Tabernacle of David, which is fallen down; and I will build again the ruins thereof and I will set it up;" and in the third period is mentioned the conversion of the nations (verse 17): "That the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles, upon whom My Name is called."

Drawing the above-mentioned arguments to one focus, it becomes evident that the restoration of Israel must be the beginning of the restitution of all things. Because Christ cannot reign upon the throne of David, except He returns to earth to Jerusalem, and if so, the solemn statement will be fulfilled: "That the heavens must receive Christ until the times of the restitution of all things" (Acts 3 : 21); "The dispensation of the fulness of times has come" (Eph. 1 : 10).

Because Israel cannot accept the Husband except they shall see Him (Zech 12 : 10). "They shall look upon me, whom they have pierced (John 19 : 37). Then Canaan will be called Beulah, and Israel as a nation must set the first example of a holy nation (Dan. 7 : 27).

Because the martyrs cannot reign with Christ (Rev. 20 : 1), neither the apostles sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel, "except the Son of man shall sit on the throne of His glory," in the millennial age (Matt. 19 : 28).

Because the nations cannot flow to Jerusalem Isa. 2 : 2–4; Zech. 14 : 16 except the King is there, whose name is Prince of peace (Ps. 72 : 3, 4).

Because the land of Canaan was as the Holy Land, the place where the resurrection from the dead at first commenced. The first sheaf of the great harvest arose out of the tomb of Joseph on the first day of the week (Matt. 28 : 1); so others did (Matt. 27 : 51, 52).

Because Satan had his victory over the seed of the woman in that Emanuel's land. The blood of the Son of God did moist the soil of Calvary, and where our Lord wore the crown of thorns as the emblem of the curse of earth. He shall be crowned with many crowns (John 19 : 1 in connection with Rev. 19 : 12).

Finally, because the heavenly hosts sang at the birth of Jesus in the fields of Ephrata in the land of Juda, they will sing the song of triumph on the return of Jesus to the earth. The words of Jehovah, mentioned in Heb. 1 : 6, (Greek) "and when He bringeth in again the first begotten into the "habitable" world, He saith, "And let all the angels of God worship Him," must then be fulfilled.

OUR DUTY.

And if all those glorious things will surely come to pass, shall we forget in the present time to pray for Israel, the Jews? Shall we neglect to intercede for the brethren and sisters of our Lord after the flesh, the covenant-owners of Canaan? Truly, such a negligence would be a glaring inconsistency in those who pray for the coming of the Kingdom of the Son of David. Let us feel a tender love toward the Jews. Jesus wept for them, and their return to their Messiah will be the brightest jewel in Jesus' kingly crown.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

NOTICE.

Many subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who are laboring to extend the sphere of its usefulness, wish us to afford them the same facilities as were placed at their disposal last year. It appears that the concession in price then made, enabled them to introduce the journal to persons and families to whom it proved a blessing. God used it as a means of conversion in not a few cases; in others it gave comfort and encouragement to tried and afflicted believers; and ministers and lay preachers, to whom our friends sent it, acknowledged their indebtedness for help in their labors to the hints and suggestions contained in its pages.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has no higher object than that which its friends thus state was achieved last year. The same opportunity is therefore cheerfully given this year. Any subscriber wishing to introduce THE CHRISTIAN HERALD where it may do good, may send to THE MANAGER, 63 Bible House, New York, for which sum the paper will be mailed to any address in the United States or in Canada every week from September 1st until the end of 1883. Will our friends pray that God will use each number for the advancement of Christ's Kingdom?

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Attempt to Promote Harmony in the Republican Party in New York has had a somewhat peculiar result. The State Convention, held at Richfield Springs on September 18th, was remarkable for the unanimity of its proceedings, but impartial observers characterized the prevalent feeling as apathy rather than harmony. The concessions made by the Stalwarts were regarded by the other section of the party as apparent rather than real, and the result was that the management of the party remains practically in the same hands as before, and the State Committee has undergone no radical change. The platform adopted expresses the gratification of the party at "the wisdom and success of President Arthur's administration of the affairs of government, which commands universal respect throughout the country, and has the confidence and support of the Republicans of the State of New York." The following are the most important declarations of the same document: "We rejoice in the successful inauguration of civil service reform, a result of Republican agitation and national progress, and insist that the work thus auspiciously begun shall be prosecuted to complete success. We favor a system of tariff laws under which, while revenue for the government is provided, American producers are justly protected, American labor elevated, and home markets are secured to home products for the advantage alike of the producer and laborer. We believe in the wisdom of the people deciding all questions pertaining to the public welfare, and would accede to the desire of a large body of our citizens to submit to the voters of the State a constitutional amendment in regard to the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors." There was throughout the proceedings a notable absence of enthusiasm. Prior to the meeting of the convention, the interest of the public was concentrated, not on the platform nor the candidates, but on the composition of the State Committee.

The Status of Veterans under the New Civil Service Act has drawn forth an opinion from Secretary Folger, which he has stated in a letter he addressed to the Civil Service Commissioners on September 20th. The secretary recently made a requisition on the commission for a person to fill a clerkship, and the commission certified to him the names of four persons from which to make his selection. The secretary finds himself in doubt as to whether a section of the Revised Statutes does not limit him in making his selection from the four names. He says in his letter to the commissioners that this section gives the preference, other things being equal, to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the late war. He asks for further information on the subject. His opinion is that if one of the persons certified to him is an honorably discharged sailor or soldier, he must select that one.

A Philanthropic Gift has been made by a Washington lady. Miss Anna Smith has given the family residence of her late father for a reformatory for women. The property comprises a large house in a central part of Washington, and is valued at $25,000. Such an institution has long been needed at the National capital, and Congress has often been appealed to on the subject. In a number of cases young women, who had gone astray but were not deemed irreclaimable, have been sent from Washington to the Refuge in Baltimore, where it is said 1200 girls and women have found shelter in the last eighteen years. It is estimated that more than 80 per cent of them reformed. Miss Smith is the only surviving child of the late Admiral Joseph Smith, of the U. S. Navy. One of his sons fell in action in the war, and the other, who was also a naval officer, died shortly afterward. Miss Smith is greatly beloved by the poor of Washington, who have often been indebted to her private generosity for substantial assistance.

A Strange Company of Foreigners, Gorgeously attired, waited on President Arthur at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York, on September 18th. They were the ambassadors from Corea, "the Hermit Nation," with which our Government concluded a treaty about a year ago to establish commercial relations between the two countries. General Foote was sent as Minister to Corea, and this embassy is the return of the courtesy. The members of the embassy are all of high rank, the minister being the son of the queen and the vice-minister the son of the prime-minister. Until recently the penalty against any foreigner who entered Corea was death, and the American Minister was only the second foreigner the King of Corea had seen. They have now relations with three countries—the United States, China, and Japan. Min Yong Ik, the Minister Plenipotentiary, when presented to the President, wore a long tunice of plum-colored silk over white under-garments and white stockings. He wore a belt inlaid with gold. On his breast was a square of silk, on which were embroidered two storks. The other Coreans wore similar costumes of various colors. As they approached the room they knelt, and after entering they bowed first to the right and then to the left, their salaam bringing them down on their knees. After being introduced by Secretary Frelinghuysen, Min Yong Ik read his address in Corean. He said that he and Hing Yong Sik had come to pay their respects as ambassadors from the Government of Tah Chosun, and he wished the President and the people of this country health and welfare. He said that, having entered into a treaty together, he hoped both nations might keep it in peace forever. He then presented his credentials and a letter from his sovereign. The President replied, saying that he hoped that the commerce between the two nations might be beneficial to both, and that the tour of the Coreans might be such that they could carry back new and profitable ideas and a kindly feeling for this country.

The Meetings of the Christian Convention held last week in Chicago under the presidency of Mr. Moody were largely attended. A correspondent of the New York Tribune in a telegram to that journal says: "Large numbers of clergymen and evangelists have taken part in the proceedings, and the daily sessions have been crowded. The crowds who have gathered about the doors before the opening sometimes extend nearly a block away from the hall. A noticeable feature of this gathering has been the indication that Mr. Moody has to a large extent overcome the ministerial, and even the church, prejudices, which he used to encounter in Chicago. Without any concessions he has succeeded in drawing around him a larger clerical and lay representation from the churches than ever before; and, as the discussions were very practical in character, much good is looked for in the religious circles of the city." One of the most important subjects discussed was how to evangelize the foreign population. The question was not so much with the Irish or the Scandinavians as with the Germans. All the gentlemen who talked on the question agreed that the chances for church education among the Germans are too meagre, and help must be secured to break the practice of making Sunday a holiday instead of a holy day, directed to pleasure and beer-drinking. On Sunday, September 16th, Mr. Moody preached in his old church on Chicago Avenue to an audience that filled the aisles, vestibules, and every available spot in the building. The admission was by card, but more than a thousand people went away unable to enter the church.

Dr. Edwin F. Hatfield, the Eminent Presbyterian minister and author, died on Saturday last at his country residence at Summit, N. J. He was seventy-six years of age. His first charge was at St. Louis, where he labored from 1832 to 1835. From 1835 to 1856 he was pastor of the Seventh Presbyterian Church, in Broome Street, New York. During this long pastorate of twenty-one years, the church was in a very flourishing condition, and there were several revivals in which several hundred persons were converted. In 1856 he took charge of the North Presbyterian Church, at Ninth Avenue and Thirty-first Street. He closed this pastorate, which was his last, in 1863, and devoted the greater part of his life after this to literary work. For over thirty years he compiled the minutes of the General Assembly, and did a great deal of other statistical work. He was one of the Directors of the American Home Missionary Society, and from 1864 to 1866 he was financial agent of the Union Theological Seminary. From 1868 to 1870 he was Secretary of the Presbyterian Home Missionary Committee. Last May Dr. Hatfield was elected Moderator of the General Assembly at Saratoga.

The Serial Story Entitled "Mrs. Chantrey's Secret," which is concluded in this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is published in book-form by Mr. Thomas Whittaker of No. 2 Bible House. Among a large number of religious stories also published by Mr. Whittaker are: "A London Baby;" "Miss Dewberry's Scholars," by Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster; "Nothing to Nobody," by Drenda; and "Alone in London," by the author of "Jessica's First Prayer." Mr. Whittaker has also published a life of Grace Darling, the heroine of the Farne Islands, by Eva Hope, elegantly bound in cloth, price $1.

Lightning in a Coal Mine was the Strange spectacle witnessed by the miners in a pit in Chartiers Township, Pennsylvania, on September 17th. The flash entered at the mouth of the pit, where it destroyed a large wooden building, and then passed underground a distance of nearly one thousand yards. When the flash entered the pit, Thomas Ashurst, inside hauler, was sitting on the track at a point five hundred yards from the mouth, and as the flash passed him one of his legs was temporarily paralyzed, and for several minutes he was unable to walk. The lightning followed the track up the entry two hundred yards beyond where Ashurst and several miners were standing. They distinctly saw the flash as it passed them, making seven hundred yards that the lightning is known to have travelled underground. The entry extends two hundred yards past the point mentioned, and it is quite probable the flash followed the car track to its end. The uncommon sight of the dark mine suddenly illuminated by the lightning is described as weird and awful in the extreme. It caused no little alarm among the men at work in the gloomy place. In the wonders of the last days, which the Apostle John saw in prophetic vision, the lightning plays an important part. Such a description as that given of the scene in the Pennsylvania mine helps us to realize the terrors of that approaching time (Rev. 16 : 17, 18).

Sleeping among Rattlesnakes was the Sickening experience of two men from New Jersey, who spent a night recently in the backwoods of the Pocono region of Pennsylvania. They were looking over some timber land with the view of purchasing a tract, and before they had finished, night came upon them. They were doubtful of finding their way back in the darkness, and concluded to spend the night in an old cabin in the woods, which had been used by some hunters. They kindled a fire in it, and found their shelter very warm and comfortable, and they soon fell asleep. They had not slept long, before one of them awaked, and detected the peculiar faint smell which indicated the presence of rattlesnakes. He aroused his companion, and they beat a speedy retreat, preferring to spend the night sleeping in the open air, though the ground was damp and cold, to staying in the hut. In the morning they looked into the cabin, and there saw five large rattlesnakes stretched on the hearth, close to the spot where they had been lying. The reptiles had been drawn from their hiding places in the roof of the old hut by the warmth of the fire. The men were thankful then that they had not remained in the place any longer. Cold and discomfort were not matters to be considered when life was at stake. Pity it is that men do not act so wisely when spiritual danger, far more to be dreaded than rattlesnakes, threatens them (Heb. 11 : 25).

A Pathetic Scene in a Police Court is Reported from Philadelphia. On September 20th the wife of a criminal serving out his sentence in prison appeared before Judge Hare, and made an earnest appeal for mercy for her husband. She was accompanied by three little children. The prisoner's record showed that he had served twelve terms in prison for various offences, and the judge said he did not think he could show any leniency to such a man. The destitute wife turned away, sobbing piteously, and the little ones, clinging to her skirts, wept with her. "Well, just come back a moment," said the judge, "I want another word with you, please." The woman was admitted behind the bar, and met the judge at the base of the steps leading up to the bench. "On second thoughts," said he, "I have concluded to give your husband one more chance. I will reduce his sentence one half—that is, to six months ; and while you are waiting for him to come out perhaps you and your little children may find this of some use." As he finished speaking, Judge Hare drew a roll of greenbacks from his pocket, thrust it into the woman's hand, and, with a quiet "Good-day," hastened into his private room before the astonished woman could express her gratitude. The prisoner was fortunate in having such an advocate. Nothing could be urged in his favor, but for the sake of his wife and children, who loved him, he was granted the mercy he did not deserve. It is on such terms that God pardons sinful man for the sake of Jesus, who loved us (1 John 2 : 1, 2).

The Strange Name of a Lake has been Accounted for by an inquirer, who set himself to the task of discovering its origin. He states that certain explorers, endeavoring to find the source of the Mississippi, came upon a lake from which they were convinced the Father of Waters took his rise. Then a discussion arose as to the name that should be conferred upon it. "Let's make a new name by coining a word," said an old voyager. "Some of you larned ones tell me what is the Latin for true." "Veritas," answered a scholar. "Well, now, what is the Latin for head?" "Caput." "Now write the two words together by syllables." The scholar wrote on a strip of birch-bark, "veritascaput." "Now drop the first and last syllables, and you'll have a good name for this lake." And "Itasca" it was. So the explorers stamped their discovery with a name that was intended to tell to future ages the origin of the mighty river, but now it is used without any recognition of its significance. So men use the name of the Creator irreverently, often profanely, forgetting that He is the true head and origin of all their blessings (James 1 : 17).

Poison Put in a Sugar-Bowl Nearly Cost a man his life at Blue Island, a suburb of Chicago. In a boarding-house there, a few days ago, during the absence of the servants from the dining-room, some unknown person entered and placed half a pint of sugar, mixed with strychnine, in the sugar-bowl on the table. One of the servants noticed, on her return to the room, that some sugar had been spilled on the table, but supposed that it had been done by some member of the family. The sugar from that bowl was used sparingly at the next meal, but one of the boarders, the owner of a brick-yard, was taken violently sick. He was saved by the use of emetics. It is believed that the attempted poisoning was done by an enemy of the boarder, whose buildings were recently fired by an incendiary. General indignation is felt against the criminal, who, in recklessly endangering the lives of a whole family in order to vent his spite against one man, showed a disposition positively Satanic. The parallel is probably closer than the reporter supposed. Satan, like this revengeful person, generally mixes his poison with the sweet things of life and things which unrenewed human nature craves (Job 20 : 12–14).

A Novel Way of Getting a Debt Settled has been adopted by a creditor in New York. A restaurant keeper on the east side owed one of his tradesmen about sixteen dollars, payment of which he persistently evaded. The creditor at length became tired of making application for the debt, and being determined that if he could not recover it himself, the debtor should not profit by his dishonesty, he thought over plans for "getting even." On Friday last the restaurant-keeper found all his tables occupied, just before his busiest hour, by a crowd of hungry tramps, who ravenously devoured his stock. As each man filed out after dinner, he handed the cashier an order signed by the creditor for fifteen cents, the amount on his check. It was impossible to obtain any money from the moneyless fellows who had eaten their fill, and they were allowed to depart in peace. The debtor was considerably out of pocket by the transaction, as the tramps had made free use of the articles on the tables for which no charge is made in the restaurants. It is not often that men who evade their obligations are punished in such amusing style, but they generally get punished in some way. As in the days of Malachi (3 : 8), men in our time, though honest to their fellow-men, are negligent in acknowledging their obligations to God, but the time will come when every man will indorse the Apostle Paul's statement on the subject (1 Tim. 4 : 8).

JOHN'S FIRST DOXOLOGY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father ; to him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen."—Rev. 1 : 5, 6.

An Outburst of Devotion—Characteristic of the Apostles—I. The Condition of Heart out of Which Outbursts Come—Who John Was—The Realized Person of Christ—The Acts Mentioned in the Doxology—No Cold Abstractions—Love's Anchor-Hold—Personal Gratitude for the Orphanage—Faith's Foothold—A Man Firmly Assured—Felt the Communion with Saints—II. The Outburst—One of Many—Progressive—Justified in Itself—The All-Inclusive Love—The Washing—The Peerage of Eternity—The Peculiar Priesthood—The Ascription.

JOHN had hardly begun to deliver his message to the seven churches, he had hardly given in his name and stated from whom the message came, when he felt that he must lift up his heart in a joyful doxology. The very mention of the name of the Lord Jesus, "the faithful witness, and the first begotten of the dead, and the Prince of the kings of the earth," fired his heart. He could not sit down coolly to write even what the Spirit of God dictated : he must rise ; he must fall upon his knees ; he must bless and magnify, and adore the Lord Jesus.

Now, in the matter of this bursting out of devotion at unexpected times, John is one among the rest of the apostles. Their love to their divine Master was so intense that they had only to hear His footfall and their pulse began to quicken, and if they heard His voice, then were they carried clean away; whether in the body or out of the body, they could not tell, but they were under constraint to magnify the Saviour's name ; whatever they were doing they felt compelled to pause at once, to render direct and distinct homage unto the Lord Jesus by adoration and doxology.

This explains to me, I think, those texts which bid us "rejoice evermore," "bless the Lord at all times," and "pray without ceasing ;" these do not mean that we are always to be engaged in devotional exercises, for that would cause a neglect of other duties. The very apostle who bids us "pray without ceasing," did a great many other things beside praying ; and we should certainly be very faulty if we shut ourselves up in our private chambers, and there continued perpetually upon our knees. Life has other duties, and necessary ones ; and in attending to these we may render to our God the truest worship ; to cease to work in our callings in order to spend all our time in prayer would be to offer to God one duty stained with the blood of many others. Yet we may "pray without ceasing," if our hearts are always in such a state that at every opportunity we are ready for prayer and praise ; better still, if we are prepared to make opportunities, if we are instant in season and out of season, and ready in a moment to adore and supplicate. We cannot be always singing, but we may be always full of gratitude, and this is the fabric of which true psalms are made.

This spontaneous outburst of John's love is what I am going to preach upon this morning. First of all I shall ask you to consider the condition of heart out of which such outbursts come, and then we will look more closely at the outburst itself ; for my great desire is that you and I may often be thus transported into praise, carried off into ecstatic worship.

I. First, let us look at the condition of heart out of which outbursts of adoration arise.

WHO WAS THIS MAN

who when he was beginning to address the churches must needs lay down his pen to praise the Saviour ? We will learn the character of the man from his own devout language. We shall see his inmost self here, for he is carried off his feet, and speaks out his very heart in the most unguarded manner. It would be easy to talk at great length about John from what we know of his history from other parts of Scripture ; but at this time I tie myself down to the words of the text, and I notice, first, that this man of doxologies, from whom praise flashes forth like light from the rising sun, is first of all a man who has realized the person of his Lord. The first word is, "Unto Him;" and then he must a second time before he has finished say, "To Him be glory and dominion." His Lord's person is evidently before his eye. He sees the actual Christ upon the throne.

The great fault of many professors is that Christ is to them a character upon paper; certainly more than a myth, but yet a person of the dim past, an historical personage who lived many years ago, and did most admirable deeds, by the which we are saved, but who is far from being a living, present, bright reality. Jesus was no abstraction to John; he loved Him too much for that. Love has a great vivifying power; it makes our impressions of those who are far away from us very lifelike, and brings them very near. John's could not think of Christ as a cloudy conception; but he remembered Him as that blessed One with whom he had spoken, and on whose breast he had leaned. You see that is so, for his song rises at once to the Lord's own self, beginning with, "Unto Him."

He makes us see Jesus in every act of which he speaks in his doxology. It runs thus: "Unto Him that loved us." It is not "Unto the love of God," an attribute, or an influence, or an emotion; but it is "Unto Him that loved us." I am very grateful for love, but more grateful to him who gives the love. Somehow, you may speak of love and eulogize it; but if you know it only in the abstract what is it? It neither warms the heart nor inspires the spirit. When love comes to us from a known person, then we value it. So, too, with the washing from sin. It is enough to make us sing of pardoning mercy forever and ever if we have been cleansed from sin;" but the centre of the joy is to adore Him "that washed us from our sins in His own blood." Observe that He cleansed us, not by some process outside of Himself, but by the shedding of His own blood of reconciliation. It brings the blood-washing into the highest estimation with the heart when we look into the wounds from whence the atonement flowed. So, too, if we are "kings and priests," it is Jesus who has made us so.

"Round the altar priests confess:
If their robes are white as snow,
'Twas the Saviour's righteousness
And His blood that made them so."

Our royal dignity and our priestly sanctity are both derived from Him.

"I SAW HIM,"

says the beloved apostle, and that vision almost blotted out the rest. His heart was all for Jesus. The censer must smoke unto Him, the song must rise unto Him; unto Himself, unto His very self.

I pray that every professor here may have a real Christ, for otherwise he will never be a real Christian. To have a real, personal Christ is to get good anchor-hold for love, and faith, and hope. Somehow men cannot love that which is not tangible. That which they cannot apprehend they do not love. When I was about to commence at Stockwell, a gentleman who had had very large experience in an excellent orphanage, said to me, "Begin by never expecting to receive the slightest gratitude from the parents of the children, and you will not be disappointed;" for, said he, "I have been connected with a certain orphanage," which he mentioned, "for a great many years, and except in the rarest case I have never seen any tokens of gratitude in any of the mothers whose children have been received." Now, my experience is very different. I have had a great many grips of the hand which meant warm thanks, and I have seen the tears start from the mother's eye full often, and many a grateful letter have I received because of help given to the orphan children.

How do I explain the difference? Not that our Orphanage has done more than the other; but the other Orphanage is conducted by a Committee with no well-known head, and hence it is somewhat of an abstraction; the poor women do not know who is to be thanked, and consequently thank nobody. In our own case the poor people say to themselves, "Here is Mr, Spurgeon, and he took our children into the Orphanage." They recognize in me the outward and visible representative of the many generous hearts that help me. They know me, for they can see me, and they say, "God bless you," because they have some one to say it to. There is nothing particular about me, certainly, and there are others who deserve far more gratitude than that which comes to me; but it does come to me because the poor people know the name and the man, and have not to look at a mere abstraction. Pardon the illustration; it suits my purpose well. If you have a Christ whom you cannot realize you will not love Him with that fervent affection which is so much to be desired.

This also gives foothold to faith. If you know the Lord Jesus you feel that you can trust Him. "They that know Thy name will put their trust in Thee." Those to whom Christ has become a well-known friend do not find it difficult to trust Him in the time of their distress. An unknown Christ is untrusted; but when the Holy Spirit reveals Jesus He also breeds faith. By the same means, your hope also becomes vivid, for you say, 'Oh, yes; I know Jesus, and I am sure that He will keep His word."

Next, the Apostle John, in whom we note this outburst of devotion, was

of his possession of the blessings for which he praised the Lord. Doubt has no outbursts; its chill breath freezes all things. Oh, for more assurance! Nowadays we hear Christian people talk in this way: "Unto Him that we hope has loved us, and that we humbly trust has washed us, and that we sometimes believe has made us kings, unto Him be glory." Alas! the doxology is so feeble that it seems to imply as little glory as you like. The fact is, if you do not know that you have a blessing, you do not know whether you ought to be grateful for it or not; but when a man knows he has covenant mercies, that divine assurance which the Holy Ghost gives to Christians works in him a sacred enthusiasm of devotion to Jesus. John was certain that he was loved, and he was furthermore most clear that he was washed, and therefore he poured forth his soul in praise. Oh, to know that you are washed from your sins in the blood of Jesus! This well-grounded assurance will throw you into ecstasy, and it will not be long before the deep of your heart will well up with fresh springs of adoring love. Then shall you also praise the Lord with some such words as these: "Unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood, to Him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen."

Once more. I think we have brought out two points which are clear enough. John had realized his Master, and firmly grasped the blessings which his Master brought him; but he had also felt, and was feeling very strongly, his

COMMUNION WITH ALL THE SAINTS.

Notice the use of the plural pronoun. We should not have wondered if he had said, "Unto Him that loved me, and washed me from my sins in His own blood." Somehow there would have been a loss of sweetness had the doxology been so worded, and it would have hardly sounded like John. John is the very mirror of love, and he cannot live alone, or rejoice in sacred benefits alone. John must have all the brotherhood round about him, and he must speak in their name, or he will be as one bereft of half himself. Beloved, it is well for you and me to use this "us" very often. There are times when it is better to say "me," but in general let us get away to the "us;" for has not our Lord taught us when we pray to say, "Our Father which art in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread; forgive us our trespasses," and so on?

Let me ask you, beloved brethren, do you not love the Lord Jesus all the better and praise Him all the more heartily because His grace and love are not given to you alone? Why, that blessed love has embraced your children, your neighbors, your fellow church-members, myriads who have gone before you, multitudes that are round about you, and an innumerable company who are coming after; and for this we ought to praise the gracious Lord with unbounded delight. It seems so much the more lovely—this salvation, when we think of it, not as a cup of water of which one or two of us may drink, but as a well of water opened in the desert, ever flowing, ever giving life and deliverance and restoration to all who pass that way. "Unto Him that loved us." O my Lord, I bless Thee for having loved me; but sometimes I think I could adore Thee for loving my wife, for loving my children, and all these dear friends around me, even if I had no personal share in Thy salvation. Thus much upon the condition of heart which suggests these doxologies.

II. Secondly, let us look at

THE OUTBURST ITSELF.

It is a doxology, and as such does not stand alone: it is one of many. In the Book of the Revelation doxologies are frequent, and in the first few chapters they distinctly grow as the book advances. If you have your Bibles with you, as you ought to have, you will notice that in this first outburst only two things are ascribed to our Lord. "To Him be glory and dominion forever and ever." Now turn to the fourth chapter at the ninth verse, and read, "Those living creatures give glory and honor and thanks to Him that sat on the throne." Here we have three words of honor. Run on to verse eleven, and read the same. "Saying, Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honor and power." The doxology has grown from two to three in each of these verses. Now turn to chapter 5: 13 "And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." Here we have four praise-notes. Steadily but surely there is an advance. By the time we get to chapter 7: 12, we have reached the number of perfection, and may not look for more. "Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honor, and power, and might, be unto our God forever and ever. Amen."

If you begin praising God you are bound to go on. The work engrosses the heart. It deepens and broadens like a rolling river. Praise may begin with the tear of gratitude; anon the bosom swells with love; thankfulness rises to a song; it breaks forth into a shout; it mounts up to join the everlasting hallelujahs which surround the throne of the Eternal. What a mercy it is that God by His Spirit will give us greater capacities by and by than we have here! for if we continue to learn more and more of the love of Christ which passeth knowledge we shall be driven to sore staits if confined within the narrow and drowsy framework of this mortal body. This poor apparatus of tongue and mouth is already inadequate for our zeal; but as Berridge says—

"Strip me of this house of clay,
And I will sing as loud as they."

These doxologies occur again and again throughout this book as if to remind us to be frequent in praise; and they grow as they proceed, to hint to us that we also should increase in thankfulness.

Now, this outburst carried within itself its own justification. Look at it closely and you perceive the reasons why, in this enthusiastic manner, John adores his Saviour. The first is,

"Unto Him that loved us." This love is in the present tense, for the passage may be read, "Unto Him that loveth us." Our Lord in His glory still loves us as truly and as fervently as He did in the days of His flesh. He loved us before the world was, He loveth us now with all His heart, and He will love us when sun, and moon, and stars have all expired like sparks that die when the fire is quenched upon the hearth and men go to their beds. "He loveth us."

He loved us first before He washed us; "Unto Him that loved us, and washed us." Not "Unto Him that washed us and loved us." This is one of the glories of Christ's love, that it comes to us while we are defiled with sin—yea, dead in sin. Christ's love does not only go out to us as washed, purified, and cleansed, but it went out toward us while we were yet foul and vile, and without anything in us that could be worthy of His love at all. He loved us, and then washed us; love is the fountain-head, the first source of blessing.

Think of this as being

A RECOGNIZABLE DESCRIPTION

of our Lord—"Unto Him that loved us." John wanted to point out the Lord Jesus Christ, and all he said was, "Unto Him that loved us." He was sure nobody would make any mistake as to who was intended, for no one can be said to love us in comparison with Jesus. It is interesting to note that, as John is spoken of as "that disciple whom Jesus loved," so now the servant describes the Master in something like the same terms: "Unto Him that loved us." No one fails to recognize John or the Lord Jesus under their several love-names.

He loves us; this is matter for admiration and amazement. O my brethren, this is an abyss of wonder to me! I can understand that Jesus pities us; I can very well understand that He has compassion on us; but that the Lord of glory loves us is a deep, great, heavenly thought, which my finite mind can hardly hold. Come, brother, and drink of this wine on the lees, well refined. Jesus loves you. Grasp that.

Remember, He loves you with His own love according to His own nature. Therefore He has for you an infinite love altogether immeasurable. It is also like Himself, immutable; and can never know a change. The Emperor Augustus was noted for his faithfulness to his friends, whom he was slow in choosing. He used to say, "Late ere I love, long ere I leave." Our blessed Lord loved us early, but He never leaves us. Has He not said, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee?" The love of Jesus is a pure, perfect, and divine love; a love whose heights and depths none can measure.

Then the apostle passes on to the second reason why he should thus magnify the Lord Jesus by saying, "and washed us from our sins in His own blood." "Washed us." Then we were foul; and He loved us though we were unclean. He washed us who had been more defiled than any. How could He condescend so far as to wash us? Would He have anything to do with such filthiness as ours? Would that sublime holiness of His come into contact with the abominable guilt of our nature and our practice? Yes, He loved us so much that He washed us from our sins, black as they were.

But think of

HOW HE WASHED US

—"with His own blood." Men are chary of their own blood, for it is their life; yet will brave ones pour it out for their country or for some worthy object; but Jesus shed His blood for such unworthy ones as we are, that He might by His atonement forever put away the iniquity of His people. At what a cost was this cleansing provided! Too great a cost I had almost said. Have you never felt at times as if, had you been there and seen the Lord of glory about to bleed to death for you, you would have said, "No, my Lord, the price is too great to pay for such a one as I am?" But He has done it; brethren, His sin-atoning work is finished forever; Jesus has bled, and He has washed us, and we are clean beyond fear of future defilement. Shall He not have glory for this?

Nor is this all. The Lord that loved us would do nothing by halves, and therefore when He washed us in His own blood, He "made us kings." What is that?

ARE WE KINGS

this morning? We do not feel our crowns as yet, nor perhaps grasp our sceptres as we might, but the Lord has made us a royal priesthood. We reign over our own selves, and that is a dominion which is hard to gain, indeed, impossible without grace. We walk like kings among the sons of men, honored before the Lord and His holy angels—the peerage of eternity.

Furthermore our Lord has made us priests. Certain men impiously set up to be priests above the rest of the Lord's people. As Korah, Dathan, and Abiram are they, and they had need fear lest they and their evil system should go down into the pit. Whoever they may be, all the people of God are priests. Every man that believes in Jesus Christ is from that moment a priest, though he be neither shaven nor shorn, nor bedecked in peculiar array. We are to be priests for all mankind. Wherever we go we are to teach men, and to intercede with God for them. In prayer and praise we are to offer up acceptable oblations, and we are ourselves to be living sacrifices, acceptable unto God by Jesus Christ our Lord. Oh, what dignity is this! How you and I are bound to serve God! Peter Martyr told Queen Elizabeth: "Kings and queens are more bound to obey God than any other persons; first as God's creatures, and secondly as His servants in office." This applies to us also. If common men are bound to serve God how much more those whom He has made kings and priests unto His name!

What does the doxology say? "To Him be glory and dominion." First, "To Him be glory." Oh, give Him glory, my beloved, this morning! Do I address any that have never yet accepted Christ's salvation? Accept it now, and thus give your Saviour glory. Have you never trusted Jesus to save you? The best, the only thing you can do to give Him glory is to trust Him now, sinner as you are, that He may remove your transgressions. Are you saved? Then, dear brother, give Him glory by speaking well of His name, and by perpetual adoration. Glorify Him in your songs, glorify Him in your lives. Behave yourselves as His disciples should do, and may His Spirit help you.

But the doxology also ascribes to Him dominion. My heart longs for Jesus to have dominion. I wish He might get dominion over some poor heart this morning which has hitherto been in rebellion against Him! Yield thee, rebel! Yield thee to thy Sovereign and Saviour! "Kiss the Son, lest He be angry, and ye perish from the way, when His wrath is kindled but a little." To Him be dominion over hearts that have never submitted to Him; and assuredly to Him be fullest dominion over hearts that love Him. Reign, my Lord, reign in my bosom more and more; cast out every enemy and every rival; reign supreme, and reign eternally.

Then it is added, let Him have glory and dominion

"FOR EVER AND EVER."

I suppose we shall have some gentlemen coming up to prove that "forever and ever" only means for a time. They tell us that everlasting punishment means only for a time, and, of course, everlasting life must mean just the same, and this praise must also have a limit. I mean not so, nor do you, beloved. I pray that our Lord may have endless glory, eternal dominion. I pray that Christ's power and dominion may be over this generation, and the next, and the next, until He cometh, and then that it may be said, "The Lord shall reign forever and ever."

Now we have come to the last word of the text. It finishes up with "Amen." "Forever and ever. Amen." Can you heartily say "Amen" to this? Do you wish Christ to have glory and dominion forever and ever? If you know He loved you, I am sure you do; if you know He washed you, I am sure you do. Now let our beating hearts in solemn silence say, "Amen;" and when we have done that, do you think you could join with one voice with me and say it out aloud, like thunder? Now, "Unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and His Father, to Him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen;" and "Amen" yet again. (Here the great congregation joined aloud with the preacher.) The prayers of David, the son of Jesse were ended when He came to that, and so may ours be, and so may this morning's service be. God bless you through His adorable Son. Amen and Amen.

A BOAT ATTACKED BY A HIPPOPOTAMUS.

A CORRESPONDENT, telegraphing from Madeira, reports a lamentable occurrence on the Mayumba River, not far from Ponta Negro, West Africa, by which two naval officers belonging to the British gun-boat Stork and a civilian lost their lives. (An illustration of the event is given on the next page.) The Stork had been ordered south to St. Paul de Loanda, and on her way thither she called in at the place mentioned. The officers met with a cordial reception from Mr. Prenslau, factory agent, under whose auspices a boating trip in the Mayumba seems to have been arranged.

The party consisted of Lieutenant Blennerhasset, commander of the Stork, two of his officers, and a merchant. They left in a large whaleboat, manned by a dozen natives, and enjoyed several hours' shooting. In the evening, when about a mile from Mambe, the residence of Mr. Wilson, an English merchant, and about ten yards only from the rushes which line the river bank, they were suddenly attacked by a huge hippopotamus, which by a single blow stove in the port-quarter of the boat, capsizing her and filling her in a few seconds.

The animal, probably wounded, and thus infuriated, made a ferocious and determined onslaught on the boat, and all the efforts of the occupants to beat it off were unavailing. The struggle was a fierce one, and in the end the boat was swamped and capsized, and all the occupants were thrown struggling into the water. With great difficulty Lieutenant Blennerhasset was saved, but the two officers and the merchant were all killed. The appearance of the bodies when found three days afterward showed that they had died from wounds inflicted by the savage monster, and not from drowning. The sad event has cast a gloom over the whole community, and especially on board the Stork, on which the deceased officers were popular.

As we read narratives of this kind, and shudder at the suffering and loss of life caused by the fierce brutes that infest the earth, we cannot but think of the different condition this world would have been in if man had not fallen. God gave man in Eden supreme control over the brute creation, but now an uncrowned monarch he is liable at any time to become the victim of his rebellious subjects. But the Scriptures encourage us to look forward in this matter, and not backward only. In the time of the restitution of all things the deposed monarch will once more resume his sway. The savage instincts of the brute will be tamed; the leopard will lie down with the kid, and a child will lead them. That that time may come quickly, and that we may through faith in Christ have our portion in it, let us pray without ceasing.

A MINISTER'S PERIL IN THE BUSH.

THE illustration on the right of this page depicts an incident in the life of the Rev. R. W. Vanderkiste, a Wesleyan minister in New South Wales, who met with a large variety of thrilling experiences. The following incident is thus described by himself: "I used to delight in riding to some lone and ministerless district, and, obtaining there a fresh horse and a guide, spend a couple of days in dashing about the bush in all directions, from early morning to late at night, making ten minutes' visits, praying and talking about Jesus to squatter, hut-keeper, shepherd, stockman, settler, and any one else whom I met. I used to enjoy this exceedingly. Heavy falls, and some other dangers, were encountered; but I never received any permanent injury except in one instance. But I had many narrow escapes.

"On one occasion, being in a strange part of the colony when the waters had risen rapidly, and having no guide, I came to a river, on the bank of which stood a dilapidated bark-hut. Dirty children were playing about, and an untidy, repulsive-looking woman was busied about the premises. I perceived that it was a ford, and asked the woman if it were safe to cross, as the rivers were high. She said, 'Quite safe; you can cross easy.' But there was a still, deep, yet eddying appearance about the water, which I was narrowly observing while conversing with this person, and which made me undecided.

"Under circumstances of doubt, it has been my wont to lift up my heart, childlike, to God for a Father's direction. The result in this case was that I decided not to venture, and riding back from the river, reached the residence of a squatter, a magistrate of the district, in time for dinner. I mentioned the ford, and, in answer to his question, described the hut and the woman, and the assurance of safety she had given me. His countenance fell as he said, 'That ford was washed away some time ago.' Had the ford been in existence, it is probable that a stout horse would have found enough work to wade or swim his way against the body of water which was rushing down; but, the ford itself being gone, to have tried to cross would have been almost certain death.

"The woman's assurance of the safety of the ford was explained to me afterward by the discovery that the district was one of the principal harbors for bushrangers, a favorite haunt of cattle-stealers and other bad characters. I removed, soon after, to a distant part of the colony, and was never able afterward to revisit this scene of danger and deliverance."

In a time of doubt, such as that experienced by Mr. Vanderkiste, the ungodly man is left to his own unaided reasoning, but the child of God naturally looks up for guidance to his Heavenly Father, who will keep him safely until his work is done (Prov. 3 : 6).

MR. G. MULLER, OF BRISTOL, AND HIS MISSIONS.

THE report just issued by Mr. Muller furnishes another striking illustration of the faithfulness of God in providing for the large family of orphans at Ashley Down, and the many other good works of the founder. Mr. Muller commences his interesting statement by giving his reasons for being so long absent from home during the past twelve months. He says: "A few Christian friends, who wished well to the Institution, desired me to discontinue my long missionary tours, as it appeared to them that that was the especial reason why the income had fallen off. I did not think so, however, because year after year, for several months at a time, the Scriptural Knowledge Institution had been left during my absence; and whenever I returned to Bristol I found that each branch of the Institution was in as good working order as if I had been on the spot.

The report contains a deeply interesting narrative of Mr. R. Muller's recent missionary journeys. A practical illustration of the difficulties of spreading the Gospel in Russia is given, and earnest prayer is desired for that vast country. The tenth journey was commenced on September 27th, when Mr. and Mrs. Muller started for Madras, in order to spend six months in Gospel itineracy in India.

Many persons may suppose that the care of the orphans is the only work carried on by Mr. Muller and his helpers at Bristol; a glance at this report will soon reveal other works which are equally important and deserving of support. The day and Sunday-school work is a most important factor in the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom. Next comes the Bible circulation, the results of which eternity alone can reveal. Out of the missionary fund help is given to 132 laborers in different parts of the globe.

The orphan account shows a balance in hand. Conspicuous among the offerings are those of orphans who have in former years reaped the benefits of the Institution. It must cheer the hearts of directors and supporters to see those whom the Institution has befriended contributing toward its maintenance.

DR. CLIFFORD'S VISIT TO A DYING CONTRACTOR.

MR. PETER ROGERSON was a self-made man. He commenced life as a bricklayer's laborer, carrying the hod till he was 25 years of age. At 50 he was one of the busiest contractors in London; and at 60 he was worth a large fortune. He had tried to get into Parliament—contested a small borough at a bye-election, and debauched the constituency with his gold. But he failed. The free and independent electors of the little town were not very squeamish, but they drew the line at Mr. Peter Rogerson. They took his money, of course, and drank his ale, and cheered and laughed heartily at his rather broad speeches, and then went and voted for the old Squire's nephew, Captain French, of the Guards, who had never earned a penny in his life, and was head over ears in debt. Such are the whims and prejudices of the rural voter.

Mr. Peter Rogerson was not a philosopher, so he took his defeat very much to heart. Engineering difficulties, which would have disheartened other men, were nothing to him. A tunnel through the flinty rock, a bridge over shifting sands, were but trifles, in overcoming which he took a sort of masterful delight. But that was in his younger days, when his hand was steady and his head cool. Now his hand was always trembling, his brain constantly on fire, all his moral courage gone; for in his prosperity he had fallen into habits of dissipation, which in his earlier days he had been preserved from. His chagrin at the result of the election was extreme. He retired to his country house and shut himself up alone in his room. And yet not exactly alone, for he had with him the companion of his later years, the brandy-bottle. He came not forth from his room even for his meals, but had them sent up to him. In truth, he ate but little; brandy, brandy, and again brandy was his chief subsistence.

Mr. Peter Rogerson, in spite of all his wealth, had not many friends. Servants he had by the score, and sycophantic acquaintances who bore with his gross humors for what they hoped to get out of him. His wife was dead—a happy release for her, for he had led her a miserable life—and his only son was either sheep-farming in the Australian bush or skittle-sharping in the slums of some continental city. The latter most probably, for he had been expelled in disgrace from Oxford for cheating at cards, and almost certainly had by this time squandered the large sum of money with which his father cut him off and banished him from his sight forever.

But the successful contractor had one friend, Dr. Clifford, a college chum of young Rogerson's, one who had helped him out of scrapes innumerable, and who, in return, had been presented to a first-rate country practice by the scapegrace's grateful parent. Dr. Clifford had conceived a liking for his benefactor apart from the claims the latter had on his gratitude. He saw in him a man of remarkable ability and of no little generosity, though spoiled by prosperity and by the absence of moral and religious principles. He saw with sorrow his increasing fondness for liquor, and had urged him to abandon it.

Dr. Clifford's Return from the Contractor's Death-bed.

The wintry morning sun with its red face was looking coldly upon the white earth when Dr. Clifford, in obedience to a summons from his benefactor, rang the lodge bell at the contractor's country house, Bankside, near Welmsdale. A respectable old lady emerged from the lodge, and with a kindly, albeit respectful, greeting to the doctor, opened the door.

"Good-morning, Mrs. Fraser!" exclaimed Dr. Clifford, politely raising his hat. "What a fine bracing morning!"

"It is that," answered the old lady, with a broad Scotch accent. "It's grand weather for the time of year, and it's to be hoped it will continue. But what's the matter, doctor? Is Mr. Rogerson ill, or is it only a friendly visit?"

"I fancy it's both, Mrs. Fraser, but I'll tell you when I come down." Saying which the young doctor passed up the avenue and into the house.

Wearily the wintry day wore on. Mrs. Fraser had sat for hours at the lodge window, looking eagerly up the avenue for the form of the returning doctor, but he came not. Her frugal midday meal was over, and the sun was near its setting, when at last the doctor's footstep was heard upon the snow-covered gravel. The old lady rose and bustled to the gate, but as she held it open for the doctor to pass out she cast an anxious, searching look up into his face.

"I am afraid I have no good news for you, Mrs. Fraser," observed Dr. Clifford, reading the question in her face. "Mr. Rogerson has been ill, very ill; indeed, he will never be well again."

"O doctor, he is not dead, is he?" said Mrs. Fraser.

"Yes, my good woman, it is all over. I doubt if I could have saved him if I had been sent for earlier. As it was there was no hope, though I did my utmost."

The doctor said no more as he passed out of the gate; but he might have told a terrible story of that day's experience. When he arrived in the morning he had found the contractor a raving maniac. He had not been sober in several days, and had been more or less under the influence of liquor ever since he had learned of his electoral defeat. The potations at night had been followed by heavy sleep, from which he awoke with a headache that was torture. He had applied again to the brandy-bottle until he fell into stupor, from which he was awaked only to drink again. This had gone on day by day, until at last the servants had sent for the doctor. But it was too late for treatment, and Dr. Clifford, after struggling through the short winter day with the frenzied man, saw him die, unable to give relief. It was a horrible deathbed, such as even he had been unnerved by witnessing.

The funeral was a spectacle that furnished a commentary on the vanity of worldly prosperity. Beside the doctor the only persons present were the hired servants. Rogerson had believed in "the gospel of getting on," the only gospel he did believe in, and the words of the burial service uttered over his dead body sounded like a mockery. He had succeeded as the world counts success, but there was no hope in his death, and even the question: "Whose shall these things be which thou hast provided?" he had not answered. Nothing was heard of his son, and after a long interval the estate, which had been acquired at such a stupendous moral cost, was dissipated by lawsuits between the dead contractor's distant relatives. Such was the end of one who at the outset of his career made not God his guide, who lived only for the world, and who received the wages which Satan gives to his slaves.

A SERIAL STORY.

Light out of Darkness.

THE gale off the Cape of Good Hope was weathered at last, and the vessel sailed into smoother seas. The bitterness of the cold was over, and only fresh invigorating breezes swept across the water. Nothing could have been more helpful toward Mr. Chantrey's recovery, except his new freedom from sorrow. His trouble had passed away like the storm. He could not but trust that the same strength which had been given to his wife in her hour of fiercest temptation would be still granted to her in ordinary trials, from which he could not always shield her. Sophy herself was full of hope. She felt her will, so long enslaved, regaining its former freedom, and her brain recovering its old clearness. The pleasures and duties of life had once more a charm for her. It was as though some madness and delusion had passed away, and she was once more in her right mind.

The voyage between Australia and New Zealand, taken in a crowded and comfortless steamer, was a severe testing time for her. It lasted for several days, and she could not be kept from the influence of the drinking customs of those on board. But she never quitted the side either of her husband or Ann Holland. In New Zealand, where no one knew the story of her past life, except Mr. Warden, it was more easy to face the future, and to carry out the reformation begun in her. They were poor, far poorer than she had ever expected to be, and she had harder work than she had been accustomed to do; but such exertions were beneficial to her.

Ann Holland, as a matter of course, lived with them in their little home, from which Mr. Chantrey was often absent while visiting the distant portions of his large parish, which extended over many miles. But Ann was not left to do all the drudgery of the household unaided. Sophy Chantrey would take her share in her every duty, and seldom sat down to sew or write unless Ann was ready to rest also. The old want of something to do could never revisit her; the old sense of loneliness could not come back. There was her boy to teach, and her simple, homely neighbors to associate with. The customs and conventionalities of English life had no force here, and she was free to act as she pleased. As the years passed by, David Chantrey lost forever a secret lurking dread lest his wife's sin should be only biding its time. He could go away in peace, and return home gladly, having almost forgotten the reason of his exchanging the pleasant rectory of Upton for the hard work of a colonial living.

From time to time letters reached them from Mrs. Bolton, complaining bitterly of the changes introduced by the new rector, whose customs and opinions constantly clashed with her own. She found herself put on one side, and quietly neglected in all questions concerning the parish; while her influence gradually died away. Again and again she urged her nephew to return to England, promising that she would make him her heir, and procure for him a living as valuable as the one he had resigned. She could not understand that to a man like David Chantrey the calm happy consciousness of days well spent, and the grateful remembrance of a terrible sorrow having been removed, were better than anything earth could give.

The old pride he had once felt in his social position and personal popularity could never lift up its crest again. He had gone down to the Valley of Humiliation, and there, to his surprise, he found "that the air was pleasant, and that here a man shall be free from the noise and hurryings of this life, and shall not be let and hindered in his contemplation, as in other places he is apt to be." His laborious simple life suited him, and no entreaties or promises of Mrs. Bolton could recall him to England.

Eight tranquil years had passed by when So-phy Chantrey detected in her husband a degree of preoccupation and reticence that had long been unusual to him. For a few days he kept the secret; but at last, just as she began to feel she could bear his reserve no longer he spoke out.

"Sophy," he said, "I have had some letters from England."

"From Aunt Bolton?" she asked, with a faint undertone of vexation in her voice, for Mrs. Bolton's letters always revived bitter memories in her mind.

"No," he answered, holding out to her a large bulky packet; "they are from the bishop—our English bishop, you know—just a few lines; and from the Upton people. It seems that the living is about to be vacant again, for Seymour has had a very good one presented to him in the north; and the parishioners have petitioned the bishop, and petitioned me to accept the charge again. See, here are hundreds of signatures, and the churchwardens tell me every man and woman in the parish would have signed if there had been room. The bishop speaks very kindly about it, too, and they want my answer by the mail going out next week."

"And what will you say?" asked Sophy breathlessly.

"It is for you to say," he answered; "you must decide. Could you go back happily, Sophy? As for me, I never loved, or shall love, any place like Upton. I dream of it often. Yet I could not return to it at any great cost to you, be sure of that. You must answer the question. We have been very happy together here, all of us; and you and I have been truer Christians than perhaps we could ever have been if we had stayed at home. If you decide to settle here, I for one will never regret it."

"Would it be safe for me to go back?" she faltered.

"As safe for you as for me," he answered emphatically; "do not be afraid of that. A sin conquered and uprooted, as yours has been, is less likely to overcome us than some new temptation. I have no fear of that."

For the next few days Sophy Chantrey went through her daily work as in a dream. There were many things to weigh and consider, and her husband left her to herself, acting as if he had dismissed the subject altogether from his mind. For herself she shrank from returning among the people who had known her in her worst days, and whose curious suspicious eyes would be always watching her, and bringing to her mind sad recollections. She knew well that all her life long there would be the memory of her sin kept alive in the hearts of her husband's parishioners if he went back as rector of Upton. Yet she could not resolve to banish him from the place he loved so well, and the people who were so eager to have him with them again as their pastor. There was nothing to be dreaded on account of his health, which was fully re-established.

There was her boy, too, who was growing old enough to require better teaching than they could secure for him in the colony. Ann Holland would be overjoyed to think of seeing Upton again, and to return to her old friends and townsfolk. No; they must not be doomed to continual exile for her sake. She must take up the cross that lay before her, from which she had so long escaped, and be willing to bear the penalty of her transgressions, learning that no sins, though forgiven, can be blotted out as far as their consequences are concerned—can never be, through endless years, as though they had never been.

"We must go home to Upton," she said to her husband the evening before the mail left for England. "I have considered everything, and we must go."

"Willingly, Sophy? Gladly?" he asked, looking keenly into her face, so changed from when he had seen it first. What lines there were upon it which ought not to have been there so early, he knew well. How different it was from the fair fresh face of his young wife when they first went home to Upton Rectory. Yet he loved her better now than then.

"Willingly, though not gladly yet," she answered; "but do not argue with me. Do not try to persuade me against my own decision. You all came out for my sake, and I am bent upon returning for yours. In time I shall be as glad that I returned as you are that you came out, though I am not glad now. I shall be a standing lesson to the people of Upton."

"But I do not wish my wife to be a lesson," he said fondly. Yet he could not urge her to alter her decision. The old home and the old church, which he had diligently tried to forget, thrust themselves as freshly and imperiously upon his memory as if he had left them but yesterday. He had not known how great his sacrifice had been when he had given them up in his misery. Ann Holland and his boy shared his delight, and before they sailed for home Sophy herself found that she could take very real pleasure in their new prospects.

Mrs. Bolton did not live to welcome them back to Upton. The last few years had been years of vexation and loneliness to her, and there had been no one to care for her and to help her to bear her troubles. She had been ailing for some time, and the trying changes of the spring hastened her death before her favorite nephew could reach England. The hired nurses who attended her through her last illness heard her often muttering to herself, as if her enfeebled brain was possessed by one idea, "If any will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow Me." The words haunted her, and once she said, in an awed voice and with a look of pain, "He that taketh not up his cross and followeth after Me, is not worthy of Me." "Not worthy of me!" she repeated, mournfully, "not worthy of me!"

Passing through the mind of the dying worldly Christian were solemn thoughts. The world receding from her view, she was looking into the future. Well enough she knew that in the world to which she was hastening she must appear before the Being, whose voice spoke the solemn words that her conscience recalled, "Not worthy of Me." Who would not be accounted worthy? Those who in life had shrunk from bearing the cross. Was not that reasonable? Was it too much to be asked by Him who had humiliated Himself in life and gone voluntarily to an ignominious death to ransom others. Could not He ask those for whom He suffered and died to deny themselves for their fellows? The dying woman's conscience, speaking now in tones of thunder, told her He had that right.

Had she obeyed? Had she not rather defrauded her Saviour?

It was now really for the first time that her conduct thus passed before her. The archdeacon's widow could see by the light of memory the obeisance of the parish poor whom she was accustomed to visit. Again the respectful tones of the people struck her ear. She was accounted worthy by them, and her friends among the richer folk held her up as a model of piety and devotion. She had been ready to accept their judgment, and in the days of health and prosperity she had held herself to be a worthy Christian. Now she was about to stand before Him whose favor was life, whose frown was death, and He had said, "Not worthy."

How small now appeared to her enlightened soul the services she had rendered. The visits to the sick, the charitable gifts to the poor, the punctual and regular attendance at church—on all these she had prided herself. Now she saw them in another light. Those services had been her delight. If she had never known the Saviour she would have done just as she had done. She was happier living so. Any other life would not have so ministered to her vanity and love of approbation. Not one of those duties had been performed for Christ's sake. They gave her no comfort now; they were the robes of her own righteousness, worthless as filthy rags. She struggled to forget them as something that had deluded and cheated her.

Then there was Sophy. She thought of her with a paroxysm of self-upbraiding torture. Mr. Warden had solemnly warned her that she ought to help her erring, sinful relative, and she had heeded not. When she was told how she might save that poor weak creature, she had not attempted to do so in the only way that had a chance of success. She had seen Sophy sink lower and lower in degradation, and had counted the cost too much to save her. What was that cost? Simply the good opinion of the world. She had not dared to appear singular or unfashionable or inhospitable. Rather than appear to be either of these, she had continued to use the poison that was destroying Sophy, body and soul. As she lay there she saw the cross to have been a very light one, yet she had refused to take it up to save a soul. No wonder that Christ's words rang in her ears: "Not worthy of Me."

Might there not also have been others, of whom she did not know, who had similarly suffered at her hands? Others whom liquor had made its slave, and who might have been encouraged to abstain, if she had set them an example? This thought turned the consciousness of influence, on which she had once prided herself, into gall and bitterness. True, Sophy was saved, but not through her. She had not helped in the work. She had, on the contrary, blamed her nephew, and tried to dissuade him from taking up the cross she had refused.

This was a different death-bed from that she had looked forward to. It was as a respectable, honorable churchwoman that she had expected to leave the world; now she could utter no cry so appropriate as that of the publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner."

Something of all this she told the curate, who was a constant visitor in her sick chamber, but more than ever she longed for David Chantrey's return that she might tell him. She longed inexpressibly that the man who had taken up the cross might plead at her bedside for forgiveness for her, who had neglected it. But that desire was not granted. The lamp of life was flickering in its socket, and she knew that she would never see her nephew again. She had counted the days that would elapse before he could arrive, and she had measured her strength and was convinced it was hopeless. But God mercifully permitted her to receive assurance of forgiveness. A deep calm settled on her soul as she thought of the promises to the sinful and the negligent Christian repentant, and when a few days before the vessel in which the wanderers were journeying homeward entered the harbor, she died, there was not in this world a more humble, self-abased believer. She died trusting solely to the one hope—the love of the sinner's Saviour.

The rector of Upton and his wife have dwelt among their own people again for some years. Though the story is still sometimes told of Mrs. Chantrey's sin, the life she leads among them is a better lesson than perhaps it could have been had she never fallen. They see in her one who has not merely been tempted, but who has conquered and escaped from the tyranny of a vice shamefully common among us. There is hope for the feeblest and the most degraded when they hear of her, or when they learn the story from her own lips. For if by the sorrowful confession she can help any one, she does not shrink from making it, with tears often, but with a profound thankfulness for the deliverance wrought out for her by those who made themselves "fellow-workers with God."

Ann Holland found her shop and pleasant kitchen transformed into a fashionable draper's establishment, with plate glass windows down to the pavement. But she did not need a home. David and Sophy Chantrey would not have parted from her if the old house had not been gone. A few of her old-fashioned goods she managed to gather together again, to furnish her own room at the rectory, and among them was the screen containing the newspaper records of events at Upton. One long column gives a high-flown description of the rector's return to his old parish, and Ann feels a glow of pleasant pride at seeing her own name there in print.

THE END.

ELI'S DEATH.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 7. 1 Sam. 4 : 1-18. Golden Text, verse 22. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A Necessary Crisis—Israel's Defeat—Their Faith in the Ark—The Lord Forgotten—Sin in the Lord's Officers Peculiarly Heinous—Outward Service Belied—The Philistines Overawed—Ungodly Desire for Christian Intercession—Eli's Forebodings—His Sad Death—A Child's Significant Name—The Philistine's Fatal Spoil—Heathen Priests Involuntary Preachers—God's Witness to Himself.

THE child Samuel, once established by God Himself to be His prophet, "the word of Samuel came to all Israel." Thus there was a testimony, and a true one, to the living God. But it was good in the midst of evil, and truth in the midst of error. The Word was revealed to Samuel, and by Samuel was brought to bear upon the people, but things were still terribly wrong in Israel, and the Lord had to bring about that the evil might be subdued. "Israel went out against the Philistines to battle:" it may be that they were roused by Samuel's words to do something, and a bold attack upon the Philistines was the best thing they could think of. The place of their encampment was the best that could be; it was Ebenezer, which means the stone of help. ["Hitherto hath the Lord helped me" (Ch. 7 : 12).] The Philistines camped in Aphek [fortress or strength]. No strength is equal to experience of the Lord's succor, and yet the children of Israel did not succeed. They were not acting under the direction of God, nor were they relying upon His strength, so "Israel was smitten before the Philistines."

This was a great mortification to the elders of Israel, and when the unsuccessful soldiers returned into the camp, they said, "Wherefore hath the Lord smitten us to-day before the Philistines? Let us fetch the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of Shiloh unto us, that, when it cometh among us, it may save us out of the hand of our enemies." Oh, how the heart of Israel had departed from God! they were not looking to Him to save them, but only to of His presence; they did not say that He may save, but that it may save us. Oh, how many there are who look to the outward sign of a sacrament to save them! how many look to a church for salvation! how many to some wonderful experience! There are many who go to some meeting or some convention, expecting it to do the work; there are many who look to Bethshan, Mämedorf, Hauptweil, or Boll to heal their bodies. God is a jealous God; He will never suffer any "it" to take His place.

The people, in their mistaken zeal, went to Shiloh, and there with the ark of God was the sin of man, embodied in Hophni and Phinehas, instead of the power and presence of God manifest in the pillar of cloud and of fire. The people thought it must answer if the ark came into their midst, but God's thoughts are higher than man's, and He hated the ministry of those sinful young men; "Be ye clean, that bear the vessels of the Lord" (Isa. 52 : 11) is His word. When a minister, an evangelist, a Sunday-school teacher, or a district visitor manifests anger, overreaching, jealousy, or, worse still, the more flagrant sins of uncleanness, lying, theft, etc., the consequences of that sin are incalculably greater than when committed by one who has no such office; it is making "Christ the minister of sin" (Gal. 2 : 17). God speaks terrible words of sinful teachers, "I have seen also in the prophets of Jerusalem an horrible thing: they commit adultery, and walk in lies: they strengthen also the hands of evildoers, that none doth return from his wickedness" (Jer. 23 : 14).

Hophni and Phinehas did not neglect the outward service of God; when the ark was sought for, they were at their post, but all the while by their lives they were denying the God whom they professed to serve. When an evangelist can preach and pray with the utmost earnestness, can say he lives only for God, and that he does not belong to himself, and then loses his temper because somebody does not appreciate him, because his salary is not forthcoming, etc., the most stupid observer would say that he is making a false profession, and that he knows nothing of real devotion. Numbers of upright Christians are held back from holiness meetings by this mixing of sin with the highest professions of holiness.

GOD IS NOT SUBJECT TO MAN;

the stratagem did not answer; the bringing of the ark was not the bringing of God into the camp, man is not God's master, and churches, experiences, plans without Him are futile. The ark with a Hophni and Phinehas had no power against the Philistines: for a moment only they were overawed. They heard the children of Israel shout when the ark of God came into the camp, "so that the earth rang again;" "and the Philistines were afraid; for they said, God is come into the camp. And they said, Woe unto us! for there hath not been such a thing heretofore. Woe unto us! who shall deliver us out of the hand of these mighty Gods? these are the Gods that smote the Egyptians with all the plagues in the wilderness. Be strong, and quit yourselves like men, O ye Philistines, that ye be not servants unto the Hebrews, as they have been to you: quit yourselves like men, and fight." Every outward advantage was on the side of Israel, the fear of the Philistines was calculated to make them an easy prey, but no pillar of cloud or of fire stood over the ark, and without God it was a mere chest of wood without virtue and without power. Oh, how frequently we find that men want to subject the power of God to their own purposes; a man who has no hold on God himself will ask the prayers of a believer who lives in an atmosphere of answered prayer, that he may obtain some purely selfish end—success in some business scheme for his own personal benefit, never intending that the profits shall be the Lord's—healing from some disease, only to be able to live more completely for his own ends—success in some mission work, not at all for the sake of the salvation of souls, but that the collections may bring him in a good living; in some instances we have known sentimental young women write for prayer that some young man may ask them in marriage! One's soul turns from this desecration, this unbecoming attempt on the part of men to trick God into serving their purposes; it will answer no better than the bringing of the ark into the camp. Those who attempt in this manner to avail themselves of the intercession of Christians, must know that the Holy Ghost, who prompts real prayer, is not taken in by man's devices.

THE LORD WAS NOT WITH ISRAEL,

BAD NEWS

always travels quickly; a man of Benjamin ran, with his clothes rent and earth upon his head, to Shiloh the same day. The old priest "Eli sat upon a seat by the wayside watching;" he knew that God had determined evil upon his house. His heart was full of anxiety; the calm of one whose conscience is all right did not belong to the poor old man; he knew the doom, pronounced by the Lord through Samuel, was coming nearer every day, and his heart could not but misgive him for the rash act of the children of Israel, "his heart trembled for the ark of God." A great cry and tumult throughout the city was the first indication that something was wrong. The old man's eyes were dim, and he asked, "What meaneth the noise of this tumult? And the man came in hastily, and told Eli;" he said, "Israel is fled before the Philistines, and there hath been also a great slaughter among the people, and thy two sons, also, Hophni and Phinehas, are dead, and the ark of God is taken." For the defeat of his people Eli was prepared, for the death of his two sons also, but when, added to all this crushing sorrow, the very ark of God was taken, it was too much for him. The tension of watching with more than a presentiment of evil had been very great, and now when a grief had come infinitely greater than all which he had feared, the strain became too great, and he gave way under it; when the messenger "made mention of the ark of God, Eli fell from off the seat backward by the side of the gate, and his neck broke, and he died: for he was an old man, and heavy." It was caused by the consequences of his sins of omission. And the trouble came not on him alone; his whole family was involved in it. His daughter-in-law gave birth to a child, and named him Ichabod [where is the glory?]. The ark was taken, her father-in-law and her husband were dead, and she, too, died, saying, "The glory is departed from Israel; for the ark of God is taken." It is probable that this woman knew the Lord, and had the cause of God at heart; if so, she must have had a hard struggle in being the wife of a dissolute man like Phinehas.

FATAL SPOIL.

But what about the ark of God? In chastising His own people, did God entirely play into the hands of the Philistines, and leave the ark of the covenant, which He had caused to be made, to their unconsecrated hands? The Philistines took the ark of God from Ebenezer and brought it to Ashdod, and there they brought it into the house of Dagon, and set it by Dagon, as though to say "Our god is as good as the God of Israel;" but in the morning the image of Dagon "was fallen upon his face to the earth before the ark of the Lord." No hand was to be seen, it was an invisible power which had wrought this thing. The Philistines, nevertheless, did not humble themselves at this evidence of the power of God, and they set the image of Dagon up again. Must it not have struck them with some kind of misgiving that their god had no power to lift himself when he had fallen? The morrow Dagon had fallen a second time and his head and both his hands were cut off upon the threshold. This was not all; God sent most painful and deadly diseases upon the city, so that the lords of the Philistines were gathered together in counsel and determined to carry the ark of God to Gath. This done, the hand of God was as much against that city as it had been against Ashdod, and the inhabitants were smitten so that they sent the ark away to Ekron, but the Ekronites would not have the ark of God but sent and gathered all the lords of the Philistines, and said, "Send away the ark of the God of Israel, and let it go again to His own place, that it slay us not;" for already numbers had died, and others were smitten. Then not only the lords but the priests and divines were called together.

It is a marvellous fact that these heathen priests thus became preachers of the power of the God of Israel. After giving counsel that a trespass offering should be sent with the ark, they said, "And unto the God of Israel: peradventure He will lighten His hand from off you, and from off your gods, and from off your land. Wherefore then do ye harden your hearts, as the Egyptians and Pharaoh hardened their hearts? when he had wrought wonderfully among them, did they not let the people go, and they departed?" Then they counselled that the ark should be put in a new cart, and drawn by two milch kine, while their calves were tied up at home. If the kine disobeyed their natural instincts, and leaving their calves took the nearest way into the land of Israel, they would know then that God's hand had been upon them; if they returned, a chance had happened. The result was that the kine took the way to Bethshemesh; thus God, in spite of the sin of His own people, witnessed for Himself to the Philistines.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Political Crisis in the Danubian Principalities is producing uneasiness in Europe. It is chiefly important, because it increases the animosity existing between Russia and Austria. The latter government expected to control the policy of Servia and Roumania, but the people have resisted a foreign dictatorship, and each succeeding election of deputies has shown the growth of independent feeling in the country. At the recent election more than two-thirds of the men elected belong to the patriotic as opposed to the Austrian party. In Bulgaria Russian influence has been similarly checked. The Russian officers in that country forced the liberation of M. Zankoff, an imprisoned patriot, and urged the king to order a new election of deputies. The election has swept away the cabinet and carried M. Zankoff into power, but Russia has not profited, as the new cabinet has required the withdrawal of the Russian officers and demanded from the king a large concession of power to the people. Austria and Russia mutually suspect each other of plotting, and their relations with each other are strained. European diplomats are alarmed, as disturbances in the Danubian principalities have already on two occasions been followed by war.

Negotiations between France and China have proceeded during the past week with little apparent result. M. Challemel Lacour, the French Secretary of State, who seems lacking in diplomatic ability, has retired from the discussion, and the Chinese minister now communicates directly with M. Ferry, the prime-minster. M. Ferry has summoned to his aid M. Waddington, who represents France at the English Court, and has also requested the mediation of Earl Granville. The astute Chinese minister seems in no hurry to conclude the negotiations, which appear interminable. Time is a distinct gain to China. The French force in Tonquin is suffering heavily from disease ; the enemy is hemming it in, interrupting its communications, and cutting off its supplies, and generally harrassing it without venturing a pitched battle. The French, civil and military authorities in Tonquin have quarrelled, and Dr. Harmand, the French Consul, has sent General Bouet back to France. All these difficulties tend to discourage the Cabinet, who have also reason to dread the approaching meeting of the Chambers, which are likely to denounce the administration for involving the country in an expensive and inglorious war.

Reports of Professor Nordenskjold's Expedition to the Arctic have been received. The professor's intention was to land on the eastern coast of Greenland and endeavor to cross that country in its unexplored part and then attempt to cross from Baffin's Bay to Denmark Strait. It would appear from the cable report that he was unable to carry out his programme, for the cablegram intimates that he is on the western coast, from which he expects to go to Ivigtut. The expedition started from Awtleiksivick on the 4th of September, and reached a distance of 360 kilometres inland, attaining a height of 7000 feet above the level of the sea. This is the first time that human beings have penetrated so far into Greenland. The whole region is an ice desert, proving that there is no open water inland. Very valuable scientific data have been obtained.

A Report that Lieutenant Greely is Dead was received here on Saturday last. This confirms the fears that were aroused by the failure of the Proteus to carry relief to Lady Franklin Bay, where the United States Arctic Exploration station was fixed. The information now given, which it may be devoutly hoped is untrue, comes from Professor Nordenskjold, the Danish explorer, who had it from the Esquimaux who, it may be parenthetically remarked, are not noted for their truthfulness. The professor says : "During my excursion on the inland ice, Dr. Nathorst, with the steamer Sofia, anchored on July 27th in a bay near Cape York. The doctor was accompanied from Godhaven by an Esquimaux interpreter named Hans Christian, who had met at Godhaven a party of fifteen Esquimaux from Wolstenholm. They stated that they had been informed by other natives that the commander of the American expedition, whose name they pronounced 'Kasleyh,' and another member of the party, which had arrived at a point north of Smith Sound, were dead, and that the rest of the expedition had returned on sledges to Littleton Island." The government, after consultation with eminent Arctic explorers, have decided that it would be useless to send out another relief expedition this year.

There has been a Royal Gathering at Copenhagen, the capital of Denmark. The Czar and Czarina of Russia, the King and Queen of Greece, the Prince and Princess of Wales and other princely personages have been gathered there. Mr. Gladstone also, accompanied by Mr. Tennyson, the English poet laureate, joined the royal party. Efforts have been made to represent the meeting as one of international significance, but the English press contends that it was simply a family party, having no bearing on State affairs. The general tendency of European diplomacy is, however, of an ominous character. There are two hostile camps apparently forming, one of which is composed of Germany, Austria, Italy and Spain, while in the other are Russia and France. Overtures to England have been made by both coalitions.

O'Donnell, by whom Carey, the Informer, was killed, or in murderer's parlance "removed," arrived in England on September 18th. Elaborate precautions were taken by the government to prevent his Irish friends rescuing him. He landed at Southampton, and was taken under a strong guard to London. He had a preliminary examination the same day, but was remanded to await the arrival of Mrs. Carey and other witnesses who, from motives of prudence, were not allowed to make the journey on the same ship with O'Donnell. Mrs. Carey's evidence is anticipated with some interest, there being rumors that she has made startling disclosures to the police concerning the relations of her dead husband with prominent persons. It will be remembered that Carey, in giving his evidence, boasted that he could have given evidence, if he had chosen, implicating other men beside his fellow-prisoners. O'Donnell is surprised that a defence fund has not been raised by the National League, and charges his countrymen with ingratitude.

There is More Trouble in Zululand.—The British authorities at the Cape have sent a message to Cetewayo demanding his surrender. It appears he was badly wounded at Ulundi, in Zululand, in the early part of August. On August 19th Mr. Osborn, the British Resident in charge of the Reserve, endeavored to meet Cetewayo, who was in a kraal at Inkankla Bush, where he had taken refuge. Cetewayo, however, fled when the Resident, with a small mounted escort, came in view of the kraal. Armed parties of the natives appearing on the neighboring hill-tops, Mr. Osborn retired.

The New Queen of Madagascar is Razafindahetz, who assumes the throne under the name of Ranavalona III. She is a young widow, only twenty-two years of age, of good repute and a Christian, and all the people seem much delighted with her. The New York Herald publishes a description of the ceremonies at the funeral of the late queen, which took place at Ambohimanjer, and was preceded by a ceremony at the Chapel Royal. The dying request of the queen was that as little fuss as possible might be made at her funeral ; that the affairs of the State might be proceeded with as usual, and that her successor would still hold fast to Christianity and not change the "customs." Mr. Shaw has returned to England at the request of the government, and will lay before them a full account of the circumstances of his arrest and imprisonment During his confinement on the French vessel he was treated with extreme brutality. A public meeting, under the auspices of the London Missionary Society, will be held at Exeter Hall on the 27th inst., to welcome home Mr. Shaw and other Madagascar missionaries. According to a statement published by the London Times the published account of the French outrages at Tamatave falls far short of the truth, and adds that when the English Consul, Mr. Pakenham, was dying, the French priests endeavored to force him to become a Catholic, and compelled him to kiss the crucifix.

A Conference of Young Men's Christian Associations was held early this month in Liverpool, commencing with a conversazione and reception of delegates in St. George's Hall. Special sermons were preached in many of the churches and chapels throughout the city, and there were several prayer-meetings and conferences, closing by a public meeting in Hengler's Circus. From the returns sent in before the opening of the conference, it appears there are in 162 associations 17,618 members and 11,596 associates. Nineteen occupy buildings of their own, and forty-five have salaried secretaries who devote their whole time to the work. Twenty-one new associations had been formed during the year.

A Revival in Japan is Reported by the Rev. C. S. Long, of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Nagasaki, who tells of a remarkable work of grace in connection with his mission. In that newly-opened country missionary work is in an initial state, and the Church at Nagasaki, till the manifestation we speak of, was a very small affair indeed. It is one of the most impressive marks of the recent awakening that it began within the Church, and spread at once among the heathen congregation. Mr. Long writes: "We have now continued the meetings eleven days with marvellous results. Fifty have been converted, and forty-two have been added to the Church. Last Sunday (June 3d) I baptized twenty-seven persons in Nagasaki, and we have now a large number of candidates for baptism. I have never witnessed anything, even at home, more marvellous than the great revival now in progress here." The letter concludes: "A Buddhist priest, who has been attending our meetings, has just slipped in to tell me that he has renounced Buddhism, and accepts Christianity as the true religion."

The Order of Barefooted Nuns.—A Writer in a London paper relates that there exists an order of women, very little known, called the "Barefooted Klarissenites." They have a cloister in the quarter of the Invalides, Paris, and number eighteen, with some lay sisters for their service. Fourteen of these nuns are under twenty-three years of age, for the regulations are so severe that most of those who enter the house die young. They wear a coarse woollen garment, and go all the year round barefoot on cold stone floors ; they never warm themselves at a fire, eat meat only once a year, and sleep upon a narrow plank which is not long enough for them to stretch out the limbs upon. Ten hours of every day are spent kneeling in the chapel. They live on alms and the produce of work which they do in addition to their religious exercises. These devotees belong for the most part to families of rank. They are entirely shut off from the outer world, but they are once a year shown to their relatives from a distance, through a lattice in the chapel. When a nun dies, her companions lay her in her coffin, which is placed outside the bounds of the cloister to be examined by the authorities.

For Twenty-Seven Years a Missionary in Java.

Early Love of Pleasure—Conversion of a Crippled Sailor Brother—A New Life—First Efforts at Evangelization—Goes to Malacca as a Missionary Printer—Missionary Work in Java—Removal to China—A Difficulty with his "Pigtail"—Clumsy Use of the "Chopsticks"—Narrow Escape from Desperadoes—Attainments and Services—Return Home and Death—The Recent Volcanic Eruptions in Java.

THE recent appalling calamity in Java, in which, by the volcanic eruption, thousands of people lost their lives, has called attention to that strange land of which few people know anything. This week THE CHRISTIAN HERALD contains on its first page a picture which may help its readers to form some idea of the terrific scene, and with it a portrait of an eminent servant of Christ, who gave the best years of his life to Christian work in the island.

Walter Henry Medhurst, the distinguished missionary, whose portrait appears on the front page, was born in 1796, in London. He spent his youth at St. Paul's Cathedral Grammar School, and at the age of fourteen removed to the city of Gloucester, where he learned "the art and mystery" of printing.

YOUTHFUL LOVE OF PLEASURE.

Before he was fourteen years old, however, his natural liveliness gave way to an insidious influence. He became a frequenter of theatres and other places of questionable amusement. There he was plunging fast into the whirl of giddy dissipation. But, through a kind providence, he was arrested, in a manner neither striking nor wonderful, but so decided, that a radical change came over the habits and aims of his life.

HIS CRIPPLED SAILOR BROTHER.

He had an elder brother, named William, who was a sailor. By a fall from the topmast of a ship he broke his leg, and was sent home. He had hitherto lived "without the fear of God before his eyes;" but one Sunday as he hobbled along the street he caught sight of an old Congregational church, at that time under the pastoral care of the late Rev. John Clayton. Partly weary, partly curious, he walked in to take a seat. The straggler's attention was at once rivetted. A message from God fell upon the ear of the crippled youth, and was the means of his giving himself to Christ.

WALTER LED TO CHRIST.

Immediately after his own conversion, William felt intense anxiety about the spiritual state of his brother Walter, and wrote to him, urging him, in the most affectionate and pressing terms, to think about his soul, and the great salvation which God in His mercy had provided for it. William also exacted from his younger brother a promise that he would go to the Congregational church in Gloucester, and hear the Rev. William Bishop preach. Walter promised, and went. He slunk in, and took a pew nearest the door, not daring to hold up his head. He felt he was a stranger in a strange place, and experienced considerable awkwardness. The minister had already commenced his sermon; but, repeating his text shortly after the wandering youth had entered—"a firebrand plucked out of the burning" (Amos 4 : 11)—the words came with such divine power to his heart, that Walter thought he himself was addressed personally, and he left the church, convinced that Mr. Bishop must have known all about his former life. The impressions thus made were deepened, and he became "a new creature in Christ Jesus."

FIRST EFFORTS AT EVANGELIZATION.

And now, with the life, warmth, and promptitude so characteristic of him, Mr. Medhurst engaged in the service of his Saviour. During the week-days he kept to his printer's "case;" but on Sunday he was teaching the young in Sabbath-schools, giving away tracts in the highways and lanes, or in the villages around, and addressing groups of people, wherever he could gather them, on the way of salvation. In spite of occasional opposition, his zeal in the service of God increased, and his heart burned within him to be employed as an evangelist among the heathen abroad.

GOES TO MALACCA.

An opening at last appeared. The services of a missionary printer were much needed at Malacca, a station temporarily occupied by Dr. Milne, in the Malayan Archipelago. Hearing of this, Mr. Medhurst applied to the London Missionary Society, tendering his services as a printer, and they were ultimately accepted. Having turned the twentieth year of his age, he embarked from his native shores in September, 1816, but through the detention of the vessel at Madras, he did not reach Malacca for nearly a year afterward. His arrival was hailed with delight by Dr. Milne, who at once transferred to his new colleague the sole care of the printing department.

TWENTY-SEVEN YEARS IN JAVA.

From the period of his arrival, Mr. Medhurst continued till 1843 to labor in succession at the various stations then occupied in the Indian Archipelago, especially at Batavia, the splendid capital of Java, where the appalling volcanic eruptions and earthquakes have recently taken place, as shown in our frontispiece picture. He devoted this entire period of twenty-seven years to various schemes of missionary effort in the Straits of Malacca—to the study of various languages, to translations, school-instruction, printing, itinerating, and preaching the Gospel of Christ, being "instant in season and out of season."

REMOVAL TO CHINA.

On five Chinese ports being opened to foreigners by the Nanking Treaty of 1842, Mr. Medhurst was removed from Batavia to Shanghai. In conjunction with his colleagues, he opened that mission, where he labored with patience and zeal till he re-embarked for England in September, 1856, just forty years after he had first quitted his native shores as an ambassador to the Gentiles. As it is not our purpose to give a lengthened detail of his useful labors in China, we will content ourselves by narrating just a few incidents of interest connected with his career and efforts in that vast empire of about 360,000,000 of Christless people.

A DIFFICULTY WITH HIS QUEUE.

In order that he might pass unobserved as a foreigner through the interior, Dr. Medhurst found it absolutely necessary, as Mr. Hudson Taylor has done, to cultivate a queue like a native. For this purpose he underwent the shaving of the head, all but the crown, and the appending of a long plait to the hair of the crown. That an artificial queue like this should sometimes drop off was to be expected; and that, in the case of a foreigner in disguise, its falling off should awaken some danger was not to be wondered at. In his journal, Dr. Medhurst mentions the following by way of illustration:

"After sitting at table one evening, engaged in discussion with a party of natives, I rose and retired to the bedroom; but, in a few minutes afterward, I observed my guide coming in with my queue in his hand. It had dropped off while I was sitting in the chair, and had been left behind. My guide was greatly agitated, and said that he had just escaped a fearful danger; for had the queue become loose or fallen off during our previous march, or at any one of the numerous inns and tea-shops at which we put up, we could not have prevented our secret being discovered. He proceeded as speedily as possible to repair the damage. Greater care, of course, was taken in future, lest a like mishap should occur in a more public place, where the evil might be irreparable."

CLUMSY USE OF THE "CHOPSTICKS."

The great missionary traveller one day found himself in a dilemma, among the genuine natives of the interior of the empire, occasioned by his clumsy and awkward use of the "chopsticks." Heretofore he had always used the knife, fork, or spoon of civilized lands; but to do in China as the Chinese do, he must put these utensils aside for the "nimble lads," as they designate the pair of common sticks employed in eating their food. Being in the house of a manager of a tea establishment, Dr. Medhurst was prevailed upon to remain for a few hours. He says:

"We were first regaled with basins of hot vermicelli soup; and, as the evening set in, a large feast was prepared for us in the central hall. With a great deal of difficulty I was enabled to take up with the chopsticks a few pieces of meat from the dishes in the middle of the table, which I not unfrequently let fall before they reached my plate or could be conveyed to my mouth. I was glad, therefore, when the feast was ended, and we removed from the ill-lighted table to a still more gloomy part of the room."

NARROW ESCAPE FROM DEATH.

During one of his missionary tours, Dr. Medhurst had a narrow escape from death. In March, 1848, he was at a town thirty miles from Shanghai, called Tsingpoo, distributing tracts among the grain-junk mariners, on the Imperial Canal. Distress and consequent dissatisfaction prevailed at the time, and the men, grown reckless, seemed ready for any disturbance, and especially to annoy foreigners, if not to rob them.

Early one morning, with two of his colleagues, he proceeded to distribute tracts from house to house. While engaged in his work, a number of Shantung navigators came behind the missionary and his friends, pushing and striving to get a larger number of tracts than would properly fall to their share, throwing stones also, shouting, and yelling. Dr. Medhurst turned about, and facing the mob, asked what they meant by making such a disturbance; he desired, too, to know who the ringleaders were, that they and he might both appear before the native magistrate. Upon this, the mob became still, and moving to each side of the street, left a free passage for the missionaries, who proceeded quietly in their work till it was time to return to their boats.

ATTACKED AND STUNNED.

They had not walked above half a mile, however, from the gates of Tsingpoo, when they observed a crowd of people rushing after them with the most infuriated looks and gestures. An attempt at parley was made, but in vain; for they approached nearer and nearer, with long poles, heavy hoes, ponderous rakes, and other rough weapons.

While warding off the blows aimed at him, Dr. Medhurst was struck from behind on his head; and being stunned, he fell on the ground. The cowardly assailants, seeing their victim prostrate, rushed upon him, struck him with their clubs while lying on his face, and wounded him severely with a blunt sword. As plunder was their main object, they proceeded to rob him of his watch, spectacles, cane, cap, etc. The other missionaries shared a fate nearly as severe; but Dr. Medhurst was the object of their most murderous attack, and he was convinced that it was only through the watchful providence of God that the blows did not cause immediate death.

ATTAINMENTS AND SERVICES.

As a missionary, Dr. Medhurst united the unwearied application of a student with the active duties of an evangelist. His attainments in oriental languages and literature were extensive; but his knowledge of the Chinese tongue was, both for its accuracy and extent, unrivalled. He was the author, in Chinese, of numerous treatises and tracts, explanatory of the Divine principles of Christianity—works which have had an extensive circulation in the interior of the empire. But his translation of the entire Bible into Chinese, in which, while he was greatly aided by his friends Messrs. Stronach and Milne, he was the most efficient laborer, will be his abiding memorial among the myriads of the Chinese who have read it and believed.

RETURN HOME AND DEATH.

This great and useful man, having been in the missionary field full forty years, left China on September 10th, 1856. He was more than sixty

EXAMPLES OF DISASTROUS HAILSTORMS.

Though from the general temperature of Great Britain, the hailstorms which occasionally occur do not work much mischief, as in tropical countries, yet occasionally they have wrought great havoc, even there. There was, for example, a memorable hailstorm in August, 1877, in the suburbs of London. At Kew Botanical Gardens, the violent hail broke no less than 25,000 panes of glass, which were only replaced at a cost of £6000. Five of the hailstones which fell at Richmond were nearly six inches in diameter, and the whole weighed over one pound. In some cases, slates were perforated by the hailstones, so that they looked as if they had been riddled by bullets. At Hanwell, too, some hailstones were picked up, some of which measured five inches, and weighed three quarters of an ounce. The water of nine weighed six ounces. We can thus see what a powerful material scourge the Most High reserves against the period when man's present incipient rebellion will terminate in open apostasy!

FORESHADOWINGS IN PAST EVENTS.

A reference to the historical records of Holy Writ will show that nearly every predicted future disturbance or dislocation of the physical world has a foreshadow in past events. Thus, the punishments of that prototype of the last Antichrist—Pharaoh—illustrates the material penalties of the last days, especially those hailstorms which God holds in "reserve" against the last and final "time of trouble." For we read that by Divine command (Exod. 9 : 23-26), "Moses stretched forth his rod toward heaven, and Jehovah sent thunder and hail; and the fire ran along the ground, and Jehovah rained hail upon the land of Egypt; so there was hail, and fire mingled with the hail, such as there was none like it in all the land of Egypt since it became a nation: and the hail smote throughout the land of Egypt all that were in the field, both man and beast; and the hail smote every herb of the field, and brake every tree of the field." But, as if to preclude any mistakes as to this hailstorm being a miraculous and judicial penalty, it was confined to the Egyptians; for we read (v. 26): "Only in the land of Goshen—where the children of Israel were—there was no hail."

Further on in Hebrew history—almost, in fact, at the very commencement of Joshua's famous invasion of Canaan—the Most High used a hailstorm as an agent to execute His will. Hence we read that, when the Jewish general was assailed by Adoni-zedec, king of Jerusalem, and his confederates, in order to exterminate the Gibeonites (Josh. 10 : 11), "Jehovah cast down great [hail] stones from heaven upon them, and they died: they were more that died with hailstones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword." It is noticeable, as remarked by Kitto, that "on this, as on some other occasions, the miracle is found not so much in the agency employed as in the circumstances of the event. A storm of hail, so terrible, so opportune, and so discriminate in its effects, could not but be recognized as a manifestation of that Divine aid which had been promised to the Hebrews."

CHASTISEMENTS OF THE JEWS BY HAIL.

Nor were the Gentiles the only persons who suffered from this form of punishment for national sin; for the Jews were also visited with it for their idolatry. Thus we read (Ps. 78 : 47, 48): "He destroyed their vines with hail, and their sycamore trees with great hailstones (margin); He gave up their cattle also to hail, and their flocks to lightnings." So, again, when God rebuked the false prophets who were leading Israel to national ruin, He threatened them with the same material penalty. Almost the last of the minor prophets, in remonstrating with the Jewish people on their flagrant sins, that haply they might repent, refers to the same physical penalty. Thus Haggai writes (2 : 17): "I smote you with blasting and with mildew and with a hail, in all the labors of your hands." But the scourge did not lead to penitence; that national excision followed, which has scattered them among all nations—a by-word and a reproach. Such punishment became all the more impressive, seeing that it is only a premonition of what shall occur at

THE FINAL APOSTASY OF THE GENTILES.

As it was in the past, so will it be in the last days of this dispensation. For, as all national sin will be intensified, and become more gigantic, ending, in fact, in the reign of Antichrist, the same physical penalties will be inflicted by the God who, in spite of scientists and infidels and agnostics, still governs the material universe.

We learn from Daniel 11 : 30 and 32, and Isaiah 28 : 14, 15, that the infidel ruler of the restored but unconverted Israel will make a covenant with Antichrist, the head of revived Rome, for his protection. But, as he will only regard it as another stepping-stone to universal supremacy, he will, in his secret heart, intend to break it whenever the fitting time arrives. As this treaty will be made for seven years, the Hebrew chiefs will fondly think that for that period, at least, they will escape that wholesale murder which will mark his assumption of universal dominion. Hence they will say (Isa. 28 : 15): "Because we have made a covenant with death, and with hell, we are at agreement—when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, it shall not come unto us." But saw beyond these apostates; for he adds (v. 18): "Your covenant with Death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, then ye shall be trodden down by it." As to the period when this event shall occur, there is no room left for doubt; for Daniel intimates (chap. 9 : 27) that "in the midst of the hebdomad [or seven years] he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease." And, as Boothroyd translates the rest of the passage, "In the temple shall be the abomination [or idol] of desolation; for until the consummation it shall be given up to desolation."

ANTICHRIST TO BE BAFFLED BY HAIL.

It is in connection with the breach of this covenant that Antichrist will feel the fierceness of those hailstorms which the Most High has "reserved" against that "time of trouble." As a skilled warrior—probably the greatest that has ever wrecked this world—he will fortify every vulnerable point in the Holy Land. Stand they may, firmly against man's prowess, but not against the powers of heaven. Hence we read (Isa. 28 : 17) that "the hail shall sweep away the refuge [or fortress] of lies" in which the infatuated rulers of the Jews trusted. And, as "the waters shall overflow the hiding-place," or defenced cities, we may conclude that a deluge of water will sap the walls of the fortresses to the very foundation.

DESTRUCTION OF THE ARMY OF GOG.

Hailstorms will form a prominent element in the destruction of the vast army of Gog—the name of Antichrist as the head of central Asia and Russia. Hence we read (Ezek. 38 : 22): "I will rain upon him, and upon his bands, and upon the many nations that are with him, an overflowing rain, and great hailstones, fire, and brimstone." The Messianic Psalm (18 : 13) gives the same pre-record of this event, for it says: "Jehovah thundered in the heavens, and the Highest gave His voice; hailstones and coals of fire." And just prior to the time when Antichrist (Isa. 30 : 30-33) will be consigned to his eternal prison in Tophet: "Jehovah will cause His voice to be heard, and shall show the lighting down of His arm with the indignation of His anger, and with the flame of a devouring fire—with scattering, and tempest, and hailstones."

ANGELS TO INFLICT A HAILSTORM PENALTY.

It would seem from the Apocalypse that angels will be employed to inflict this hailstorm penalty. We are prepared for such employment of supernatural agency by the power fallen spirits have over the physical elements when God permits this exercise of their malignity. Hence we find, from Job. 1 : 16, that Satan used lightning to destroy the sheep and shepherds of the Idumean patriarch. Analogy would, therefore, suggest that what was within the power of evil spirits would also be within the grasp of the unfallen angels.

But we are not, however, left to mere inference as to the part the angelic host will take in the hailstorms of the last days; for we learn that when the first angel sounds the woe-trumpet (Rev. 8 : 7), there "followed hail, and fire mingled with blood, and they were cast upon the earth." As one result of this plague, one third of the trees throughout at least the realm of Antichrist will be destroyed. Again, when the seventh angel sounds his woe-trumpet and the (Rev. 11 : 15-19) "temple of God is opened in heaven, there were lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and an earthquake, and great hail."

THE HUGE HAIL OF THE SEVENTH VIAL.

The infliction of the same penalty will mark the outpouring of the seventh vial of wrath. For, as one result of this vial (Rev. 16 : 17 and 21) being "poured into the air," there "will fall upon men a great hail out of heaven—every stone about the weight of a talent," or, in other words, nearly ninety-four pounds. Falling from the aërial regions with great velocity, and in dense masses, the destruction of man and beast, as well as of palace and fortress, will be inevitable.

Nor will this hailstorm apparently be restricted as to territory. For, as through the general rupture of the physical force at present imprisoned above and below the earth all the capitals of the ten kingdoms (Rev. 16 : 19) will fall, there can be little doubt that these judicial hailstorms will affect the whole realm of Antichrist, and his ten vassal kings.

POSSIBLE IMMUNITY OF JERUSALEM.

Whether these hailstorms will affect Jerusalem admits of doubt. We know from the Mosaic records that when the plague of hail afflicted Egypt (Exod. 9 : 26), the Israelitish colony in Goshen was untouched. Nor is it too much to anticipate that God, when judging the Gentile kings, will preserve the Holy City from the last and fiercest of all the prophetic hailstorms. But we have something more than mere analogy or conjecture to support this inference; for we read of that terrible crisis that (Isa. 31 : 4-5) "Jehovah of armies shall come down to fight for Mount Zion and the hill thereof. As birds flying [or rather hooting or fluttering over their young for their protection], so will Jehovah of armies defend Jerusalem".

But whether such a miraculous discrimination between Jerusalem and the lands of the Gentiles will occur or not, we learn that one physical miracle, at least, will be wrought on behalf of the faithful Jewish remnant; for, when Satan tries to prevent their flight to the wilderness (Rev. 12 : 14-15) by causing a deluge to impede their march, the "earth will open her mouth and swallow up the flood" so supernaturally ejected by Satan, as "Prince of the power of the air." It is to this faithful remnant who, when their kinsmen, and especially their rulers are sunk in Satanic delusion, are still loyal to Jehovah that our Lord doubtless referred in His last prophecy on Mount Olivet. He said (Matt. 24 : 15-16): "When ye see the abomination of desolation [either Antichrist or his image], spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy of holies—let them who are in Judæa escape to the mountains." That this remnant will obey, we learn from Rev. 12 : 6 and 14, for they will "flee into the wilderness," and be sheltered there during the three years and a half reign of Antichrist. Nor will the miracle end with this escape. Their future existence, in fact, will be a continuous miracle; for Isaiah, speaking of the time of Antichrist, says of every member of this escaped remnant (Isa. 33 : 16), "his place of defence shall be the munitions [or fortresses] of rocks; bread shall be given him; his water shall be sure."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The New York State Democratic Convention held its meetings at Buffalo last week. The interest was centred chiefly in the position the different delegations from New York City would hold, as hitherto the disaffection of Tammany Hall has, whenever it was shown, operated in the direction of a Democratic defeat. The committee decided, and the convention confirmed the decision, that all the factions should be admitted on the same basis as last year. The County Democracy had protested against the admission of Tammany delegates, and notice was given of a counter protest, but the action of the committee settled the matter. Thus Tammany secured twenty-four seats and Irving Hall ten, and the County Democracy was declared the regular organization. This result was not considered one likely to secure harmony, but was accepted as the least of several evils. The importance of the arrangement is obvious, because the pacification of the quarrel between the Halls would materially contribute to a Democratic victory in 1884. The platform adopted by the convention reaffirms that of last year, recites the advantages that have accrued to the State through the Democratic triumph of last November, and indorses Governor Cleveland's administration.

The New Rate of Postage of Two Cents for every letter not exceeding half an ounce in weight, for any place in the United States and Canada, came into operation on Monday last. As no appropriation was made by Congress for the redemption of the old postage stamps, the post office will allow their use under the new law. A three-cent and a one-cent stamp will cover double postage and the old two-cent stamps may be used on single letters. We must ask our subscribers to refrain from sending us the three-cent stamps when making remittances to this office.

The Total Amount of Money in Circulation in this country on September 12th is stated in a government report, issued last week, to have been $1,575,104,647. The credulous people who listen with enthusiasm to the speeches of socialists and communists should take note of those figures. If the agitators could have their way there would be a quantity of property to divide, the value of which is not computed, but the actual money for division would supply only thirty dollars and thirty-nine cents to each person; and to do that every one must give up every cent he has.

The Prohibitionists of Ohio are Making a vigorous campaign in the hope of carrying the second amendment, and expect to poll a large majority outside Cleveland and Cincinnati. How stringent that amendment is may be inferred from the recent remarks of General Edward Meyer, one of the leaders in the movement. He said: "On the day after election, if the second amendment is carried, all property used for the manufacture of beer or fermented liquors will cease to be of any legal value. A court of justice will not enforce the collection of a bill from the wholesale liquor dealer against the retail liquor seller, and the latter cannot collect money due for drink. The man who rents his building to be used as a groggery cannot collect rents therefor. The consequence will be that capital will not risk money in a business that can give no legal security, and what will be the result? It will outlaw the liquor traffic."

The Colored Convention Assembled at Louisville, Ky., on September 24th. Mr. Frederick Douglass was elected permanent chairman after a long wrangle and much uproar. Mr Douglass the following day delivered a long and eloquent speech on the condition of the colored race and the best means of elevating it. There was manifested a strong, pugnacious, hostile spirit to Mr. Douglass throughout by a number of delegates numbering, it is thought, about one-third of those present. The speakers who opposed Douglass paid high tributes to his personal character, but denounced his recent political utterances, especially his advocacy of Governor Benjamin F. Butler for the Presidency. A motion was made that Mr. Douglass's address be adopted by the convention, and laid before Congress as its address, but it was lost. An effort was also made to induce the convention to indorse President Arthur's administration and the Republican party, but that, too, was rejected. Eventually, on September 27th, three sets of resolutions were passed dealing with the questions of education and labor. A national executive committee was appointed, with Mr. W. A. Pledger, of Georgia, as chairman.

The Episcopal Convention of New York has elected as Assistant Bishop of the Diocese Dr. Henry C. Potter of Grace Church, New York city, a nephew of Bishop Potter and son of Bishop Alonzo Potter, of Pennsylvania. The new Assistant Bishop-elect was born in Schenectady in 1835, and was graduated at Union College, where his father was then a professor. For some years he followed mercantile pursuits, but subsequently entering the service of the church, he was appointed to a charge in Greensburg, Pennsylvania, where he remained two years. He went from there to St. John's Church, Troy, of which he was the rector for seven years, and subsequently he became assistant minister at Trinity Church, Boston. Fifteen years ago he was called to Grace Church to succeed the Rev. Dr. Taylor. He is the author of several works, including a volume entitled "The Gates of Eastern Travel," a number of tracts, and an "Essay on Religious Orders," and a volume of "Sermons of the City," that had a wide circulation. A testimonial was prepared and signed setting forth Dr. Potter's fitness for the office, and will be presented to the General Convention at Philadelphia this week.

The Centennial Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, which will assemble in Christ Church, Philadelphia, during the first week in October, is in many respects a remarkable one. It is the thirty-fourth convention and the one hundredth anniversary of the consecration of the first American bishop. At the convention in 1785 the delegates met as one body, there being no bishop in this country at that time. Seven States were then represented in the convention, namely, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and South Carolina. Forty-five delegates composed the number of the first convention, while in the last convention, 1880, there were sixty-two bishops and nearly 400 delegates. The first convention was in session but five days, the last convention three weeks. The old church in which the convention will assemble is the one in which that of 1785 was held. On the 20th of July, 1775, the Centennial Congress assembled within its walls for worship, that day having been set apart for "general humiliation, fasting, and prayer throughout all the American Provinces." Benjamin Franklin was a member of the Vestry, and George Washington was a regular communicant. The parish was organized in 1695, twelve years after the laying out of the city by William Penn. In 1727 the present edifice was constructed wholly out of bricks that were brought from England. It was nine years in building. In the tower there is a chime of bells that was brought from England, and it is said that during the time the British held possession of Philadelphia the bells were sunk in the Delaware River. The communion service consists of seven pieces, all of solid gold, and was presented in 1695 by Queen Anne.

The Departure of Eight Missionaries for Burmah, on Saturday last, was the occasion of an interesting meeting the previous evening in Dr. Judson's church in New York. The party which sailed on the Circassia of the Anchor Line, includes the Rev. A. F. Rose and the Rev. M. Jameson, with their wives, and the Misses A. R. Gage, K. T. Evans, and L. A. Hardin, all of whom have been connected with Dr. Edward Judson's church, at Bedford and Downing Streets. The Rev. Mr. Rose has labored in Burmah for thirty years, making only two visits to this country in that time. During this year he has worked in behalf of the Burmese mission in connection with Dr. Judson's church. Accompanying the American missionaries was Dr. Wyatt Kyan, a native Burmese Christian. Dr. Kyan has recently been graduated at Kalamazoo and the University of Michigan, with the degree of M.D., after a stay in this country of twelve years. He spoke at the farewell meeting with deep feeling of his conversion and the abundant field among his people for Christian missions.

Mr. W. Forbes, the English Gospel Temperance evangelist, whose arrival in America was recently mentioned in these columns, has been holding successful meetings in Montreal and the Eastern Townships of the Province of Quebec, and in Kingston City Hall. He has been laboring under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association, The Dominion Alliance, and the Women's Christian Temperance Union. God has signally blessed his efforts on this side the Atlantic as He owned and blessed them in Europe. We trust that similar success will attend him when he comes to the United States. Letters to Mr. Forbes may be sent to the Y. M. C. A., Toronto, or to the office of The Christian Herald.

Mr. Jacob Freshman, the Jewish Evangelist, whose portrait appeared in The Christian Herald of August 30th, has returned from Europe. He is now holding services for his "brethren according to the flesh" in Cooper Union, New York. Three young Jewish converts have accompanied him from Europe, and are being trained for evangelistic work among the Jews of New York. Mr. Freshman, we are informed, is not working under the auspices of any society, but is relying only upon God for the means of supporting his work.

An Enthusiastic Welcome to Mr. Francis Murphy was given in Cooper Union on Tuesday, September 25th. It is doubtful if ever the immense hall was so thronged before. The seats were chiefly occupied by ladies, while men crowded the aisles, corridors, and every place from which a view of the platform could be obtained, or the words of the speakers heard. Chief Justice Noah Davis, of the Supreme Court, presided, and in his address of welcome gave a sketch of Mr. Murphy's life, portraying its lights and shadows with considerable feeling. When Mr. Murphy stepped forward to make his response the audience broke forth into long continued applause. Handkerchiefs were waved, and three hearty cheers were given. In a broken voice Mr. Murphy expressed his gratitude for the generous reception given him. His absence abroad, he said, had not weakened but had strengthened his love for the land of his adoption. He expected to devote the remainder of his life to Gospel Temperance work. He described, with much feeling, the hearty welcome he had received in Great Britain from both the English and Scottish peoples, and pointed out its significance in the fact that he is an Irish American, who could not expect the British people to be prepossessed in his favor.

The Remarkable Death of a Scoffer is Reported from Lancaster, Ohio. A colored camp-meeting was in progress at the Fair Grounds near the town. A well-known scoffer and a few agnostics of his kind ascended Mt. Pleasant, near by, and started a burlesque of the proceedings below. While in the enjoyment of this pastime the man who organized the disgraceful performance lost his balance and fell over a precipice, a distance of three hundred feet. He fell upon the rocks below and was crushed in pieces. The colored people are derided for regarding the man's death as a judgment from God, but there are many cases of a similar kind on record in both ancient and modern times, which show that the belief is not so ludicrous as the critics represent (Isa. 28 : 22).

A Boy's Ignorance Cost him his Life in New Jersey recently. On September 21st two boys, aged respectively six and eight years, went out into the woods and "played party." In the course of the play they gathered some seeds of the stramonium, or common stink-weed, and made a decoction which they called coffee, and drank some of the poisonous mixture. Both children were taken ill during the night, and grew steadily worse until the older one died. Then it was learned from the younger what they had been doing, and, proper remedies being applied, the surviving child was soon relieved of a number of the deadly seeds, and is believed to be out of danger. Such a warning will probably prevent the surviving child and all children who hear of the calamity from using any more growths the nature of which they do not understand, but it is remarkable that the moral poisons of corrupt literature, strong drink, etc., continue to do their deadly work among men who have seen their effects on others (1 Cor. 10 : 6).

A Countryman's Mistake on a Ferryboat caused a general laugh last week among those who witnessed it. While a Pavonia ferryboat was waiting in its slip on the Jersey side on Tuesday evening, a middle-aged man walked into the ladies' cabin. In his hand he carried an old grip-sack which he deposited in a seat and placed himself beside it. A young man occupied the next seat, to whom he put the question: "Can I stay here all night?" "What?" asked the young man. "Can I stay here all night?" repeated the old man somewhat sharply. "On this boat?" "Boat! Is this a boat?" asked the old man, grasping his satchel. "Yes," said the young man. "It's a ferryboat from Jersey City to New York." "Good gracious!" shouted the old man as he hurried out of the door, "I don't want to go to New York. I thought it was a waiting-room." He lost no time in avoiding a journey he did not wish to take. If every man, who has made the mistake of acting as if this world were a permanent abiding-place would, when told of his mistake, be similarly prompt in seeking one that is eternal, the church would receive such a harvest of souls as has not been seen since Pentecost (Heb. 13 : 14).

An Application of the Mad-Stone at Terre Haute, Ind., is said to have cured a child who had been bitten by a rabid dog. The child was the possessor of a small dog, a great pet. Recently the dog went away, but returned in a few days. The little girl was very anxious about her pet, not knowing where it was, and when she saw it ran to play with it. The dog, always kind before, sprang at her and bit her in many places, nearly tearing the clothing off her body. Her screams brought assistance, and the dog was beaten off. It was noticed that it frothed at the mouth, and ran around in a circle. It was concluded that the dog was mad, and it was killed. A physician was called, and the wounds cauterized. But the parents of the child were not satisfied that their little one was safe from an attack of hydrophobia. They, therefore, took her from Washington, Ind., where they lived, to Terre Haute, to have the mad-stone used. It was applied, the child was pronounced cured, and the family party returned with their fears set at rest. The origin of the mad-stones, of which only a few exist, is unknown, even to the people who possess them, and no one seems to know how the belief in their healing virtues first arose. Nevertheless, the faith in their efficacy is widely prevalent. It is marvellous that faith in such matters is so easily produced when there is so little knowledge, while in spiritual matters it is so difficult to get the sinner to exercise it, though the Object is divine and unfailing (Mark 4 : 40).

A Heroic Engineer Died at Akron, Ohio, on September 24th. A despatch from that city says: "John Bull, the engineer of the Thunderbolt passenger train on the New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio Railroad, died to day from the injuries received in the recent collision with a freight train at Tallmadge. He could have saved himself by jumping, but he thought of the passengers, reversed his engine, and set the air-brakes. Having checked the train, he started the engine ahead under full steam. It broke loose from the cars and received the shock of the collision. The passengers were unhurt. He lived at Galion and was the oldest engineer on the road." It is evident that the man in detaching his engine and going ahead to meet the disaster alone, deliberately and intentionally sacrificed his life to save his passengers. Such heroism is rare indeed in human beings. In reflecting upon it we may be aided in our attempts to understand the love of Christ to the world (Rom. 5 : 7, 8).

The Impatience of a Physician had Fatal consequences at Winfield, L. I., recently. He was in deep depression because he did not succeed in establishing a lucrative practice. On the breaking out of the Tonquin war he tendered his services to the French Government, asking for an appointment with the army in the field. He received no reply to his offer. His previous despondency increased, and on September 15th he committed suicide. A few days afterward a letter addressed to him arrived from Paris, and was opened by Coroner White. It proved to be from the French Minister of War, accepting the physician's services, and instructing him to report to the French Consul in this city, where he would receive one year's pay in advance, and be furnished with transportation to the scene of hostilities. This is not the first time the dilatoriness of a government has driven men to despair, but in this case the victim appears to have sacrificed his life through lack of ordinary patience. Sometimes afflicted Christians show a similar want of patience, but for them there is no excuse (Lam. 3 : 26).

A Clergyman's Appearance in the Wrong pulpit caused some amusement in a church near Boston three Sundays ago. A Congregational clergyman agreed to supply the pulpit of a brother at Roxbury, and, knowing the locality in which the church was situated, though he had never seen the church, he concluded he would have no difficulty in finding it. He set out, and in due time descried a steeple. Reaching the church he walked in, and went straightway to the pulpit. He glanced around on the congregation and proceeded to give out an old standard Congregational hymn. The organ gave the tune, and the singing began. While it was in progress the sexton walked up the pulpit stairs, and said to the minister, "Mr. —— will be here in a few minutes." The situation flashed upon him, but suppressing his emotions he asked, "Why, isn't this Mr. ——'s church?" "No, sir," calmly replied the sexton, "this is the Universalist Church." The unwitting interloper quickly descended, and made his way to his friend's church, this time taking care, before ascending to the pulpit, to assure himself that he was in the right place. If the sexton had not interfered, the Universalist congregation might have been shocked by listening to an orthodox Congregational sermon. If, however, the clergyman had preached to them Christ, the Saviour of sinners, they could not have complained that the sermon was inappropriate. That doctrine is of universal application (1 Cor. 1 : 23, 24).

"GLORY BE UNTO THE FATHER."

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ: according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love."—Ephesians 1 : 3, 4.

Blessing Distinct from Praise—The Idea of Reciprocation—I. God the Father Viewed Aright—The Object of Gratitude—The God of Christ—His Father—II. The Blessing Which Comes from the Father—Already Given—In Heavenly Places—Only in Christ—III. The First Outflow—IV. The Designed Result—Holiness—Blamelessness—Before Him—The Perfectly Holy—The Grossest of Falsehoods—Before Him in Love.

LAST Lord's-day I finished the morning services at Exeter Hall with a sermon upon John's choice doxology, "Unto Him that loved us and washed us from our sins in His own blood, to Him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen." I felt, therefore, that it would be most fitting to open this series of services with and as the last was in praise of the Second Person of the divine Unity, this is to the honor and glory of the Adorable Person of the Father. May God, who gave His servants a praiseful spirit so that their epistles abound with doxologies, give the like spirit of joyous thankfulness to us at this time, that we may all say from the very bottom of our hearts, "Amen" to our text, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." Of praise, we may say what was said concerning salt in the Scripture, "without prescribing how much."* Oh, to praise and pray without ceasing! May the Holy Spirit work in us perpetual thanksgiving!

Observe well, that the same word is used in reference to our wish toward God and God's act toward us: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us." It is a very striking thing that our poor pebble-stones of wishes should be valued so much that the same word should be used in reference to them as in reference to the priceless diamonds of grace which the Lord hath bestowed upon us. We bless God because He blesses us. "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all His benefits."

Now, it is easy to understand how the Father of mercies, from whom every good and perfect gift proceeds, really blesses us; but how can we be said to bless Him? and what is the distinction between that and praising Him? For there is such a distinction, since we read, "All thy works shall praise thee, O Lord, and thy saints shall bless thee." Praise rises even from lifeless objects, as they display the power and wisdom of their Creator; but intelligence, will, and intent are needful for blessing God. Praise is the manifestation of our inward reverence and esteem, it adores and magnifies; but in blessing God we think well of Him, and wish well to Him, and desire that others may do the same. In blessing God there is the desire to do good to God even as He doth to us, if it were possible for us to do so. We fail in the power wherewith to accomplish such a desire, but it is well that it is in our hearts.

God cannot actually receive anything from us for His own enrichment or increase; for all things that we can do for Him are His already, and they must be done in His strength, so that when all is done it must be said, "Of thine own have we given thee." Neither can we add to His splendor or His happiness; for He is by nature inconceivably glorious and infinitely blessed; yet if such an increase were within our power, we would gladly render it. If all things were ours, we would lay them at His feet; and such things as we have, though we cannot give them directly to Him, yet we give them to His cause, and to the poor of His people. We are happy that, in assisting the needy believer, we are blessing the Lord.

* Ezra 7 : 22.

There is also a considerable measure of blessing God in such prayers as these: "Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." When we gladly ascribe unto the Lord glory, and power, and dominion, we are blessing Him. When we wish other men to love and serve the Lord, and do Him homage, we are blessing Him. When we desire to love Him more ourselves, and feel our hearts burn with aspirations after fellowship with Him, we are blessing Him. When we are zealous to make known the truth of the Gospel which glorifies God, and to make known His Son in whom especially He is revealed, we are blessing God. In sacred silence, when the heart cannot translate her emotions into words, and hardly into thoughts, we can bless the Lord. In rendering unto God such things as we can render, and in asking evermore the still larger question, "What shall I render unto the Lord for all His benefits toward me? we are blessing Him. If we cheerfully await His bidding, and count it a delight to stand with girded loins, crying, "What wouldst thou have me to do? Hast thou an errand for these willing feet? Here am I; send me." Then are we in effect blessing our Lord.

I. Here we have, first of all, viewed aright. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." When the divine Father is viewed aright He becomes the object of our gratitude, not of our dread. Instead of trembling before Him as before an austere judge, we rejoice in Him as a tender Father. He is no more to us the Thunderer of Sinai, but the Father of our spirits. Among the ignorant it is too much the custom to ascribe every mercy to the Lord Jesus Christ, and to think that He is all kindness and gentleness, while the Father is full of stern justice and severity; but it is not so. God is love, and that love dwells equally in each of the sacred Three. In every act of the Lord Jesus He reveals the tenderness and grace of the Father to us. He says, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father," and "I say not that I will pray the Father for you, for the Father Himself loveth you." Let us cast out the fear which hath torment; let us no longer stand afar off, but draw nigh unto God with childlike confidence and hearts aglow with ardent love. May the Lord direct our hearts into the love of God.

GOD THE FATHER

Next, if we would view the Father aright we must regard Him as the God of our Lord Jesus Christ. This is a wonderful title. Jesus, after His resurrection, called him "My Father, and your Father; my God, and your God;" and when He was in the act of expiring, He cried, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" To our Lord Jesus as man, the Father was God, and He worshipped Him and served Him. How frequently Jesus drew near to God in prayer! How constantly He rendered obedience to Him! It is the God of Jesus Christ who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places, and to Him Paul prayed for the Ephesians, "That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him." You remember how the tribes of Israel were blessed by the God of Jacob for their father's sake; even so are we blessed by the God of our Lord Jesus Christ according to the measure in which He would bless His spotless Son Jesus. Think, then, of the infinite Jehovah as the God of our Lord Jesus, and therefore the God of His redeemed people.

The text title is "The Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," which may respect the double filiation of Christ. First, as to His Godhead; there is that mysterious sonship which we cannot understand, but which is nevertheless clearly revealed. He is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ as Jesus is God. And then there is that second sonship which belongs to Christ as man, in which again He is said to be the Son of God. "God sent forth His Son, made of a woman." The Father thrice said, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." The great work of expiation is over, and "now is the Son of God glorified," and the Father manifests His unbounded love to His Son; let it then be a matter of great joy to us that the Father loves His people even as He loves His Son, and blesses us as He blesses Him.

This is the true view of the Father; He is our Father, our God, our Saviour's Father, our Saviour's God. Let us delight ourselves in Him, and magnify and bless His name.

II. We come, secondly, to notice

THE BLESSING WHICH COMES from the Father as viewed by faith. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ." "I wot," said one of old, "whom He blesseth is blessed." Satan may curse you; you may already be suffering the curse of the Fall; but, if God blesses you, what of all this? Let but the Lord say, "I have blessed him," and who can stay it, or who can reverse it? The blessing of God maketh rich, safe, happy. The blessing of God! How sure, how effectual! Oh, to receive it! He that hath it, though he be in poverty, he is rich; though he be in sorrow, he is consoled; though in shame, he hath honor; though he lie a-dying, he shall revive; though he were dead, yet shall he live. Such a blessing as this is enough to turn a dungeon into a paradise, a hell into heaven; and if it fall upon the most desponding and despairing, it must make their hearts to dance for joy.

THE BLESSING OF PATRIARCHS.

I have already told you this is the blessing of the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; and I would remind you that it was the custom of fathers to give blessings to their sons. All through the Old Testament we find patriarchs, when about to die, calling their children together, and pronouncing a blessing upon them. I should have liked to have received the blessing of Abraham, or Isaac, or Jacob; but what must be the blessing of the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ as He lays His hand upon each one of our poor unworthy heads, and says, "Surely, blessing I will bless thee"? Jacob could not bless the beloved Joseph after the fashion in which the Lord blesses His beloved Son and those who are in Him.

You could not desire a greater blessing than you have at this day, for the text says, "He hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ." I would call your attention very particularly to the fact that it is here stated that God has already given the blessing. Strictly speaking, I suppose it should be read, "God blessed us with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus;" and He continues still to do the same. Do you seek a blessing from God? He has pronounced it already upon you. Do you require anything? You have it; it is given to you in the covenant of grace. Like as when the Lord blessed Abraham He gave him the land of Canaan, so has He given to you all covenant blessings. Rise up, thou heir of heaven; shake thyself from the dust, for the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ has blessed thee out of the fulness of His heart, and thou art blessed indeed. The benediction is as comprehensive as your needs; if you lack all things, behold all things are here.

Notice, the apostle here dwells mainly upon all spiritual blessings; does he therefore exclude temporal mercies? Nay, brethren, the greater secures the less. Doubtless Paul thought the comforts of time and sense to be so secondary compared with spiritual blessings in heavenly places, that he thought it no wrong to omit them or consider them to be included while he lifted up his praise in this verse to the Father for his spiritual gifts; for He that gives us will never deny us the silver of temporal blessings. He that gives us heaven will surely give us all that is needful on the road thither. Spirituals are the best gifts; the heritage given to the firstborn. Delight yourselves in spiritual things, for this will mark the distinction between you and the carnal man who has his portion in this life, whereas the believer's motto is, "The Lord is my portion." Spiritual blessings are for spiritual men, for they only can appreciate or even perceive them; they are a prepared portion for a prepared people. They range from the first painful sense of sin up to the sinless perfection of eternal glory, and all these blessings are pronounced upon the head of each heir of salvation.

Furthermore, note well that our heavenly Father has blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ. Spiritual blessings are heavenly things; they come from heaven, they lead to heaven, they are of a heavenly nature, and are such as are enjoyed in heaven itself. You may read the text either as heavenly places or heavenly things, and be equally correct. It is a wonderful thing that, even here on earth, the saints enjoy and experience heavenly blessings; for a new nature is a heavenly thing, and love, and joy in God, and rest, and safety, and acceptance in the Beloved are all heavenly things. If you read it "places," it is equally true that heaven and all its mansions are ours, and we have already taken possession of them in Christ Jesus, our representative and forerunner.

Where Christ is, there is heaven, and He is in our hearts. The sun is above, but inasmuch as His light and heat are here, we say that we sit in the sun and bask in the sun; even so, though the presence of Jesus is in glory, yet we enjoy on earth that sacred revelation of God which is of heaven. Present grace is heaven begun in the soul. He that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God and God in him; what more can heaven be? Even now "He hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus." That which God has given to us is not bounded by the narrow horizon of this present visible world, but He has given to us all heavenly things most richly to enjoy; the boundless glories of eternity even now belong to us by virtue of the Father's benediction, which He has pronounced on us in Christ Jesus. Only here let me inquire whether you belong to the company upon whom the divine blessing rests. Are you seeking to be saved by your own works? Then you are not saved by grace through Christ Jesus. Are you without faith in Christ? Then the heavenly blessing does not belong to you.

A GOLDEN CASKET.

We must not fail to note that the plenitude of spiritual and heavenly blessings only comes to us in Christ. It is not in ourselves that these boons are vested; we hold them by virtue of our union with the Lord Jesus. He is that golden casket in which the treasures of the covenant are enclosed and secured. He is our Trustee, holding the heritage for us; and this is the form of our tenure—"joint heirs with Christ." How precious, then, is our union with Him! Of what vital importance is it to be bound up in the bundle of life with Him! As without Him we can do nothing, so without Him we can possess nothing. In Him we have already received a thousand blessings in actual experience, and in Him there is laid up a boundless supply for future enjoyment.

At the thought of this let our hearts sing hallelujahs. In the spirit of sonship let us reverence the Father of our spirits who is also the Father of mercies, and the God of all consolation. Blessed, forever blessed, be the Lord God of heaven and earth, for His unutterable goodness to His chosen in the person of His dear Son. Let us sing unto Him:

"O measureless might!
Ineffable love!
While angels delight
To hymn Thee above,
The humbler creation,
Though feeble their lay.
With true adoration
Shall lisp to Thy praise.'

III. Thirdly and briefly let us observe

THE FIRST OUTFLOW

of these heavenly blessings. The fountain of eternal love burst forth in our election—"According as He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world." Consider these words one by one. The first is, He hath chosen; God has a will and a choice in the matter of salvation. Some people do not like this doctrine, but they must have it whether they like it or not, or else they must reject the word of inspiration. Is man's will to be deified? Is the whole result of the scheme of salvation to depend upon the creature's choice? God forbid. The Lord Himself gave you your faith, and brought you into living union with Jesus; do you not bless Him for this? It seems to me that here is something for which to praise and bless the Father world without end.

Carefully note that election shapes everything; the Father has blessed us with all spiritual blessings, "According as He hath chosen us in Christ." All the grace of earth and the glory of heaven come to us in accordance with the eternal choice. If we will not have the Father's election we cannot have His blessing, for His gifts are plainly stated to be according to His choice; they come because of the choice, and they prove the choice; they should therefore remind us of our election, and call forth our sweetest songs. They should make us ask with David "Whence is this to me?" A man who is elect of God ought to sing the praises of God both day and night, for he is chosen to show forth the praises of Jehovah.

The next word is "He hath chosen us." Herein is grace indeed. What could there be in us that the Lord should choose us? Some of us feel ourselves the most unworthy of the unworthy, and we can see for our being chosen. So far from being choice men in our esteem, we feel ourselves by nature to be the very reverse. But if God has chosen us, then let our hearts love Him, our lips extol Him, our hands serve Him, and our whole lives adore Him.

"Loved of my God, for Him again
With love intense I burn:
Chosen of Thee ere time began,
I choose Thee in return."

Then we are told He has chosen us in Christ Jesus. He first chose Christ as the head and then looked through Christ upon us and chose us to be members of Christ's mystical body. We are none of us chosen apart from Jesus Christ; but we are chosen in Christ, loved in Christ, given to Christ, united to Christ, and accepted in Christ. This is a blessed way of being chosen; for none can separate us from Christ.

Moreover, we are told the time when this choice was made: Before the foundation of the world. This is the earliest conceivable period. When this earth was fitted up for man we do know, for the Scriptures inform us, but how many ages elapsed before it was furnished for our race, we do not know; yet long before that period the Father had chosen His people. The foundation of the world may mean its first creation, when it was spoken out of nothing; that must be ages of ages ago, but before that the Father chose us. Remember those words "who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began." Did the Lord of glory choose me from before the foundation of the world; then I choose him with all my heart to be my Lord, my all. Did He love me from of old? Then I will love Him with all my soul and strength, and pray that my heart may be enlarged to love Him more.

IV. Fourthly and lastly, our text reminds us of another cause for praise, namely, of all this blessing: "That we should be holy and without blame before Him in love." It is God's eternal design that His people should be holy, and this purpose He has pursued at infinite cost. This is the design of all the blessings which the Father has given us in Christ. All these favors are a call to us to be holy, and each one has a tendency to promote our sanctification. When you grow in grace, and faith, and hope, and joy, all that growth is toward holiness. Always think of that, and bless God for your graces by manifesting their influence in your conduct. Bless God for increased knowledge and deepened experience, for He has designed by these to sanctify you more fully to Himself. There is something practical in every boon that comes from the Father's hand, and you should pray to Him that you may by each one conquer sin, advance in virtue and perfect holiness in His fear. We are chosen unto holiness.

The Father chose us to Himself that we might be without blame before Him in love. He would have us blameless, so that no man can justly find fault with us; and harmless, so that our lives may injure none but bless all. Holiness is, however, more than this. We are called to be made whole by being healed of the disease of sin, and by having all our broken powers reunited into one harmonious whole. This restored nature is to be wholly consecrated to God, and thus to become holy before God. Oh, that we may realize God's object in election even at this time, and so make our calling and election sure! Let us mightily strive after this, and never rest till we have it.

But notice where and what kind of holiness this is: holy and blameless before Him. I have met with several people who say they are perfectly holy; but I believe they are under a delusion, and I feel sure that those who watch them will not long think them perfect. This perfection of theirs is according to their own vain ideas and conceited notions, and not according to the judgment of the Lord, who searches the heart.

PERFECTION IN THE FLESH IS A LIE;

I believe it to be one of the grossest falsehoods ever palmed on foolish minds. It would be something to be holy and blameless before the devil as Job was. It would be something to be perfect before the eyes of men who are so ready to criticise us; but to be blameless before Him who reads our thoughts and sees our every failure in a moment—this is an attainment of a far higher order. Oh, to be spotless and faultless! Let us bless God that He is aiming every day to make us holy and blameless before Himself; and He will do it, for His purpose never fails. He has wrought it in a large measure in all His saints, and He will perfect that which He has begun. This is the goal toward which we are running, that we may attain to the complete likeness of Christ. Courage, brethren, it is yet beyond us, but He that hath begun the good work in us will perform it unto the day of Christ. We shall one day be without fault before the throne of God.

To conclude, we are to be holy and blameless before Him in love. Love is the anointing oil which is to be poured on all the Lord's priests; when He has robed them in their spotless garments, they shall partake of the unction of love. When He has delivered us from all sin, one choice thing shall be seen in us, and that is love—abounding love. "God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him." As we love we live unto God. Perfect life will be perfect love. Judge of your sanctification by this—Do you grow in love to God? Do you also increase in love to the brethren? If your heart grows hard with the proud notion that you are somebody by reason of your high attainments, and that the poor little saints around you are unworthy even to unloose the latchets of your shoes, you are not growing in holiness. Do you love poor sinners more? For if your heart does not grow tender you are not growing holy. What a blessed thing it would be to be saturated with love! They said of Basil, that he was a pillar of fire because of his zeal. I wish it could be said of us that we were flames of fire because of our love.

Oh, to love our neighbor as ourselves, thinking no evil! "Oh," says one, "we should be imposed upon!" That would be no harm compared with being hardened by selfishness. "But we should be illtreated and defrauded." Suppose we were; it would be better than being miserly and cruel.

THE WORST OF ILLS

is hate, the best of blessings is love. When we become incapable of selfishness, and get right away from unkindness of heart and uncharitableness of thought, Christ will be living in us and we in Him, and then we shall be fulfilling the purpose of electing love and the design of the innumerable spiritual blessings which are already given us in Christ Jesus. To this let us all aspire. Let brotherly love continue. Let us love each other more than we have ever done, and join our hands anew in a firm league of concord. Let us love the universal church of Christ. Let our hearts burn with ardent affection toward the perishing multitudes of men, that we may bring them to put their whole trust in Jesus and live. May the Father deal with us according to His riches in glory by Christ Jesus, and to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost be glory forever and ever. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Ephesians 1.]

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 250,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

An Index to the Bible Containing a Classified list of subjects, with references, has been issued by the Board of Publication of the Reformed Church in a form convenient for the pocket, price fifteen cents. It is a little work very useful to ministers and Sunday-school teachers.

The Worst Paralysis of all Forms of that dire affliction, is described in a Boston journal in the course of some biographical reminiscences. The writer states that he is acquainted with a man who might be one of the first literary workers of his time. At sixteen, he had written poems worthy to take rank with the work of older men, and which won him admiring recognition from certain English poets, before whom he was ready to fall down and worship, with all his boyish enthusiasm. He was admitted to the private gatherings of these men whom he admired; gatherings where the air was thick with tobacco smoke, and the drinks ranged from choice claret to whiskey, and brandy and water and soda. Hospitality offered him wine and cigars, and in those early days he grew to love strong stimulants with a sort of passion, and later on, when troubles came to him—greater troubles than fall to most men's lot—his natural refuge seemed to be that spirit of fire whose acquaintance he had made when so young. And then, when his lonely days were long, it was another temptation to drink something that would impart a temporary cheer, that, if it could not, itself, give joy, could at least make one forget the want of it. And so it went, from bad to worse. A poor man, he spends a large part of his income for spirits and tobacco. His appetite for food grows less and less, and his craving for spirits more and more; and the strength, the energy, is dying out of this man, whom nature meant to be one of the foremost men of his time. "I wish I could give up drinking spirit," he said, one day; "but there would be no use of my saying that I will—I cannot." He has proved the truth of the divine warning (John 8 : 34). Would that he and other men similarly enslaved would also prove the efficacy of the divine emancipation (John 8 : 32)!

A Wedding Procession in Batavia.

JAVA AND SUMATRA,

the scene of the recent appalling phenomena as illustrated in one of its aspects on our frontispiece, are two considerable islands, under the Government of Holland, and situated in the Indian Ocean, to the south of China, Burmah, Annam, and Siam. They are separated from each other by a very narrow strip of water called the Strait of Sunda. The islands are of volcanic origin, and there may still be counted upon them no less than forty-five distinct volcanoes. On Saturday, August 25th last, more than a third of the craters broke out into active eruption.

Just before dusk a great luminous cloud formed over Gunung Guntur, and the crater of that volcano began to emit enormous streams of white and sulphurous mud and lava. These were rapidly succeeded by explosions, followed by tremendous showers of cinders and enormous fragments of rock, which were hurled high into the air and scattered in all directions, carrying death and destruction with them. With these terrible eruptions came sympathetic demonstrations from the sea. Overhanging clouds were so surcharged with electricity that at one time more than fifteen huge waterspouts were seen. Men, women, and children rushed in terror from their tottering dwelling-places, filling the air with shrieks of horror. Hundreds were unable to get out before the houses fell, and were buried.

On Monday night the volcano of Papandayang was in an active state of paroxysmal eruption. A whirlwind accompanied this eruption, by which house-roofs, trees, men, and horses were carried into the air. The quantity of ashes ejected was such as to cover the ground and the roofs of the houses to the depth of several inches. Then occurred the extraordinary spectacle described in a previous number of The Christian Herald* of the great mountain, Papandayang, being split into seven parts.

The entire region is singularly destitute of evangelistic agency and Christian enterprise. Since the opening of China to the foreigner, to which we have referred in our life of Dr. Medhurst, the only work for Christ, so far as we have been able to discover, which has been done in Malaysia has been under the auspices of the Dutch Baptists, the Netherlands and Rhenish Missionary Societies, and by the colportage agency of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

WEDDING PROCESSION IN BATAVIA.

The Javanese are remarkably fond of histrionic display and showy processions. A formal visit to any notable personage is nearly always a scene of barbaric splendor. There are processions to the temples almost incessantly. Is a feast to be given in honor of departed spirits? There must be a long and demonstrative procession. Is a magnate to be entertained by the terpsichorean gesticulations of a company of dancing girls? A preliminary procession is inevitable. Or it may be, as shown in the above picture, a rich native, probably a descendant of some redoubtable emperor of Java, is about to add another wife to those already in his numerously-peopled harem. Then there must be a procession to the temple, which according to the wealth of the bridegroom is more or less superb and splendid, in consonance with the ideas prevalent in that region.

First and foremost, the cynosure of all eyes, there comes the bridegroom himself, riding upon a noble white horse, richly caparisoned, and surrounded and followed by attendants of all degrees, prepared to render any service, however important or insignificant. Then, surrounded by her dancing-girls, who also act as bridesmaids, comes the bride, borne upon the strong, brown shoulders of sturdy men, and these are followed by the drum and tom-tom bearers and players, whose repeated musical performances are deafening and distracting to the last degree. The rear is brought up by a miscellaneous crowd, generally orderly, but fully anticipating a share of the good things in the way of eating and drinking, which, as largesse, will be liberally distributed when the ceremony of the day has come to an end. In the foreground of the picture may be seen a couple of fruit-girls and a few enthusiastic young folk, who are evidently much interested in the proceedings.

A CLERGYMAN'S COLLEGE PARTY.

A young clergyman was one of a large party seated at dinner in the house of Colonel Towers, a prominent member of his congregation. Total abstinence at that time had not attained the influence and power it now exerts in our churches, and it was quite customary for clergymen and the officers of their churches to drink wine and liquor in moderation. It consequently occasioned some surprise when the young clergyman, who had but recently accepted the charge of the congregation, respectfully but firmly declined Colonel Towers's invitation, "Will you give me the pleasure of taking a glass of wine with you, Mr. Winsor?"

The dinner party passed off pleasantly, and the guests took their departure in the best of moods, pleased with their new clergyman, and glad to have had the opportunity of meeting each other and him in pleasant social intercourse. They, like their host, were a little disappointed that Mr. Winsor was a total abstainer, thinking that it would render him less friendly and sociable than he would have been if he had taken his glass and cigar with his friends. Mr. Winsor did not leave with them. Colonel Towers asked him to remain for an hour longer and drink a cup of tea with himself and daughter and his business partner, Mr. Sutton, and the clergyman consented.

"Now, Mr. Winsor," Colonel Towers said, when the quartet were gathered around the table, "I should like to know your reasons for taking up with this fanatical teetotal idea. Every man has a right to adopt his own rules of life in such matters, but I think you will decrease your opportunities of usefulness, if people come to regard you as an ascetic and an unsociable man. Wine is one of God's good gifts to man to be used wisely. Of course, those who have no self-control should not touch it, but I take it you are not one of that class."

"I cannot answer your question better, colonel, than by telling you how I became a total abstainer," said the clergyman. "It is a very mournful episode in my life, and one I cannot describe without some pain, but it is best you should understand why I regard total abstinence as an imperative duty for me.

"When I was at college I had a very dear friend, gifted beyond most young men with brilliant talents and a wonderful capacity for hard work. We all looked upon him as destined to a magnificent career, and he had all the essentials for accomplishing great things. He went into everything that he did with his whole heart, and succeeded. Whatever he did, whether in the base-ball field, or the social party, or in his study, he forgot everything else for the time being, and attended to the occupation of the hour. He was very popular, and we all admired him, but by me, particularly, he was beloved, and he returned my affection.

The Clergyman relates a College Reminiscence.

"At the conclusion of my college course I gave a party to celebrate my having passed my examination with some honor, and he was one of the guests. The festivities had scarcely commenced when I received a note from the Principal of my college begging me to come to him without delay on some private business of importance. I was sorry to leave, but the Principal was going away early the following morning, so I had no alternative but to comply with his wish. Begging my friend to take my place at the head of the table, I left, promising to return as speedily as I could.

"The business at the Principal's house occupied a longer time than I expected, and on my return an hour and a half later, I found my friends thoroughly enjoying themselves and, though perfectly sober, evidently in convivial mood. It was our usual hour for breaking up, and if we had separated then all would have been well. But that was unanimously declared impossible, and the toasts of the evening, in my honor, were drunk with enthusiasm. My brilliant friend was, as usual, the life of the party. I never saw him so witty or so amusing before. The party continued an hour longer, and when it separated the clock was striking midnight.

"I was retiring to rest when there came a loud knocking at the door. On opening it I found my guests with pallid faces, begging me to come immediately to the police station. My friend had been hurt, was dying, and wanted to see me. On our way thither they told me what had occurred. The night air had taken its usual effect on him, and the fumes of the wine of which he had drunk freely rose to his head. He was ready for any mad prank. A large mail wagon passed them, and he insisted on stopping it and mounting to the box beside the driver. How it happened they could not tell, but the horses took fright, and he fell while climbing to the top, and the wheels passed over him. They picked him up and carried him into the police station, while an ambulance was telegraphed for.

"I shall never forget his face as I looked upon it as he lay on the bench. 'I wanted to say good-by, old fellow,' he said. 'I'm dying, I know. I must have been mad. Don't blame yourself, my boy. It was my own fault; I had taken too much wine. Solomon was right, it is a mocker. It is very hard to die like this.' They were his last words. Before the ambulance came he had breathed his last.

"As I followed his poor mangled body to the grave I was almost beside myself with grief. My unfortunate party had been the means of blotting out a promising, useful life. Against the wine I swore over his grave eternal war. It had murdered my friend, and I can never touch it again."

The clergyman's hearers listened attentively, and Colonel Towers, especially, was deeply interested in the narrative. At its close he rose and shook hands with Mr. Winsor. "You are right," he said, "I, too, know of sad cases of its deceitful work. Perhaps it might be well if Christian men would as a body make a stand against it. But it is hard for one to do it alone."

"How much harder," said Mr. Winsor, "for those who are in danger, to abstain. I want you and all my Christian friends to set the example. Who knows how many lives and souls it may be the means of saving?"

To that work Mr. Winsor set himself, and soon had the joy of seeing total abstinence the rule in nearly every household in his congregation.

POVERTY'S PREY.

A SERIAL STORY.

Rather than Starve.

THE small back room, which was the home of a family, was not much larger than a prison-cell, and, in point of cleanliness and light and ventilation, was far inferior to it. There was a fair-sized sash-window; but more than half the panes were broken, and the place of the glass supplied by paper, or rags so worn as to be useless for any other purpose. Besides this, the next row of houses in this thick knot of dwelling-places was built so close as to shut out even a glimpse of the sky from the rooms on the ground-floor of a house four stories high. The whole street had been originally built for tenants of a better class; but, from some reason or other, it had fallen into the occupation of the poorest, and each room was considered sufficient accommodation for a separate family.

This small, dark, back room had been intended for a kitchen. Close against the window stood the dust-bin, into which was emptied all the waste of the house, when it was not cast out into the street. Fortunately there was very little waste of food; for every scrap that could be eaten was greedily devoured, except in very extraordinarily good times. It was fortunate; for the dust-bin was seldom looked after, as the inmates of the crowded dwelling knew little, and cared less, for sanitary laws.

Even the poor, hard-working woman, who had been struggling for years to pay the rent of this dark, unwholesome den as a home for herself and her children, hardly gave a thought to the tainted air they breathed, whether the window was open or shut. She sighed now and then for better light, and the cool freshness of free air; but darkness and a sickly atmosphere seemed to be the natural lot of all about her, and she was not given to murmur. She had grown so weary with the long and monotonous battle of life, that she had no longer energy enough to murmur. It was God's will, she said to herself, finding something like peace in the belief. There was a darker depth of misery to which she had not yet sunk—that of feeling there was no God at all.

Her husband had been dead for ten years, and she had had two little childern to hamper all her efforts to lift herself and them out of their poverty. She had often failed to procure necessaries, and she had never been so successful as to be able to provide for more than their barest wants. They had all learned how to pinch hard, how to eat little enough, and how to wear the scantiest clothing. They were always trying to trick Nature, who never ceased to demand urgently more than they could give, but who consented to take less than her claim, though the landlord would not.

The children spent most of their waking hours in the street; for there was a small boiler in the kitchen, and the mother took in washing, with which every inch of the small room was crowded. When the weather was too bad for them to be in the streets, they lived on the common staircase or in the passages, hearing and seeing every form of evil, and of good also, swarming about them, and growing up among them as other children grow up amid the peaceful influences of well-ordered homes.

In the mother's mind there were still lingering dim memories of a very different childhood, and of better times before her marriage. Sometimes there came to her, as there comes to all of us, sudden flashes of light out of the misty past; and she saw again her cottage-home down in the country, and the village-school she went to, and her first place as a young servant in the vicarage, where the clergyman's wife had taken care she should keep up her acquaintance with the Catechism.

Most of the Catechism had faded away from her remembrance; but many a quiet Sunday afternoon she had talked to her children of the vicarage garden, where flowers grew all the year round, and of the village-green, where boys and girls could play unmolested and unnoticed; and how she left home to come to London for high wages, and had never seen it again. Then she told them of the gay and grand doings there had been in the great houses where she had been in service, until she met with their father, and gave up all the grandeur and luxury for love of him. And then her voice would falter a little as she talked to them of his death, and of all the troubles following quickly one after another, till she was thankful to have even such a home as this.

The poor mother was ignorant; but her ignorance was light and knowledge compared with that of her children. They knew nothing, and thought of nothing, beyond what they saw and heard about them. David could read a little, but Bess not at all. The thick knot of streets was swarming with children; and it was not difficult to escape the notice of the school-inspector on his occasional visits, especially as Bess was thirteen and David nearly fourteen years of age.

The boy had begun to earn a few pence in the streets as soon as he could sell matches; and he was now getting a precarious and uncertain living for himself by "hob-jobbing," as he called it. The Sunday afternoons and evenings, when their mother's work stood still for a few short hours, were their holidays. She had no longer a Sunday gown to wear; but she never failed to put on her wedding-ring, which on week-days was carefully laid aside, lest it should get too much worn with her hard work. Bess and David felt that their mother was different from most other women in the street. She did not drink or swear or brawl; and all their little world knew she was honest. They were vaguely fond of her good character; and David was beginning to feel for her a protecting tenderness he could not have put into words.

For a long while neither of them knew that she was suffering from the fatal and painful disease of cancer, which had thrust its deep roots into her very life. When he did know it, David's heart burned within him to see her standing bravely at her washing-tub, enduring her agony as patiently as she could. At last she was compelled to seek help from the parish; and the relieving officer, after visiting her, recommended out-door relief. There was no doubt what the end must be, and not much uncertainty as to how soon the end must come. A small sum a week would cost the overseers of the poor less than taking the woman and her girl—even if the boy was left to take care of himself—into the house, and provide for her the necessaries and comforts the medical officer would certainly pronounce indispensable. He advised a carefully reckoned dole worth about a dollar a week.

Mrs. Fell was more than satisfied. Separation from her children would have been more bitter than death itself; but now she would have Bess and David with her as long as she could keep death at bay. The four shillings and eightpence would pay her rent, and leave almost fourpence a day for other expenses! If she could only drag on through the winter, and keep a home for Bess and David, she would not murmur, however hard her pain was. She could bear worse anguish than she had yet borne for their sakes.

But there was one enemy she had not thought of. The wasting caused by her malady produced a craving hunger, worse to endure, if possible, than the malady itself. It was no longer possible to cheat herself, as she had been used to do in former years, with putting off her hunger until it changed into a dull faintness. The gnawing pain showed itself too plainly in the desperate clinching of her teeth, and the wistful craving of her sunken eyes. Threepence and three farthings a day—one penny and one farthing apiece—could do little toward maintaining a truce with this deadly foe, who must surely conquer her before the winter could be ended.

"It's just as if a wolf was gnawin' me," she said to David one evening, when he came in with a loaf of bread and a slice of cooked fish from a stall in the street; "not as ever I see a wolf, save once when father was alive, and you was a baby, and we all went to the Zoological Gardens for a holiday. It feels as if all the hunger I ever had had hidden itself away somewhere, and heaped itself up, and is all let loose on me now. You children take your share first, for fear I'd eat it all, and not leave enough for you."

"It's all for you and Bess, mother," he answered; "I ate my supper at the stall."

He did not say that he had made his supper of a crust of mouldy bread he had found lying in the street, and was still as hungry as a growing lad generally is. Like his mother, he was quite used to disregard the urgent claims of his appetite. But he sat down at the end of her ironing-board, and watched her by the feeble light of the candle as she greedily devoured the food he had brought It seemed as if his eyes were opened to see her more clearly than he had ever done before, and her face was indelibly impressed upon his memory. For the first time, as it appeared to him, he noticed her thin, sunken cheeks; her scanty hair turning gray; her eager, bright eyes; and the suffering that filled her whole face. The tears dimmed his sight for an instant, and a slight shiver ran through him, as he gazed intently on her.

"Mother," he said, "I only took fourpence all day for running two errands, for all I've been on the lookout sharp. Mother, I must take to beggin'."

"No, no!" she answered, looking up for a moment from the food she was so eagerly eating.

"I must," he went on; "there's lots o' money to be got that way. They all says so. I couldn't make myself look hungrier than I am; and I'll tell the truth, as you're dyin' of a cancer, ay! and dyin' of hunger. I know there'd be folks as would help us. I hate the thought of it as much as you; but it's better me than Bess. Little Bess 'ud be frightened," he added, looking at his ragged sister, for whose sake he had fought many a battle, and borne many a beating in the streets.

"I never thought it 'ud come to beggin'," said his mother in a sorrowful, faltering voice.

"Nor me," continued David; "but there's hardly no work for such as me as don't know nothink. I'd have chose to be a carpenter like father; but there's no chance of that. Don't you cry, mother; you've done your best for us, and it's my turn to do my best for you; and beggin's the best as I can do."

David felt it a bitter pass to come to. Untaught and ignorant as he was, he had his own dream of ambition to be a carpenter, and earn wages like his father. He had gone now and then to a night-school, and learned, after a fashion, to read and write a little; but there was no school where a ragged boy like him could learn any kind of handicraft by which he could earn a livelihood. If there had been such a place, how gladly would he have gone to it, and how heartily would he have set himself to work! There was no one to blame, perhaps; but still he felt it to be a hard and bitter lot to turn out as a beggar.

"I'll do it," he said, after a long silence, "not just around here, you know, mother; but out in the country, where folks ain't all in such a hurry. I'll take care of the police, and I'll be back again afore Sunday; and you've got Bess with you, so as you won't be lonesome. If I've luck, I'll try again next week. There's kind rich folk as 'ud do somethink for you, if they only knew; and I'll go and find 'em out. Don't you take on and fret, mother. It ain't thievin', you know."

"I'll think about it in the night, Davy," she answered sadly.

In the painful, wakeful hours of the night, the poor mother thought of her boy tramping the roads in his ragged clothing and with his almost bare feet, and stopping the passers-by to ask for alms. It had been the aim of her long, laborious life to save herself and her children from beggary. Oh, if this cruel malady had only spared her another two or three years, until David had been more of a man, and Bess a grown-up girl! She could have laid down to die thankfully then, though now she had a terrible dread of dying. But, as far as she could see, there was nothing else to be done than to let David try his luck. There were good rich folks, as he said, if he could only find them. She must let him go and search for them.

"You may go," she said in the morning, after they had eaten together the few fragments her hunger had been able to spare the night before; "and God bless you, Davy! Don't you never do nothink save beg. That's bad enough; but remember, both of yer, what I always said, 'Keep thy hands from pickin' and stealin'.' Them's good words to go by. And, Davy, come back as soon as you can; for I'll be hungrier for a sight of you than I am for victuals. Always tell out your tale quiet and true, as your mother's dyin' of cancer and famishin' with hunger; and if they answer 'No,' or shakes their heads, turn away at once, and try somebody else. Don't stop folks as are in a hurry. Kiss me afore you go, Davy."

It seemed a solemn thing to do. He felt half-choked, and could not speak a word as he bent down to kiss her tenderly. He put his arm round his sister's neck, and kissed her too; and then, catching up his threadbare cap, he went to the door trying to whistle a cheery street tune. He paused in the doorway, and looked back on them.

"Good-by, mother," he cried; "don't you fret after me."

David was in no haste to enter upon his new calling. He walked on until he had left the busier street far behind him, and had come upon the open and quieter roads in the suburbs. Here and there trees were growing on the inner side of garden-walls, and stretched out their leafy branches, tinted with autumn colors, over the side-paths along which he pursued his unknown way. The passers-by were more leisurely than those in the city, and occasionally gave him a glance, as if they both saw and noticed him—such a glance as he never met amid the crowds who jostled one another in the thoroughfares he was accustomed to. This observation made him feel shy, and more averse than ever to begin his unwelcome task. It was past noonday before he could bring himself to stop a kindly-looking lady, who had looked pleasantly on him, and to beg from her help for his mother.

His first appeal was successful, and gave him fresh courage to try again. The kind-hearted woman had helped him to take the first step downward. He met with rebuffs, and felt downcast and ashamed; but he also met with persons who gave him money to get rid of his pinched face, and others who believed his story, though he was several miles from home, and bestowed upon him a penny or two, feeling they had done all they were called upon to do for a perishing fellow-creature. Not one took any steps to verify his story, but passed on, and soon forgot the ragged lad, or remembered him with a pleasant glow of satisfaction in having discharged a Christian duty.

By the time night fell, David was ten miles from home, and felt foot-sore and weary; for his worn-out shoes, bought at some rag-mart, chafed his feet, and did not even keep out the dust of the dry roads. But he had his pocket nearly full of money; and he counted the pennies (there was no silver in it) from one hand to another with untold joyfulness. So much money he had never possessed at one time in his whole life; and, when he lay down to rest in a lodging-house in a back street of the town he had reached by nightfall, he could not sleep soundly, partly from delight, and partly from the fear of being robbed. If he had luck like this, he would go home rich on Saturday night. Early in the morning he started off again to pursue his new calling, which was quickly losing its sense of degradation. If begging was so profitable a business, and he had no chance of being trained for any other by which he could earn honest wages, it was no wonder that the boy should choose beggary rather than starvation. David began to feel that there was less chance of dying of cold or hunger.

SAMUEL THE JUDGE.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 14. 1 Sam. 7 : 3-17. Golden Text, verse 12. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Lessons Taught by Painful Experience — The Time for Reformation—The Danger of Self-Confidence—Faith as a Strange God—An American Missionary's Faith Failing—Experience a Strange God—The Summons to Mizpeh—Renewed Fears—An Acceptable Offering—Purification Followed by Victory—The Praise Ascribed—A Satanic Snare—Samuel's Latter Days.

We saw in our last lesson that "the words of Samuel came to all Israel," but we saw also how terrible was the hindrance, in the ungodly lives of Hophni and Phinehas, to its taking any effect. Samuel, however, did not lose himself in disheartening and discouraging regrets; he did not fix his eyes on the evil or on the evildoers, but on the Lord. God had vindicated His honor and His holiness by the terrible judgment which He had brought upon Eli and his family, and by the defeat which His people had suffered, at the hands of the Philistines, and, above all, by the capture of the ark of God, the Lord had shown that no external religion would avail to help them, and that man-made plans were utterly useless. He had also shown the Philistines that He was Ruler, and had constrained these heathen to acknowledge Him; He had shown the men of Bethshemesh, Levites though they were, that they were not to intrude into holy things, and smote them because they looked into the ark.

Now was the time for

A THOROUGH REFORMATION,

"All the house of Israel lamented after the Lord," a deep sense of need manifested itself. It is just at such times that God loves to make Himself known; "He satisfieth the longing soul, and filleth the hungry soul with goodness" (Ps. 107 : 9), "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled" (Matt. 5 : 6). Then it was that "Samuel spake unto all the house of Israel, saying, If ye do return unto the Lord with all your hearts, then put away the strange gods and Ashtaroth from among you, and prepare your hearts unto the Lord, and serve Him only: and He will deliver you out of the hand of the Philistines." The people were in a teachable spirit, very unlike that which led them in their self-confidence to carry the ark of God into the camp; now they were ready to learn. No state of soul is more dangerous than that of self-confidence, "Wherefore, my beloved brethren, let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak" (James 1 : 19).

Samuel, as God's messenger, was seeking to lead the people to reality, to real heart work; even while the ark of God was absent from the tabernacle, he sought to bring them face to face with God Himself. But this could be only on one condition, "Put away the strange gods;" every other dependence must fall. If there is any lack in our communion with God, there must be a reason for it, something else is taking the place of God, or sharing the place of God in our hearts. It may not be money, business, pleasure, dress, or anything external; it may be simply our own efforts to serve God. While we are exercising our own energy, making our own plans, however zealous, we are constantly thwarted and disappointed; we pray God to help us, and the help does not come as we expected, and we are tempted to doubt whether God does answer prayer; and we find that we dare not speak too much of it to others, lest they should ask us, "Are your prayers always answered?" There is a strange god to be put away; we are really relying on ourselves, helped out by God, and this hinders real and full dependence upon God. Some are relying on their faith instead of on God Himself; and even faith, when put in the place of God, is a "strange god."

AN HONORED MISSIONARY, who had gone out from America to India relying on God alone, and who started on the journey without having even the money for his passage, and who had labored for years in the interior, always depending upon God alone for subsistence, without ever making known his wants to any man, remarked in a meeting that he had been tempted to think he knew as much about faith as any man did, and it would not be easy to teach him any more about trusting God. But, unknown to himself, he was making his faith a "strange god." He was taken very ill, and instead of trusting God, sought the doctor, who said he must go home. He looked to the sea air to restore him, and thus his faith failed him about his body, and it was only when spending a time with Mr. Boardman that the Lord discovered to him that he had yet to learn full trust for spirit, soul, and body, and he said now his reliance was no longer on sea air, nor on the doctor, nor yet on his own faith, but on Jesus only.

With some, their

EXPERIENCE IS A "STRANGE GOD;"

their reliance is not on what God is, nor on what God says, but on what they feel about Him. All praise to God for any experience of His love and power which we have, but it is to Himself alone that we must trust. Thus when any one trusts in the fact of his conversion, or the fact of his sanctification, or the fact of his healing, instead of in the faithfulness of God, he is making the very work of God upon him to be a "strange god," just as the children of Israel make an idol of the serpent of brass which God had used as the instrument of their deliverance in the wilderness, and thus constituted it a strange god. If our hearts are hungry after deeper acquaintance with God, if we have a deep sense of need, then God will discover to us what are our idols, and but one thing remains to us, i.e., to put them away at once, and to serve and depend upon God only.

"Then the children of Israel did put away Baalim and Ashtaroth, and served the Lord only. And Samuel said, Gather all Israel to Mizpeh, and I will pray for you unto the Lord." Samuel it was no chance thing with the young prophet, and he must know the ground he had; if Israel were of one mind with God, then he knew there was a certainty of answer; as soon as they sought, not themselves, but God, then he knew God would be only too willing to undertake and carry out their cause. They gathered together to Mizpeh [watch tower], typical of looking out to see what the Lord would say, "and drew water, and poured it out before the Lord, and fasted on that day, and said there, We have sinned against the Lord." "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness" (1 John 1 : 9). Confession is indispensable to a real getting right with God, when we are conscious that anything has been wrong, or when lack of power against our foes shows we have been wrong. The people poured out water to signify how completely they acknowledged themselves to be empty and nothing—"I am poured out like water" (Ps. 22 : 14); "For we must needs die, and are as water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again" (II Sam. 14 : 14).

When the Philistines heard that the children of Israel were gathered together to Mizpeh, they, having lost all fear of Israel, seemed to think it a good time to take advantage of them, and so "they went up against them." The children of Israel had not yet returned to full confidence in their God, they feared the Philistines, and entreated Samuel "Cease not" [or, Be not silent] "to cry unto the Lord our God for us, that He will save us out of the hand of the Philistines." Now was the time when an offering could be accepted; "Samuel took a sucking lamb, and offered it for a burnt offering wholly unto the Lord." It was the sacrifice which was acceptable, "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." Now Samuel's cry could be heard, the hindrances were taken out of the way, "Samuel cried unto the Lord for Israel, and the Lord heard [or answered] him." We are not told how the answer came, but come it did before the event proved it. The Philistines knew nothing of what was going on, they knew not that heaven and earth were drawing near each other, and communications passing between them which would be fatal to their troops. They drew near to battle, but the Lord drew near to battle also, and although artillery was then unknown, a roar, louder than the roar of canon, God's own artillery, thundered upon the Philistines, and they were discomfited and smitten before Israel, who followed up their conquest by pursuing their enemies unto Bethcar.

Then came the moment of praise; "Samuel took a stone and set it between Mizpeh and Shen, and called the name of it saying, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us." Samuel attributed the victory neither to his own wisdom, nor to the prowess of the people, nor even to their humiliation and confession—he took not the least credit, but gave all the honor to God. Very frequently it happens that after God has humbled us, and we have made confession, and then glorious victory over our besetting sins follows, the enemy comes and suggests to us how virtuous we have been to become so humble, that of course victory would follow as a necessary consequence, and thus, in fact, he would represent God as being our debtor in some sense, and as though He were under obligation to us. If we fall into this snare, then we make a kind of system of our humiliation, as though it were a patent method of obtaining victory, and our trust being in ourselves, after all, we meet with disappointment and defeat. Self is long in dying, and Satan is tireless in his ingenuity of appeal to self. But praise-giving to the living God takes the eye off self, and fixes it on Him; we are safe from the enemy while we are praising God.

"So the Philistines were subdued, and they came no more into the coast of Israel; and the hand of the Lord was against the Philistines all the days of Samuel." It is a blessed thing when we have so far handed over our difficulties to the Lord that we know the hand of the Lord is against them. Have we been tried with evil thoughts, against which we have struggled, and prayed, and wrestled, and made plans? And now have we placed the matter in the hands of God, and do we know that the hand of the Lord is against these thoughts? How, then, shall we for a moment dread a recurrence of them? If it is temper, or anxiety, or self-will, and the hand of the Lord has undertaken the matter, how shall we look for anything but victory in the future? Only let us abide in Christ, and not fall back upon ourselves for help. The cities which the Philistines had taken from Israel were restored, for our God when He delivers redeems us even from the consequences of our falls, blessed be His Name!

"And Samuel judged Israel all the days of his life." He made a circuit yearly to Bethel [house of God], Gilgal [turning or conversion], and Mizpeh [watch tower], and judged Israel in all those places. Whether we are only just converted, or whether we know something of the blessed relationship to the household of faith, the body of Christ, or whether we are learning the watch-tower life, the life of prayer, we still need the judgment and the teaching of the Holy Ghost, a better Guide than Samuel; the Lord make us teachable. Samuel's home was Ramah [elevated], and there he built an altar unto the Lord. Samuel's religion was the same at home as abroad; the Lord make us all thus consistent, and then our lives, like Samuel's, will be powerful.

An Imposing Ceremony was Performed on Friday last, when the great German national monument on the Niederwald was unveiled. The monument is erected to commemorate the German victories over France in 1870 and 1871, and the restoration of the United German Empire. It is placed near the river Rhine opposite Bingen. The Niederwald, on which it is erected, is over seven hundred feet high, and the spot chosen overlooks one of the most beautiful points of the river—where the troops marched past into the war, and where King William, returning from France, "saluted the Rhine for the first time as Kaiser." The monument attains the height of one hundred and ten feet, consisting of substructure, a quandrangular stone base containing relief, pedestal and the figure of Germania, the latter being about thirty-three feet in height. The figure of Germania, which surmounts the memorial, is of gigantic proportions. The little finger of the Germania can only be spanned by the two hands of a man, and the nail of the thumb is eleven centimetres in length by nine in width. A man can crawl through the joint of the hand, and the interior of the body is large enough to provide dancing accommodation for twenty persons. The cost of the memorial was $200,000, and was defrayed by a national subscription. The venerable emperor, in unveiling it, said: "In the words spoken at the laying of the foundation-stone—words which my late father, after the wars of liberation of 1813 to 1815, bequeathed in iron to posterity—I dedicate this monument: 'To the fallen, a memorial; to the living, an acknowledgment; to coming generations, a source of emulation. May God vouchsafe it.'"

O'Donnell, the Murderer of Carey, the Irish informer, has been held for trial by the London magistrate, before whom he had his preliminary examination. On Friday last, when he was committed, the wife of his victim gave evidence against him. She appeared dressed in deep mourning, and excited the special interest of the spectators in the court room, and several murmurs of sympathy were heard. In giving her testimony she recounted the incidents of the voyage, corroborating the other witnesses in regard to the circumstances of the murder, except that she swore that after her husband was shot she said to O'Donnell, "You shot my husband!" O'Donnell replied, she said, "Don't blame me; I was sent to do it!" Whereupon the woman who was with him said, "Don't mind, O'Donnell; you are no informer!" The police believe that an attempt to rescue O'Donnell will be made. The prison van which conveyed him to court and back to prison, was driven at a gallop through the streets, surrounded by mounted police with drawn swords, and preceded and followed by vehicles full of armed men. The streets were lined the whole way with crowds, who cheered and hooted the prisoner, according to their sympathies. His coolness and self-confidence are remarkable. He continues to express his belief that he will be found guilty of manslaughter only, but the prevalent impression is that he will be convicted and hanged as he deserves.

Serious Riots Occurred in Ireland on September 26th, when two members of Parliament, Messrs. O'Connor and Small, who are supporters of Mr. Parnell, were mobbed. They visited Unchnaclay Market for the purpose of holding a political meeting, but were unable to speak, as a body of Orangemen took possession of the place and compelled them to remain within doors. The Orangemen held a meeting in the principal street. Shouts of "No home rule!" were raised, and cheers for the Queen were given. The mob announced their intention of keeping possession of the town until Messrs. O'Connor and Small should withdraw, and declared that they would remain up all night to prevent the Parnellites from erecting a platform. Three thousand Orangemen marched in procession the following day, and afterward held an anti-Parnellite meeting. A report was current in London and Dublin, and was repeated on this side, that Mr. Parnell had been "removed" by a shot from an Orangeman. For a time the excitement was intense, though happily there were none of the unseemly demonstrations of approval which were witnessed when the news of the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish was received. At a late hour on Thursday Mr. Parnell cabled that the report was false.

The King of Spain has been Insulted in the streets of Paris. During his recent visit to the Emperor of Germany he was made colonel of a regiment of German Uhlans, a distinction of a complimentary character enjoyed by the Prince of Wales and other foreigners. It is supposed that this honorary appointment excited the hostility of the Parisians, whose politeness is generally maintained. As King Alfonso rode through the streets of Paris on Saturday morning, however, he was received with hisses and cries of "Down with the Uhlan King." The houses and balconies along the route traversed by His Majesty were thronged with people. As soon as Alfonso appeared at the station the crowd made so great a clamor that the Spanish national anthem, which was being played by a band, was almost inaudible. The clamor continued in all the streets through which the cortége passed, and insulting cries, directed at the king, were continually raised.

French Interference with Mr. H. M. Stanley, the African explorer, is threatened. The Paris correspondent of the New York Herald says: "The French will not allow Stanley and the International Association to settle the future of Congo without the intervention of the French Government. It will be fortunate if that intervention does not go beyond the mere establishment of trading stations at Franceville and Brazzaville. It is here believed to be quite on the cards that France will claim to control the navigation of the Congo below Stanley Pool. If this claim be put forward, the Congo difficulty will speedily assume proportions equal in importance to those already created by France in Tunis, Madagascar and Tonquin."

The Difficulty between France and China has not been arranged, though negotiations are still in progress. The latest proposal proceeds from China. It is that France shall acquire possession of Annam, providing Tonquin is given up to China. This being a reversal of the demands of the French Government is not likely to be accepted as a basis of peace. The Marquis Tseng, the Chinese minister at the court of France, declared that China was resolved to hold possession and control of the Red River, which the French have conquered at a large expenditure of life and money. "China," he said, "regards the control of the Red River as of immense importance to her interests, both commercial and strategic, and would go to extreme lengths to retain it. She will make great concessions in other directions in order to secure the advantages accruing from the possession of this great waterway, but all negotiations on her part will be carried on with this end in view. Once in full possession of the Red River she will throw it open to foreign trade throughout its course."

The Return to England of Mr. Shaw, the British missionary at Madagascar, whom the French imprisoned, and whose portrait appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week, has rekindled English indignation against France. Mr. Shaw tells a plain, unvarnished story. He states that while on board the French war-vessel he was not allowed to read and had no artificial light of any kind. He obtained possession of a Bible, however, which was a great consolation to him as he lay in his prison hourly expecting to be shot, and dreading, what he regarded as an infinitely greater evil, that his wrongs might lead to a war between his countrymen and the French. The food given to him was coarse and bad, worse than that supplied to convicts, and it was handed to him in a filthy bucket. Mr. Shaw says: "I was thrust into a small cabin on the Nièvre and told not to stir out of it; nor was I allowed to communicate with anybody. The admiral did his best to persuade people he was courteous and kind to Mrs. Shaw, but it is quite untrue. He acted toward her with extreme harshness, and, as you know, did not even permit her to see me or to know why I had been arrested." A claim for indemnity has been made by the British Government on Mr. Shaw's behalf, but the French press urge the government to reject it.

The Prospects in Madagascar for Christian missions, though not yet of a decisive character, are hopeful. The new queen, Ranavalona III., will retain the prime minister of her predecessor in power. By a very curious law of the island the prime minister must be the husband of the queen, so the two have been married in accordance therewith. It is too early for any very accurate opinion to be formed as to the character of the rule which will be exercised by the new queen, but the fact of power remaining in the hands of the same statesmen who guided the former one, augurs well for a continuance of her enlightened policy.

Renewed Anti-Jewish Riots have Occurred in Hungary and Russia. A despatch from Pesth states in the Veszprim district, West Hungary, several houses occupied by Jews in two villages were burned to the ground. Several of the persons engaged in the excesses were arrested. At Nowomoskowsk, in the Russian province of Jekaterinoslav, only a synagogue and three Jewish houses escaped demolition, and two hundred families were rendered homeless. Order was restored after five rioters had been killed and thirty arrested. The trouble originated in the discovery that a Russian church had been plundered, which act was attributed to the Jews.

An Indirect Testimony to the Success of the Blue Ribbon Gospel Army in Great Britain is furnished by the Hardware Journal, a trade organ published in Birmingham, the metropolis of the hardware trade. It states that there are some local industries on which the exertions of "The Army," and the consequent change in the drinking habits of the people are producing something like a revolution. For example, there is a great falling off in the sale of pewter drinking cups and the metal measures used in the saloons, which at one time formed a conspicuous item in Birmingham's minor products. There is hardly a tithe of the trade being done in them compared with a few years back.

The Prophetic News for September Contains articles on The Rulership of the Millennial Kingdom, by a Resident of Jerusalem; Biblical Hailstorms—Past and Present, by Rev. E. J. Hytche; The Second Advent and its Glorious Epiphany, etc., etc. Also a summary of Passing Events from a prophetic point of view, and extracts from the Jewish press. Price six cents. Annual subscription seventy cents. Back numbers of this periodical for this year may be had at the same price, from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, N. Y.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

A STRANGELY fascinating book has recently appeared, entitled "Among the Mongols." It narrates the experiences of the author in a land of which Western nations know but little. The character and topography of the country, the manners and customs of the people had never been fully described in books of travel, for Mongolia is not an attractive place for the tourist who travels for pleasure. Recently, however, Mr. J. Gilmour who is a missionary in China, was moved to visit the land. He did so, preaching the Gospel as he had opportunity, and on his return to his sphere of labor in China he produced this book in the hope that when Christians at home were informed by an eye-witness how deep is the spiritual darkness resting upon Mongolia, some attempt might be made to carry there the glad news of the Light of the World. This week THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives on its first page a portrait of this intrepid explorer with pictures of some of the incidents of his journey. The following narrative, derived from his book, will explain the pictures:

Mongolia is a large and densely populated country on the extreme north of the Chinese Empire. The Mongol tribes wander over the Eastern portion of the plateau of Central Asia which lies between Siberia on the north, and China on the south. The Mongols are the ancient parent stock from which sprang the Chinese, the Scythians of early Greek history, the Huns of Roman history and the Tartars and Turks. Another branch founded the median empire in Lower Chaldæa, which flourished and decayed nearly five thousand years ago, and extended over the whole of Northern Asia, and over Russia in Europe. To day they are a poor nomadic race with a religion partly derived from the writings of Buddha, partly from Confucius, with a large admixture of heathenish superstition. It was to this people that a few years ago Mr. Gilmour went, determined to find out how they lived, what they knew, and what they believed.

SETTING OUT.

The caravan with which Mr. Gilmour travelled, left Kalgan, a town on the north frontier of China, for Kiachta, on the south frontier of Russia, a distance of about 840 miles. The party consisted of a Russian postmaster, with his wife, four children, and a soldier—who spoke of his master as the "commandant," returning to his native Siberia—and four or five Mongols, whose function it was to manage the camels and camel-carts.

Having proceeded about four hundred miles, Mr. Gilmour woke up one night feeling, as he himself describes it, "involved in a kind of chaos." He says: "My cart had upset, and I was mixed up under most of the things that were inside. It took me some time to scramble out, and when I succeeded I found the Russian soldier making a vigorous assault on the Mongol by whose carelessness the accident had happened. (See frontispiece.) Seeing the 'commandant' coming up to reinforce his subordinate, I hastened to interpose, and found I was none too soon, for the Mongol had proved no match for the Russian, and had already been severely handled."

IN A MONGOL TENT.

When Kiachta was at last reached, the whole caravan drew up in front of the white church of the town, and the Russian travellers entered to pay their devotions. But Mr. Gilmour was anxious, above all things, to gain a thorough knowledge of the Mongolian language, and he was unable to gain that knowledge outside of Mongolia. After remaining, therefore, a few months at Kiachta, he crossed the frontier into Mongolia and sought the tent of a lama, or priest, whose acquaintance he had made some time before. He told him the object of his visit was to live in his tent, and learn Mongolian from him. The lama was quite willing, his main difficulty being that his tent was a poor one; he was afraid that Mr. Gilmour would freeze, and that nothing better could be furnished him than Mongol fare, which he was afraid would not be relished. "In reply to his question, 'when I would begin,'" says Mr. Gilmour, "I said, 'At once,' and receiving his assent, I felt that I was established as an inmate of a Mongol tent."

A MONGOL TENT ON FIRE.

One night, when a strange lama, on a visit, was talking to the missionary about Christianity, Mr. Gilmour was alarmed by noticing as he looked upward that the tent was on fire. He called out, pointing as he did so to a burning spot, and in a moment the whole tent was in an uproar. Following the direction indicated by his hand, the "household" looked up and saw that a spark had ignited the roof, and spreading over the soot-covered felt, had made a glowing patch as large as a man's hand.

Unfortunately, all the Mongols present were short of stature, and though the tent was not a high one, none of them could reach the burning spot, which, beside being in the highest part of the tent, was directly over the blazing fire. Several attempts at extinguishing it had been ineffectual, the glowing patch was rapidly spreading, and the excitement in the tent every moment increasing, when the lama guest in the confusion seized a ladle and began to dash water on the sooty roof. (See frontispiece.) For the most part, he missed his aim, and the inky water descending in a shower, drove everybody else off the field, and sent them cowering into the sides of the tent, uttering shouts of protestation, and vainly endeavoring to protect their clothes. The burning soot was finally scraped down with a stick, and the smouldering felt extinguished.

Mr. Gilmour's assiduity soon conquered so much of the Mongol language as would enable him to travel around without much embarrassment, and he therefore bade adieu to his entertainer, and set our on a tour on Lake Baikal. This lake is held in great veneration by the Russians of Siberia, who ascribe to it something of a sacred character, speaking of it as the Holy Sea. The traveller congratulates himself on having seen this lake under a furious snowstorm. It was mid-winter, and the journey was performed in a sleigh on the frozen surface. "At the first station on the lake," writes Mr. Gilmour, "we had seen a Russian and his wife start out on a sleigh some little time before us, and by avoiding all delay on the way, and using all expedition at the second station, we got off in our sleigh at no great distance behind them.

A SLEIGH RACE IN A SNOWSTORM.

"The horses warmed to their work, and with blood thoroughly up, seemed to enter into the spirit of the contest as heartily as their drivers. The pace was already furious, and the final effort was about to be made, when one of our number uttered an exclamation, and looking back we saw the sleigh, upon which we had gained and was now behind us, upset, and had scattered the Russian, his wife, and their belongings over the frozen and snowy surface of the deep. (See centre panel of frontispiece.) Happily no one was hurt, but the race was over, and soon after we reached the post-house, the Russian entered, smiling at his misfortune and defeat."

A NIGHT JOURNEY.

At a later stage of his tour, Mr. Gilmour being at Urga, was desirous of crossing the desert to Kalgan, a distance of about six hundred miles. Having engaged horses and a guide, with the stipulation that tents were to be provided for sleeping at night, the journey began. "We rode on till about eleven o'clock, when suddenly my guide's horse left the road, and began to travel in a circle. A little after we came to a knoll near which was some good grass. Here I was called upon to dismount, the saddles were taken off, the horses tethered, and thus, sheltered from the north wind, we were to sleep out on the wild."

MIRAGE IN SLUMBER.

A hungry man, it is said, dreams of feasts; Mr. Gilmour was a cold man that night, and his dream was of a nice warm bedroom with a good bed and a cheery fire. So real was the vision that he awoke saying, "If I had only had this some time ago coming from Urga!" He looked about and saw the dim horizon over the distant mountains, heard the horses grazing near, listened to the snoring of the Mongol, and realized that he was out on the desert.

"When daylight came," remarks Mr. Gilmour, "we caught our horses and started, but had gone only a very short distance when my horse's feet began to sink at every step into the earth, and as we were going at a smart pace and down-hill, he was unable to recover himself. For some yards he staggered along and then came down, throwing me (see frontispiece) on my head with a shock that was all the more painful on account of the chill and stiff state I was in, from sleeping on the frozen ground the previous night."

A LAMA'S STUDY OF THE GOSPEL.

One night during the journey to Kalgan, our traveller stopped at the tent of a Mongolian lama, who asked many questions about Christ and His religion, thus giving an opportunity for explaining to him and to all in the tent the way of salvation through Him who died for sinners. The time for sleep came, and Mr. Gilmour being exceedingly weary, rolled himself up in a sheep-skin blanket, and was soon wrapped in unconscious and refreshing slumber. Presently he woke up, and there, sitting by the fire, he saw the lama reading slowly away at the Gospel, which had been given him a few hours before. And thus he continued to read the whole night through.

In the morning, while drinking tea, the lama asked his guest why the Gospel was called the "Joyful News." "The reason," says Mr. Gilmour, "I told him, was that all men are sinful. This he admitted at once. I then reminded him of how the Mongol sought to wipe away sin, and escape hell, by penances, pilgrimages, fastings, offerings, and other difficult works. Now this book says that when a man wants to get rid of sin, he has only to look to Christ, and his sin clears away. Is not the Book then rightly named 'Joyful News?' He at once assented, got up, expressed many friendly wishes, and made me promise that if I came back that way I would call on him."

A CONDEMNED CRIMINAL IN A CAGE.

About 150 miles from Kalgan, is a great Mongolian trading settlement called Dolon Nor, or as the Chinese call it, Lama Miao. It is a famous market for horses and oxen. In this place Mr. Gilmour witnessed a horrible spectacle, that of a man being slowly and deliberately put to death by being starved in a cage. Near one end of the main street, and forming one of the boundaries of an open space used as a market, is a great wall forming the screen in front of the Government office. "As we passed with our caravan," observes the missionary, "we noticed a crowd collected there, and found that the object of interest to the spectators was a man, said to be a robber, who was fixed into a cage in such a way that only his head protruded. (See frontispiece.) The frame fitted closely to his neck, and the cage being too low for him to stand up in, and too high for him to sit down in, he had to maintain a kind of half-crouching, half-kneeling posture, which must have been very painful. We learned that being condemned to death, he was fixed in that cage, and was to remain there until death terminated his sufferings.

The fourth day of his torture terminated the Breakfast, because I had no food of any kind in the house. After the breakfast was over I waited to hear the singing and preaching. God blessed them to my soul. I became a Christian that morning, and haven't tasted a drop of drink since, nor do I want to do so. It was a capital breakfast, sir; but I now have unfailing spiritual food, and all I need in Christ.'"

A Committee in the "Dumps."—Mr. McLachlan told the meeting that he went to a strange town to preach at a series of revival meetings which were to be held there. On the Saturday morning on which he arrived, he found the committee in very low spirits, because one of the ministers was ill, and the other had gone to another parish to help at a Communion. He cheered them with the words, "I don't know that God has died since I left Glasgow; send round the bellman and call a meeting of Christians to entreat God's blessing on our work." Within ten days the largest hall in the place was filled every night, and the power of God was surprisingly manifested in the conversion of souls to Christ. Learn to look up. "Nothing is impossible with God," and "Everything is possible to him that believeth."

A Drunken Carter's Death.—Mr. Jack Said: "I was much grieved on my way to a meeting this week to hear of the death of a drunken carter. One wet night he went from grog shop to grog shop till he was saturated with whiskey inside, and with rain outside. Inflammation ensued, terminating in death. Within a few yards of his house was the Manse; every day Christian workers passed his house, yet none knew of his sickness. I asked an elder, 'Why didn't you visit him?' 'I never heard of his sickness,' was the answer. 'Besides, he was an irreclaimable drunkard; it was of no use to visit him.' It is a shame to our Christianity that any man or woman should die without a word of warning or exhortation, no matter how bad his life may have been. May God make us ready to render any service, however hard, or apparently hopeless! 'God giveth the increase.'"

The Way to Let God in.—The Rev. Mr. Torrance said: "Two persons were in a room together, and one asked the other, 'Suppose God were in this room, and that you could see Him with your eyes, what would you do?' His friend at once replied, 'I would fall down at His feet, and say, "O God, save me."' 'Well, God is in this room now, and although He is not visible to your eye, yet if you open your heart to Him, His Spirit will so fill you that you will know that He is actually present.' 'I want to open my heart to Him, but I don't know how,' was the sad response. 'Are you willing to let Him in?' he was asked. 'Yes.' 'Then do what is usually done when you desire any one to enter your house—bid Him to come in; tell Him that you desire His presence to be with you to all eternity.' In simple faith the man did so, and was not long before he experienced the pleasure of knowing Jesus as his Saviour."

A Servant-Girl's Sorrow.—"On My Way from Dumbarton to Alexandria a striking incident was recalled to my mind. A servant-girl arranged with a companion to attend a lecture on the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' one Sabbath evening. They were too late for it, and instead went into an evangelistic meeting, where the Word spoken convicted her of sin. In the after-meeting she was kindly aided by the missionary in her efforts to find Christ, but all remained dark to her. At last he closed his Bible, thinking it useless to speak longer; but in anguish of spirit the girl cried out in a voice which rang through the hall. 'Oh, what shall I do? What shall I do?' The Bible was opened again, and with the Divine blessing, light banished the darkness at last, and she rejoiced in a living Saviour. Shortly afterward she went to visit her brother in Alexandria, and while out walking with him, he began to talk in a light, foolish way, which went to her heart. Bursting into tears, she said, 'John, I've given my heart to the Saviour, an' canna stand that nonsense noo.' John was struck with her statement, and after conversing a little longer upon the subject, she had the privilege of leading him to Jesus. He started a meeting which has been blessed to many souls, and it is still continued."

BIBLICAL HAIL-STORMS—PAST AND FUTURE.

By Rev. E. J. Hytche.

PRESERVATION DURING TROUBLOUS TIMES.

THIS is not the first glimpse we have of such a faithful remnant among the Jews; for the Holy Spirit, by the pen of Hosea, said, upward of 2600 years ago (Hosea 2 : 14): "I will allure her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably to her." Now, if this elect remnant were exposed to the prophetic hailstorms and the other material plagues which will decimate the Gentile nations, the promise of being regarded with friendship, and so be protected by God would scarcely be an accurate description of their condition. Hence we are warranted in inferring that, just as God will secure their escape from Jerusalem miraculously, so He will preserve them from those physical scourges which will tell unmistakably that the "times of the Gentiles" are about to close forever.

A TERRIBLE MODERN FALSEHOOD.

All these facts fully prove that He who created the physical laws has not surrendered their control; and that He can suspend their action if He so will. Of all modern lies, whether philosophic or scientist, the most terrible is this; that the Most High—if, indeed, there be any God, which many doubt!—does nothing, and, in fact, cannot do anything, to control physical nature, seeing that He is chained by His own laws. Well, then, may the Edinburgh Review of April ult., p. 320, in a remarkable article on "The Persecution of the Jews," say: "Without a belief in the providential rule of the world, not only are all creeds but empty forms, but our struggle for the true and the just is as beating the air. The Hebrew Scriptures—especially the Psalter—declare, with the most earnest insistance, the care of the Almighty, not only for the type, but for the single life, and for all the needs of the human soul."

A PRAYER IMPLYING A PROMISE.

When giving this summary of the lurid events which are to close this dispensation, our Lord taught a prayer which implies a gracious promise for all true believers—namely (Luke 21 : 36): "Pray always, that ye may be counted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man" in a posture of acceptance, and so of safety. That there will be such who will be so secured, and that by translation, we learn from the promise given to the Church in Philadelphia (Rev. 3 : 10): "Because thou hast kept the word of My patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of trial (literal) which shall come upon all the world to try them that dwell upon the earth." But how? Let Isaiah and John solve this enigma. Thus the first prophet says, somewhat indefinitely (26 : 20–21): "Come, my people, enter thou into thy closet, and shut thy doors about thee—hide thyself, as it were, for a little moment—until the indignation be overpast; for, behold, Jehovah cometh out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity." The seer of Patmos is more specific as to this rapture of the saints prior to the full reign of Antichrist, for he says of the then existing Church (Rev. 12 : 5): "She brought forth a Man-Child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron; and her child was caught up unto God, and to His throne."

THE "FIRST-FRUITS" AND "REMNANTS."

But to these first-fruits will be afterward added the Jewish and Gentile remnants who are led by the exhortations of Elijah, as well as by the physical plagues, to surrender themselves to God. For though we read that the bulk of men, when the last great earthquake comes (Rev. 16 : 20, 21), with the accompanying hailstorms, will only blaspheme God, yet we also learn (Rev. 11 : 13) that "the remnant were affrighted, and gave glory to the God of heaven." It would thus seem that these physical plagues will serve to aid the angelic messengers in their preachings against Antichrist, and thus to form that great company who, faithful even unto death, "will come out of all nations, and kindreds, and tongues, of the tribulation—the great one"—as victors.

WHO THE GREAT MULTITUDE COMPRISES.

This great multitude will apparently consist of two classes:

First.—Those "foolish virgins," who, for their worldliness, are left behind, at the rapture of the Church, to undergo the horrors of the reign of Antichrist. Such members of the Church of Laodicea unhappily, even now, throng every Christian community; and thus there are professed ministers of Christ who are not ashamed to advocate dancing, card-playing, and theatres; going, in fact, so far into apostasy as to institute "a Church-and-Stage Guild." What, then, can such persons expect but either to be "vomited out of Christ's mouth" altogether, or to be left to reap as they have sown for and with the world? Happily, those of this class who are true, though unfaithful, Christians, will be ultimately saved (1 Cor. 3 : 15), but only "as through fire."

THE GOSPEL IN ITS LAST FORM.

Second.—There is a class—mostly *ex*ternal to the revived Roman Empire—who will also be saved after the rapture of the Church and the great tribulation commences its ravages, and that through the ministry of angels; for we read that (Rev. 14 : 6–9) an angel will "fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach." And what is that Gospel? Apparently not the Gospel in its present, but in its last form—namely to "fear God, and give glory to Him; for the hour of His judgment is come; and worship Him that made heaven and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters." It is to this special message, I think, that our Lord also referred when He foretold (Matt. 24 : 14) that "the (τῆς) Gospel of the Kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness, and then shall the end come."

RESULTS OF THE SUPERNATURAL MESSAGE.

That this supernatural message—combined, as it will be, with earthquakes, hailstorms, and other awful physical phenomena—will be most potent in its influence, there can be no doubt. For countless myriads, both within and outside the revived Roman empire, will refuse to worship the great Autocrat, or His image, and, as a penalty, will be guillotined. (See Rev. 13 : 15, and ib. 20 : 4.) The number, indeed, of those who will be thus faithful to God amid the general delusion and fiery persecution of Antichrist, will be so great that "no man will be able to number them." Sealing their loyalty with their blood, they will form a conspicuous element in the first resurrection, and so reign with Christ for one thousand years. Thus, in spite of the strenuous efforts of Antichrist and his ten allied kings to crush God's elect remnant, they will only succeed in adding a vast multitude to the saints of the first resurrection. Hence, in a higher and nobler sense (Judges 15 : 14): "Out of the Eater will come meat, and out of the Strong will come forth sweetness."

Well, then, might the most heroic of the apostles, when, by inspiration, he foretold the apostasy and excision of Gentile Christendom, and the consequent re-grafting of his kinsmen, exclaim, in holy rapture (Rom. 11 : 33–36): "Oh, the depth both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His counsels, and His ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been His counsellor? For of Him and through Him, and to Him are all things!" May Divine grace constrain every reader to say "Amen" to this prophetic doxology; and for this, if for no other reason—that they may not incur the curse pronounced on those worldly Gentile Christians who, in their pride and folly, are not ashamed to "boast over the natural branches."

A STRANGELY fascinating book has recently appeared, entitled "Among the Mongols." It narrates the experiences of the author in a land of which Western nations know but little. The character and topography of the country, the manners and customs of the people had never been fully described in books of travel, for Mongolia is not an attractive place for the tourist who travels for pleasure. Recently, however, Mr. J. Gilmour who is a missionary in China, was moved to visit the land. He did so, preaching the Gospel as he had opportunity, and on his return to his sphere of labor in China he produced this book in the hope that when Christians at home were informed by an eye-witness how deep is the spiritual darkness resting upon Mongolia, some attempt might be made to carry there the glad news of the Light of the World. This week THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives on its first page a portrait of this intrepid explorer with pictures of some of the incidents of his journey. The following narrative, derived from his book, will explain the pictures:

Mongolia is a large and densely populated country on the extreme north of the Chinese Empire. The Mongol tribes wander over the Eastern portion of the plateau of Central Asia which lies between Siberia on the north, and China on the south. The Mongols are the ancient parent stock from which sprang the Chinese, the Scythians of early Greek history, the Huns of Roman history and the Tartars and Turks. Another branch founded the median empire in Lower Chaldæa, which flourished and decayed nearly five thousand years ago, and extended over the whole of Northern Asia, and over Russia in Europe. To day they are a poor nomadic race with a religion partly derived from the writings of Buddha, partly from Confucius, with a large admixture of heathenish superstition. It was to this people that a few years ago Mr. Gilmour went, determined to find out how they lived, what they knew, and what they believed.

SETTING OUT.

The caravan with which Mr. Gilmour travelled, left Kalgan, a town on the north frontier of China, for Kiachta, on the south frontier of Russia, a distance of about 840 miles. The party consisted of a Russian postmaster, with his wife, four children, and a soldier—who spoke of his master as the "commandant," returning to his native Siberia—and four or five Mongols, whose function it was to manage the camels and camel-carts.

Having proceeded about four hundred miles, Mr. Gilmour woke up one night feeling, as he himself describes it, "involved in a kind of chaos." He says: "My cart had upset, and I was mixed up under most of the things that were inside. It took me some time to scramble out, and when I succeeded I found the Russian soldier making a vigorous assault on the Mongol by whose carelessness the accident had happened. (See frontispiece.) Seeing the 'commandant' coming up to reinforce his subordinate, I hastened to interpose, and found I was none too soon, for the Mongol had proved no match for the Russian, and had already been severely handled."

IN A MONGOL TENT.

When Kiachta was at last reached, the whole caravan drew up in front of the white church of the town, and the Russian travellers entered to pay their devotions. But Mr. Gilmour was anxious, above all things, to gain a thorough knowledge of the Mongolian language, and he was unable to gain that knowledge outside of Mongolia. After remaining, therefore, a few months at Kiachta, he crossed the frontier into Mongolia and sought the tent of a lama, or priest, whose acquaintance he had made some time before. He told him the object of his visit was to live in his tent, and learn Mongolian from him. The lama was quite willing, his main difficulty being that his tent was a poor one; he was afraid that Mr. Gilmour would freeze, and that nothing better could be furnished him than Mongol fare, which he was afraid would not be relished. "In reply to his question, 'when I would begin,'" says Mr. Gilmour, "I said, 'At once,' and receiving his assent, I felt that I was established as an inmate of a Mongol tent."

A MONGOL TENT ON FIRE.

One night, when a strange lama, on a visit, was talking to the missionary about Christianity, Mr. Gilmour was alarmed by noticing as he looked upward that the tent was on fire. He called out, pointing as he did so to a burning spot, and in a moment the whole tent was in an uproar. Following the direction indicated by his hand, the "household" looked up and saw that a spark had ignited the roof, and spreading over the soot-covered felt, had made a glowing patch as large as a man's hand.

Unfortunately, all the Mongols present were short of stature, and though the tent was not a high one, none of them could reach the burning spot, which, beside being in the highest part of the tent, was directly over the blazing fire. Several attempts at extinguishing it had been ineffectual, the glowing patch was rapidly spreading, and the excitement in the tent every moment increasing, when the lama guest in the confusion seized a ladle and began to dash water on the sooty roof. (See frontispiece.) For the most part, he missed his aim, and the inky water descending in a shower, drove everybody else off the field, and sent them cowering into the sides of the tent, uttering shouts of protestation, and vainly endeavoring to protect their clothes. The burning soot was finally scraped down with a stick, and the smouldering felt extinguished.

Mr. Gilmour's assiduity soon conquered so much of the Mongol language as would enable him to travel around without much embarrassment, and he therefore bade adieu to his entertainer, and set our on a tour on Lake Baikal. This lake is held in great veneration by the Russians of Siberia, who ascribe to it something of a sacred character, speaking of it as the Holy Sea. The traveller congratulates himself on having seen this lake under a furious snowstorm. It was mid-winter, and the journey was performed in a sleigh on the frozen surface. "At the first station on the lake," writes Mr. Gilmour, "we had seen a Russian and his wife start out on a sleigh some little time before us, and by avoiding all delay on the way, and using all expedition at the second station, we got off in our sleigh at no great distance behind them.

A SLEIGH RACE IN A SNOWSTORM.

"The horses warmed to their work, and with blood thoroughly up, seemed to enter into the spirit of the contest as heartily as their drivers. The pace was already furious, and the final effort was about to be made, when one of our number uttered an exclamation, and looking back we saw the sleigh, upon which we had gained and was now behind us, upset, and had scattered the Russian, his wife, and their belongings over the frozen and snowy surface of the deep. (See centre panel of frontispiece.) Happily no one was hurt, but the race was over, and soon after we reached the post-house, the Russian entered, smiling at his misfortune and defeat."

A NIGHT JOURNEY.

At a later stage of his tour, Mr. Gilmour being at Urga, was desirous of crossing the desert to Kalgan, a distance of about six hundred miles. Having engaged horses and a guide, with the stipulation that tents were to be provided for sleeping at night, the journey began. "We rode on till about eleven o'clock, when suddenly my guide's horse left the road, and began to travel in a circle. A little after we came to a knoll near which was some good grass. Here I was called upon to dismount, the saddles were taken off, the horses tethered, and thus, sheltered from the north wind, we were to sleep out on the wild."

MIRAGE IN SLUMBER.

A hungry man, it is said, dreams of feasts; Mr. Gilmour was a cold man that night, and his dream was of a nice warm bedroom with a good bed and a cheery fire. So real was the vision that he awoke saying, "If I had only had this some time ago coming from Urga!" He looked about and saw the dim horizon over the distant mountains, heard the horses grazing near, listened to the snoring of the Mongol, and realized that he was out on the desert.

"When daylight came," remarks Mr. Gilmour, "we caught our horses and started, but had gone only a very short distance when my horse's feet began to sink at every step into the earth, and as we were going at a smart pace and down-hill, he was unable to recover himself. For some yards he staggered along and then came down, throwing me (see frontispiece) on my head with a shock that was all the more painful on account of the chill and stiff state I was in, from sleeping on the frozen ground the previous night."

A LAMA'S STUDY OF THE GOSPEL.

One night during the journey to Kalgan, our traveller stopped at the tent of a Mongolian lama, who asked many questions about Christ and His religion, thus giving an opportunity for explaining to him and to all in the tent the way of salvation through Him who died for sinners. The time for sleep came, and Mr. Gilmour being exceedingly weary, rolled himself up in a sheep-skin blanket, and was soon wrapped in unconscious and refreshing slumber. Presently he woke up, and there, sitting by the fire, he saw the lama reading slowly away at the Gospel, which had been given him a few hours before. And thus he continued to read the whole night through.

In the morning, while drinking tea, the lama asked his guest why the Gospel was called the "Joyful News." "The reason," says Mr. Gilmour, "I told him, was that all men are sinful. This he admitted at once. I then reminded him of how the Mongol sought to wipe away sin, and escape hell, by penances, pilgrimages, fastings, offerings, and other difficult works. Now this book says that when a man wants to get rid of sin, he has only to look to Christ, and his sin clears away. Is not the Book then rightly named 'Joyful News?' He at once assented, got up, expressed many friendly wishes, and made me promise that if I came back that way I would call on him."

A CONDEMNED CRIMINAL IN A CAGE.

About 150 miles from Kalgan, is a great Mongolian trading settlement called Dolon Nor, or as the Chinese call it, Lama Miao. It is a famous market for horses and oxen. In this place Mr. Gilmour witnessed a horrible spectacle, that of a man being slowly and deliberately put to death by being starved in a cage. Near one end of the main street, and forming one of the boundaries of an open space used as a market, is a great wall forming the screen in front of the Government office. "As we passed with our caravan," observes the missionary, "we noticed a crowd collected there, and found that the object of interest to the spectators was a man, said to be a robber, who was fixed into a cage in such a way that only his head protruded. (See frontispiece.) The frame fitted closely to his neck, and the cage being too low for him to stand up in, and too high for him to sit down in, he had to maintain a kind of half-crouching, half-kneeling posture, which must have been very painful. We learned that being condemned to death, he was fixed in that cage, and was to remain there until death terminated his sufferings.

The fourth day of his torture terminated the Breakfast, because I had no food of any kind in the house. After the breakfast was over I waited to hear the singing and preaching. God blessed them to my soul. I became a Christian that morning, and haven't tasted a drop of drink since, nor do I want to do so. It was a capital breakfast, sir; but I now have unfailing spiritual food, and all I need in Christ.'"

A Committee in the "Dumps."—Mr. McLachlan told the meeting that he went to a strange town to preach at a series of revival meetings which were to be held there. On the Saturday morning on which he arrived, he found the committee in very low spirits, because one of the ministers was ill, and the other had gone to another parish to help at a Communion. He cheered them with the words, "I don't know that God has died since I left Glasgow; send round the bellman and call a meeting of Christians to entreat God's blessing on our work." Within ten days the largest hall in the place was filled every night, and the power of God was surprisingly manifested in the conversion of souls to Christ. Learn to look up. "Nothing is impossible with God," and "Everything is possible to him that believeth."

A Drunken Carter's Death.—Mr. Jack Said: "I was much grieved on my way to a meeting this week to hear of the death of a drunken carter. One wet night he went from grog shop to grog shop till he was saturated with whiskey inside, and with rain outside. Inflammation ensued, terminating in death. Within a few yards of his house was the Manse; every day Christian workers passed his house, yet none knew of his sickness. I asked an elder, 'Why didn't you visit him?' 'I never heard of his sickness,' was the answer. 'Besides, he was an irreclaimable drunkard; it was of no use to visit him.' It is a shame to our Christianity that any man or woman should die without a word of warning or exhortation, no matter how bad his life may have been. May God make us ready to render any service, however hard, or apparently hopeless! 'God giveth the increase.'"

The Way to Let God in.—The Rev. Mr. Torrance said: "Two persons were in a room together, and one asked the other, 'Suppose God were in this room, and that you could see Him with your eyes, what would you do?' His friend at once replied, 'I would fall down at His feet, and say, "O God, save me."' 'Well, God is in this room now, and although He is not visible to your eye, yet if you open your heart to Him, His Spirit will so fill you that you will know that He is actually present.' 'I want to open my heart to Him, but I don't know how,' was the sad response. 'Are you willing to let Him in?' he was asked. 'Yes.' 'Then do what is usually done when you desire any one to enter your house—bid Him to come in; tell Him that you desire His presence to be with you to all eternity.' In simple faith the man did so, and was not long before he experienced the pleasure of knowing Jesus as his Saviour."

A Servant-Girl's Sorrow.—"On My Way from Dumbarton to Alexandria a striking incident was recalled to my mind. A servant-girl arranged with a companion to attend a lecture on the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' one Sabbath evening. They were too late for it, and instead went into an evangelistic meeting, where the Word spoken convicted her of sin. In the after-meeting she was kindly aided by the missionary in her efforts to find Christ, but all remained dark to her. At last he closed his Bible, thinking it useless to speak longer; but in anguish of spirit the girl cried out in a voice which rang through the hall, 'Oh, what shall I do? What shall I do?' The Bible was opened again, and with the Divine blessing, light banished the darkness at last, and she rejoiced in a living Saviour. Shortly afterward she went to visit her brother in Alexandria, and while out walking with him, he began to talk in a light, foolish way, which went to her heart. Bursting into tears, she said, 'John, I've given my heart to the Saviour, an' canna stand that nonsense noo.' John was struck with her statement, and after conversing a little longer upon the subject, she had the privilege of leading him to Jesus. He started a meeting which has been blessed to many souls, and it is still continued."

BIBLICAL HAIL-STORMS—PAST AND FUTURE.

By Rev. E. J. Hytche.

PRESERVATION DURING TROUBLOUS TIMES.

THIS is not the first glimpse we have of such a faithful remnant among the Jews; for the Holy Spirit, by the pen of Hosea, said, upward of 2600 years ago (Hosea 2 : 14): "I will allure her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably to her." Now, if this elect remnant were exposed to the prophetic hailstorms and the other material plagues which will decimate the Gentile nations, the promise of being regarded with friendship, and so be protected by God would scarcely be an accurate description of their condition. Hence we are warranted in inferring that, just as God will secure their escape from Jerusalem miraculously, so He will preserve them from those physical scourges which will tell unmistakably that the "times of the Gentiles" are about to close forever.

A TERRIBLE MODERN FALSEHOOD.

All these facts fully prove that He who created the physical laws has not surrendered their control; and that He can suspend their action if He so will. Of all modern lies, whether philosophic or scientist, the most terrible is this; that the Most High—if, indeed, there be any God, which many doubt!—does nothing, and, in fact, cannot do anything, to control physical nature, seeing that He is chained by His own laws. Well, then, may the Edinburgh Review of April ult., p. 320, in a remarkable article on "The Persecution of the Jews," say: "Without a belief in the providential rule of the world, not only are all creeds but empty forms, but our struggle for the true and the just is as beating the air. The Hebrew Scriptures—especially the Psalter—declare, with the most earnest insistance, the care of the Almighty, not only for the type, but for the single life, and for all the needs of the human soul."

A PRAYER IMPLYING A PROMISE.

When giving this summary of the lurid events which are to close this dispensation, our Lord taught a prayer which implies a gracious promise for all true believers—namely (Luke 21 : 36): "Pray always, that ye may be counted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man" in a posture of acceptance, and so of safety. That there will be such who will be so secured, and that by translation, we learn from the promise given to the Church in Philadelphia (Rev. 3 : 10): "Because thou hast kept the word of My patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of trial (literal) which shall come upon all the world to try them that dwell upon the earth." But how? Let Isaiah and John solve this enigma. Thus the first prophet says, somewhat indefinitely (26 : 20–21): "Come, my people, enter thou into thy closet, and shut thy doors about thee—hide thyself, as it were, for a little moment—until the indignation be overpast; for, behold, Jehovah cometh out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity." The seer of Patmos is more specific as to this rapture of the saints prior to the full reign of Antichrist, for he says of the then existing Church (Rev. 12 : 5): "She brought forth a Man-Child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron; and her child was caught up unto God, and to His throne."

THE "FIRST-FRUITS" AND "REMNANTS."

But to these first-fruits will be afterward added the Jewish and Gentile remnants who are led by the exhortations of Elijah, as well as by the physical plagues, to surrender themselves to God. For though we read that the bulk of men, when the last great earthquake comes (Rev. 16 : 20, 21), with the accompanying hailstorms, will only blaspheme God, yet we also learn (Rev. 11 : 13) that "the remnant were affrighted, and gave glory to the God of heaven." It would thus seem that these physical plagues will serve to aid the angelic messengers in their preachings against Antichrist, and thus to form that great company who, faithful even unto death, "will come out of all nations, and kindreds, and tongues, of the tribulation—the great one"—as victors.

WHO THE GREAT MULTITUDE COMPRISES.

This great multitude will apparently consist of two classes:

First.—Those "foolish virgins," who, for their worldliness, are left behind, at the rapture of the Church, to undergo the horrors of the reign of Antichrist. Such members of the Church of Laodicea unhappily, even now, throng every Christian community; and thus there are professed ministers of Christ who are not ashamed to advocate dancing, card-playing, and theatres; going, in fact, so far into apostasy as to institute "a Church-and-Stage Guild." What, then, can such persons expect but either to be "vomited out of Christ's mouth" altogether, or to be left to reap as they have sown for and with the world? Happily, those of this class who are true, though unfaithful, Christians, will be ultimately saved (1 Cor. 3 : 15), but only "as through fire."

THE GOSPEL IN ITS LAST FORM.

Second.—There is a class—mostly *ex*ternal to the revived Roman Empire—who will also be saved after the rapture of the Church and the great tribulation commences its ravages, and that through the ministry of angels; for we read that (Rev. 14 : 6–9) an angel will "fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach." And what is that Gospel? Apparently not the Gospel in its present, but in its last form—namely to "fear God, and give glory to Him; for the hour of His judgment is come; and worship Him that made heaven and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters." It is to this special message, I think, that our Lord also referred when He foretold (Matt. 24 : 14) that "the (τῆς) Gospel of the Kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness, and then shall the end come."

RESULTS OF THE SUPERNATURAL MESSAGE.

That this supernatural message—combined, as it will be, with earthquakes, hailstorms, and other awful physical phenomena—will be most potent in its influence, there can be no doubt. For countless myriads, both within and outside the revived Roman empire, will refuse to worship the great Autocrat, or His image, and, as a penalty, will be guillotined. (See Rev. 13 : 15, and ib. 20 : 4.) The number, indeed, of those who will be thus faithful to God amid the general delusion and fiery persecution of Antichrist, will be so great that "no man will be able to number them." Sealing their loyalty with their blood, they will form a conspicuous element in the first resurrection, and so reign with Christ for one thousand years. Thus, in spite of the strenuous efforts of Antichrist and his ten allied kings to crush God's elect remnant, they will only succeed in adding a vast multitude to the saints of the first resurrection. Hence, in a higher and nobler sense (Judges 15 : 14): "Out of the Eater will come meat, and out of the Strong will come forth sweetness."

Well, then, might the most heroic of the apostles, when, by inspiration, he foretold the apostasy and excision of Gentile Christendom, and the consequent re-grafting of his kinsmen, exclaim, in holy rapture (Rom. 11 : 33–36): "Oh, the depth both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His counsels, and His ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been His counsellor? For of Him and through Him, and to Him are all things!" May Divine grace constrain every reader to say "Amen" to this prophetic doxology; and for this, if for no other reason—that they may not incur the curse pronounced on those worldly Gentile Christians who, in their pride and folly, are not ashamed to "boast over the natural branches."

A STRANGELY fascinating book has recently appeared, entitled "Among the Mongols." It narrates the experiences of the author in a land of which Western nations know but little. The character and topography of the country, the manners and customs of the people had never been fully described in books of travel, for Mongolia is not an attractive place for the tourist who travels for pleasure. Recently, however, Mr. J. Gilmour who is a missionary in China, was moved to visit the land. He did so, preaching the Gospel as he had opportunity, and on his return to his sphere of labor in China he produced this book in the hope that when Christians at home were informed by an eye-witness how deep is the spiritual darkness resting upon Mongolia, some attempt might be made to carry there the glad news of the Light of the World. This week THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives on its first page a portrait of this intrepid explorer with pictures of some of the incidents of his journey. The following narrative, derived from his book, will explain the pictures:

Mongolia is a large and densely populated country on the extreme north of the Chinese Empire. The Mongol tribes wander over the Eastern portion of the plateau of Central Asia which lies between Siberia on the north, and China on the south. The Mongols are the ancient parent stock from which sprang the Chinese, the Scythians of early Greek history, the Huns of Roman history and the Tartars and Turks. Another branch founded the median empire in Lower Chaldæa, which flourished and decayed nearly five thousand years ago, and extended over the whole of Northern Asia, and over Russia in Europe. He says: "My cart had upset, and I was mixed up under most of the things that were inside. It took me some time to scramble out, and when I succeeded I found the Russian soldier making a vigorous assault on the Mongol by whose carelessness the accident had happened. (See frontispiece.) Seeing the 'commandant' coming up to reinforce his subordinate, I hastened to interpose, and found I was none too soon, for the Mongol had proved no match for the Russian, and had already been severely handled."

IN A MONGOL TENT.

When Kiachta was at last reached, the whole caravan drew up in front of the white church of the town, and the Russian travellers entered to pay their devotions. But Mr. Gilmour was anxious, above all things, to gain a thorough knowledge of the Mongolian language, and he was unable to gain that knowledge outside of Mongolia. "In reply to his question, 'when I would begin,'" says Mr. Gilmour, "I said, 'At once,' and receiving his assent, I felt that I was established as an inmate of a Mongol tent."

A MONGOL TENT ON FIRE.

One night, when a strange lama, on a visit, was talking to the missionary about Christianity, Mr. Gilmour was alarmed by noticing as he looked upward that the tent was on fire. He called out, pointing as he did so to a burning spot, and in a moment the whole tent was in an uproar. Following the direction indicated by his hand, the "household" looked up and saw that a spark had ignited the roof, and spreading over the soot-covered felt, had made a glowing patch as large as a man's hand.

Unfortunately, all the Mongols present were short of stature, and though the tent was not a high one, none of them could reach the burning spot, which, beside being in the highest part of the tent, was directly over the blazing fire. Several attempts at extinguishing it had been ineffectual, the glowing patch was rapidly spreading, and the excitement in the tent every moment increasing, when the lama guest in the confusion seized a ladle and began to dash water on the sooty roof. (See frontispiece.) For the most part, he missed his aim, and the inky water descending in a shower, drove everybody else off the field, and sent them cowering into the sides of the tent, uttering shouts of protestation, and vainly endeavoring to protect their clothes. The burning soot was finally scraped down with a stick, and the smouldering felt extinguished.

Mr. Gilmour's assiduity soon conquered so much of the Mongol language as would enable him to travel around without much embarrassment, and he therefore bade adieu to his entertainer, and set our on a tour on Lake Baikal. This lake is held in great veneration by the Russians of Siberia, who ascribe to it something of a sacred character, speaking of it as the Holy Sea. The traveller congratulates himself on having seen this lake under a furious snowstorm. It was mid-winter, and the journey was performed in a sleigh on the frozen surface. "At the first station on the lake," writes Mr. Gilmour, "we had seen a Russian and his wife start out on a sleigh some little time before us, and by avoiding all delay on the way, and using all expedition at the second station, we got off in our sleigh at no great distance behind them.

A SLEIGH RACE IN A SNOWSTORM.

"The horses warmed to their work, and with blood thoroughly up, seemed to enter into the spirit of the contest as heartily as their drivers. The pace was already furious, and the final effort was about to be made, when one of our number uttered an exclamation, and looking back we saw the sleigh, upon which we had gained and was now behind us, upset, and had scattered the Russian, his wife, and their belongings over the frozen and snowy surface of the deep. (See centre panel of frontispiece.) Happily no one was hurt, but the race was over, and soon after we reached the post-house, the Russian entered, smiling at his misfortune and defeat."

A NIGHT JOURNEY.

At a later stage of his tour, Mr. Gilmour being at Urga, was desirous of crossing the desert to Kalgan, a distance of about six hundred miles. Having engaged horses and a guide, with the stipulation that tents were to be provided for sleeping at night, the journey began. "We rode on till about eleven o'clock, when suddenly my guide's horse left the road, and began to travel in a circle. A little after we came to a knoll near which was some good grass. Here I was called upon to dismount, the saddles were taken off, the horses tethered, and thus, sheltered from the north wind, we were to sleep out on the wild."

MIRAGE IN SLUMBER.

A hungry man, it is said, dreams of feasts; Mr. Gilmour was a cold man that night, and his dream was of a nice warm bedroom with a good bed and a cheery fire. So real was the vision that he awoke saying, "If I had only had this some time ago coming from Urga!" He looked about and saw the dim horizon over the distant mountains, heard the horses grazing near, listened to the snoring of the Mongol, and realized that he was out on the desert.

"When daylight came," remarks Mr. Gilmour, "we caught our horses and started, but had gone only a very short distance when my horse's feet began to sink at every step into the earth, and as we were going at a smart pace and down-hill, he was unable to recover himself. For some yards he staggered along and then came down, throwing me (see frontispiece) on my head with a shock that was all the more painful on account of the chill and stiff state I was in, from sleeping on the frozen ground the previous night."

A LAMA'S STUDY OF THE GOSPEL.

One night during the journey to Kalgan, our traveller stopped at the tent of a Mongolian lama, who asked many questions about Christ and His religion, thus giving an opportunity for explaining to him and to all in the tent the way of salvation through Him who died for sinners. The time for sleep came, and Mr. Gilmour being exceedingly weary, rolled himself up in a sheep-skin blanket, and was soon wrapped in unconscious and refreshing slumber. Presently he woke up, and there, sitting by the fire, he saw the lama reading slowly away at the Gospel, which had been given him a few hours before. And thus he continued to read the whole night through.

In the morning, while drinking tea, the lama asked his guest why the Gospel was called the "Joyful News." "The reason," says Mr. Gilmour, "I told him, was that all men are sinful. This he admitted at once. I then reminded him of how the Mongol sought to wipe away sin, and escape hell, by penances, pilgrimages, fastings, offerings, and other difficult works. Now this book says that when a man wants to get rid of sin, he has only to look to Christ, and his sin clears away. Is not the Book then rightly named 'Joyful News?' He at once assented, got up, expressed many friendly wishes, and made me promise that if I came back that way I would call on him."

A CONDEMNED CRIMINAL IN A CAGE.

About 150 miles from Kalgan, is a great Mongolian trading settlement called Dolon Nor, or as the Chinese call it, Lama Miao. It is a famous market for horses and oxen. In this place Mr. Gilmour witnessed a horrible spectacle, that of a man being slowly and deliberately put to death by being starved in a cage. Near one end of the main street, and forming one of the boundaries of an open space used as a market, is a great wall forming the screen in front of the Government office. "As we passed with our caravan," observes the missionary, "we noticed a crowd collected there, and found that the object of interest to the spectators was a man, said to be a robber, who was fixed into a cage in such a way that only his head protruded. (See frontispiece.) The frame fitted closely to his neck, and the cage being too low for him to stand up in, and too high for him to sit down in, he had to maintain a kind of half-crouching, half-kneeling posture, which must have been very painful. We learned that being condemned to death, he was fixed in that cage, and was to remain there until death terminated his sufferings.

The fourth day of his torture terminated the Breakfast, because I had no food of any kind in the house. After the breakfast was over I waited to hear the singing and preaching. God blessed them to my soul. I became a Christian that morning, and haven't tasted a drop of drink since, nor do I want to do so. It was a capital breakfast, sir; but I now have unfailing spiritual food, and all I need in Christ.'"

A Committee in the "Dumps."—Mr. McLachlan told the meeting that he went to a strange town to preach at a series of revival meetings which were to be held there. On the Saturday morning on which he arrived, he found the committee in very low spirits, because one of the ministers was ill, and the other had gone to another parish to help at a Communion. He cheered them with the words, "I don't know that God has died since I left Glasgow; send round the bellman and call a meeting of Christians to entreat God's blessing on our work." Within ten days the largest hall in the place was filled every night, and the power of God was surprisingly manifested in the conversion of souls to Christ. Learn to look up. "Nothing is impossible with God," and "Everything is possible to him that believeth."

A Drunken Carter's Death.—Mr. Jack Said: "I was much grieved on my way to a meeting this week to hear of the death of a drunken carter. One wet night he went from grog shop to grog shop till he was saturated with whiskey inside, and with rain outside. Inflammation ensued, terminating in death. Within a few yards of his house was the Manse; every day Christian workers passed his house, yet none knew of his sickness. I asked an elder, 'Why didn't you visit him?' 'I never heard of his sickness,' was the answer. 'Besides, he was an irreclaimable drunkard; it was of no use to visit him.' It is a shame to our Christianity that any man or woman should die without a word of warning or exhortation, no matter how bad his life may have been. May God make us ready to render any service, however hard, or apparently hopeless! 'God giveth the increase.'"

The Way to Let God in.—The Rev. Mr. Torrance said: "Two persons were in a room together, and one asked the other, 'Suppose God were in this room, and that you could see Him with your eyes, what would you do?' His friend at once replied, 'I would fall down at His feet, and say, "O God, save me."' 'Well, God is in this room now, and although He is not visible to your eye, yet if you open your heart to Him, His Spirit will so fill you that you will know that He is actually present.' 'I want to open my heart to Him, but I don't know how,' was the sad response. 'Are you willing to let Him in?' he was asked. 'Yes.' 'Then do what is usually done when you desire any one to enter your house—bid Him to come in; tell Him that you desire His presence to be with you to all eternity.' In simple faith the man did so, and was not long before he experienced the pleasure of knowing Jesus as his Saviour."

A Servant-Girl's Sorrow.—"On My Way from Dumbarton to Alexandria a striking incident was recalled to my mind. A servant-girl arranged with a companion to attend a lecture on the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' one Sabbath evening. They were too late for it, and instead went into an evangelistic meeting, where the Word spoken convicted her of sin. In the after-meeting she was kindly aided by the missionary in her efforts to find Christ, but all remained dark to her. At last he closed his Bible, thinking it useless to speak longer; but in anguish of spirit the girl cried out in a voice which rang through the hall, 'Oh, what shall I do? What shall I do?' The Bible was opened again, and with the Divine blessing, light banished the darkness at last, and she rejoiced in a living Saviour. Shortly afterward she went to visit her brother in Alexandria, and while out walking with him, he began to talk in a light, foolish way, which went to her heart. Bursting into tears, she said, 'John, I've given my heart to the Saviour, an' canna stand that nonsense noo.' John was struck with her statement, and after conversing a little longer upon the subject, she had the privilege of leading him to Jesus. He started a meeting which has been blessed to many souls, and it is still continued."

BIBLICAL HAIL-STORMS—PAST AND FUTURE.

By Rev. E. J. Hytche.

PRESERVATION DURING TROUBLOUS TIMES.

THIS is not the first glimpse we have of such a faithful remnant among the Jews; for the Holy Spirit, by the pen of Hosea, said, upward of 2600 years ago (Hosea 2 : 14): "I will allure her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably to her." Now, if this elect remnant were exposed to the prophetic hailstorms and the other material plagues which will decimate the Gentile nations, the promise of being regarded with friendship, and so be protected by God would scarcely be an accurate description of their condition. Hence we are warranted in inferring that, just as God will secure their escape from Jerusalem miraculously, so He will preserve them from those physical scourges which will tell unmistakably that the "times of the Gentiles" are about to close forever.

A TERRIBLE MODERN FALSEHOOD.

All these facts fully prove that He who created the physical laws has not surrendered their control; and that He can suspend their action if He so will. Of all modern lies, whether philosophic or scientist, the most terrible is this; that the Most High—if, indeed, there be any God, which many doubt!—does nothing, and, in fact, cannot do anything, to control physical nature, seeing that He is chained by His own laws. Well, then, may the Edinburgh Review of April ult., p. 320, in a remarkable article on "The Persecution of the Jews," say: "Without a belief in the providential rule of the world, not only are all creeds but empty forms, but our struggle for the true and the just is as beating the air. The Hebrew Scriptures—especially the Psalter—declare, with the most earnest insistance, the care of the Almighty, not only for the type, but for the single life, and for all the needs of the human soul."

A PRAYER IMPLYING A PROMISE.

When giving this summary of the lurid events which are to close this dispensation, our Lord taught a prayer which implies a gracious promise for all true believers—namely (Luke 21 : 36): "Pray always, that ye may be counted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man" in a posture of acceptance, and so of safety. That there will be such who will be so secured, and that by translation, we learn from the promise given to the Church in Philadelphia (Rev. 3 : 10): "Because thou hast kept the word of My patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of trial (literal) which shall come upon all the world to try them that dwell upon the earth." But how? Let Isaiah and John solve this enigma. Thus the first prophet says, somewhat indefinitely (26 : 20–21): "Come, my people, enter thou into thy closet, and shut thy doors about thee—hide thyself, as it were, for a little moment—until the indignation be overpast; for, behold, Jehovah cometh out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity." The seer of Patmos is more specific as to this rapture of the saints prior to the full reign of Antichrist, for he says of the then existing Church (Rev. 12 : 5): "She brought forth a Man-Child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron; and her child was caught up unto God, and to His throne."

THE "FIRST-FRUITS" AND "REMNANTS."

But to these first-fruits will be afterward added the Jewish and Gentile remnants who are led by the exhortations of Elijah, as well as by the physical plagues, to surrender themselves to God. For though we read that the bulk of men, when the last great earthquake comes (Rev. 16 : 20, 21), with the accompanying hailstorms, will only blaspheme God, yet we also learn (Rev. 11 : 13) that "the remnant were affrighted, and gave glory to the God of heaven." It would thus seem that these physical plagues will serve to aid the angelic messengers in their preachings against Antichrist, and thus to form that great company who, faithful even unto death, "will come out of all nations, and kindreds, and tongues, of the tribulation—the great one"—as victors.

WHO THE GREAT MULTITUDE COMPRISES.

This great multitude will apparently consist of two classes:

First.—Those "foolish virgins," who, for their worldliness, are left behind, at the rapture of the Church, to undergo the horrors of the reign of Antichrist. Such members of the Church of Laodicea unhappily, even now, throng every Christian community; and thus there are professed ministers of Christ who are not ashamed to advocate dancing, card-playing, and theatres; going, in fact, so far into apostasy as to institute "a Church-and-Stage Guild." What, then, can such persons expect but either to be "vomited out of Christ's mouth" altogether, or to be left to reap as they have sown for and with the world? Happily, those of this class who are true, though unfaithful, Christians, will be ultimately saved (1 Cor. 3 : 15), but only "as through fire."

THE GOSPEL IN ITS LAST FORM.

Second.—There is a class—mostly *ex*ternal to the revived Roman Empire—who will also be saved after the rapture of the Church and the great tribulation commences its ravages, and that through the ministry of angels; for we read that (Rev. 14 : 6–9) an angel will "fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach." And what is that Gospel? Apparently not the Gospel in its present, but in its last form—namely to "fear God, and give glory to Him; for the hour of His judgment is come; and worship Him that made heaven and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters." It is to this special message, I think, that our Lord also referred when He foretold (Matt. 24 : 14) that "the (τῆς) Gospel of the Kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness, and then shall the end come."

RESULTS OF THE SUPERNATURAL MESSAGE.

That this supernatural message—combined, as it will be, with earthquakes, hailstorms, and other awful physical phenomena—will be most potent in its influence, there can be no doubt. For countless myriads, both within and outside the revived Roman empire, will refuse to worship the great Autocrat, or His image, and, as a penalty, will be guillotined. (See Rev. 13 : 15, and ib. 20 : 4.) The number, indeed, of those who will be thus faithful to God amid the general delusion and fiery persecution of Antichrist, will be so great that "no man will be able to number them." Sealing their loyalty with their blood, they will form a conspicuous element in the first resurrection, and so reign with Christ for one thousand years. Thus, in spite of the strenuous efforts of Antichrist and his ten allied kings to crush God's elect remnant, they will only succeed in adding a vast multitude to the saints of the first resurrection. Hence, in a higher and nobler sense (Judges 15 : 14): "Out of the Eater will come meat, and out of the Strong will come forth sweetness."

Well, then, might the most heroic of the apostles, when, by inspiration, he foretold the apostasy and excision of Gentile Christendom, and the consequent re-grafting of his kinsmen, exclaim, in holy rapture (Rom. 11 : 33–36): "Oh, the depth both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His counsels, and His ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been His counsellor? For of Him and through Him, and to Him are all things!" May Divine grace constrain every reader to say "Amen" to this prophetic doxology; and for this, if for no other reason—that they may not incur the curse pronounced on those worldly Gentile Christians who, in their pride and folly, are not ashamed to "boast over the natural branches."

CURRENT EVENTS.

Recent Legislation Affecting the National finances left the public to a large extent in doubt as to the extent of its influence. It has now been in operation three months, therefore the following figures issued by the government will have unusual interest: During the three months ended September 30th, 1882, the receipts from customs amounted to $66,729,149, while for the corresponding quarter of this year the receipts were $57,281,965, or a falling off of $9,447,184 on account of customs. For the same periods the receipts on account of internal taxes were $38,449,961, and $28,912,441, respectively, a decrease of $9,537,520. The receipts from miscellaneous sources for the same periods were $9,869,817 and $7,136,305, respectively, or a falling off of $2,733,512. In round figures the Treasury receipts for the last three months were $19,718,000 less than the receipts for the corresponding quarter of 1882. At this rate for the entire year the falling off, as compared with the revenues of last year, would amount to about $79,000,000. The excess of the receipts over expenditures in the last three months was $15,120,000.

An Attempt to Obtain an Idea of the Policy of the House in the Forty-eighth Congress has been made by a New York journal, which addressed inquiries to every Representative elect. Replies were received from 80 Democrats and 45 Republicans, of which the following is a summary: The re-opening of the tariff question is advocated by 52 Democrats and opposed by 4 and by all the Republicans. The repeal of the compulsory clauses of the Silver Coinage Act is favored by 26 Republicans and 4 Democrats, while it is opposed by 64 Democrats and 4 Republicans. Mr. Carlisle is the preference of 21 of the Democrats who replied, Mr. S. S. Cox of 11, and Mr. Randall of 8. Judging by the tone of Republican replies on the Speakership question, it would appear that if that party could elect the Speaker, Mr. Keifer's course last Congress would prevent his re-election.

The Result of the Elections in Ohio and Iowa is not known at the time THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to press. The campaign has during the past few weeks been waged with vigor by all the temperance societies in the State, especially by the Women's Christian Temperance Union, which arranged to have prayer-meetings held on election day in the chief cities; and in many voting precincts in Ohio they intended to open tents and rooms as near as possible to the voting places and distribute free coffee and temperance ballots. Mr. George A. Hilton, Hon. John B. Finch, Colonel George W. Bain, Mrs. J. Ellen Foster, and Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge have been engaged every day for several weeks past in holding meetings in support of the second amendment.

The Ravages of Yellow Fever in Mexico and in Panama are described in a report to the Surgeon-General. It states that at Mazatlan, Mex., every house is a hospital. It is impossible to keep track of the deaths, which run into the hundreds daily. The inhabitants are fleeing in every direction. Yellow fever has existed in Panama since April, but almost exclusively among the natives. It has recently become more pernicious, and is now spreading widely. It has made its appearance in the below-named Pacific coast cities: San José, Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Acapulco, Zucatula, Manzanillo, Corrientes and San Blas; and is spreading northward. At Guaymas so many are down with the fever that many die from want of attendance. The dead are buried by the cart-load by Indians. At Hermosillo the fever death-rate is about twenty daily.

A Destructive Fire Broke out at Pittsburg, Pa., on October 2d, and burned the whole of the magnificent buildings devoted to the exposition. The fire was first seen at two o'clock in the morning, and in less than half an hour, in spite of the efforts of the Fire Department, the entire building was in flames. All hope was abandoned of saving the buildings, and the Fire Department concentrated its efforts in an attempt to save the adjoining property. The exposition and all it contained was completely destroyed. The actual money loss is stated at one million dollars, but there were many works of art and relics, the value of which cannot be estimated in money, nor can they be replaced. It is a matter for thankfulness that the disaster occurred in the night, as the building has been crowded every day since its opening on September 26th, and only the day before the catastrophe 27,000 people visited the exposition.

The Debts of Archbishop Purcell's Bank have again been before the courts. Application was made to the District Court of Hamilton County, Ohio, for permission to sell ecclesiastical property built by the archbishop with the funds of the bank, and apply the proceeds to reimbursing depositors. The court delivered its decision on October 1st. It decided that the churches were held by the archbishop as trustee, and were not liable any further than it could be shown that he had advanced the money personally. A mortgage on an orphan asylum, given by the archbishop, was declared invalid. Between three and four million dollars deposited in the bank were invested in the building of churches, convents and schoolhouses, and it was this property the depositors sought to attach. The case will be appealed.

The National Council of the Congregational churches of the United States is announced to commence its fifth triennial session at Concord, N. H., this day, October 11th, and is expected to continue until next Monday. Rev. F. A. Noble, D.D., will preach the opening sermon. Among the topics mentioned in the programme for discussion are: Family Religion, Relation of Evangelical Doctrine to Church Work, Increase of Christian Life, More Conversions, Fellowship of the Churches, The Pastoral Relation, etc.

The Protestant Episcopal Convention Assembled in Christ Church, Philadelphia, on October 3d. The galleries were thrown open to the public and were crowded, while large numbers went away unable to obtain admission. Dr. E. E. Beardsley, of New Haven, Conn., was elected President of the House of Deputies. Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, was nominated for the place, but he significantly remarked that he was not a candidate for president for this or any other place, at this or any other time. On Friday the proceedings were suspended to hear an address from Dr. Anthony Thorold, Bishop of Rochester, England, who attended as a deputation from the Church of England. In the course of his remarks he urged the establishment of a mission church in connection with every wealthy church in the country. He also made an earnest appeal on behalf of temperance. He said: "We may have as many free churches as we please, we may open as many free libraries as we please, but as long as the demon of intemperance haunts our homes the churches will be useless, the sermons will be useless, and the efforts of the laymen useless. If you want to earn the eternal gratitude of the masses you will use your energies and prayers in this battle against intemperance." A letter from the Archbishop of Canterbury was then read. It congratulated the convention on the centenary, and expressed fraternal regard.

The Conference of Mormons Held in Salt Lake City on October 5th was the fifty-third conference held there. The speeches proved that the spirit of opposition to the laws of the country had in no respect subsided. Heber J. Grant, one of the new "apostles" appointed last year, zealously advocated polygamy and tithe-paying. He said that after the passage of the Edmunds law polygamists professing to be good Latter Day Saints had put away their wives and sent them to their mothers. He had an utter contempt for such men. He had more respect for Gentiles or Methodists, avowed enemies, than he has for Latter Day Saints frightened by a law passed by Congress. Brigham Young, Jr., said that the powers of darkness were strengthening to overthrow the Church; that there never was a time when they needed the power of the spirit so much, but that no power on earth could overthrow the Saints, and that stronger revelations than those they had received were yet to come. It is evident from both speeches and from others made at the conference that the Mormons intend to continue to defy the laws of the United States, which Young described as "the powers of darkness."

The Days of Universal Prayer for Sunday-schools are October 21st and 22d. The American Sunday-school Union has issued an appeal to teachers and the friends of Sunday-schools for the observance of these two days, a practice which in past years has been attended with blessed results. The Union makes the following recommendations in its programme: On the Lord's day morning, October 21st, from seven to eight o'clock, "Private Intercessory Prayer" on behalf of Sunday-schools; the opening exercises of the morning school to be preceded by a "Meeting of the Teachers" for prayer; in the afternoon the ordinary exercises of each school be shortened, and the scholars unite in a devotional service, interspersed with singing and appropriate addresses; at the close of the afternoon or evening service the teachers, in union with other Christians, meet for thanksgiving and prayer; on Monday morning, October 22d, teachers again bring their scholars, one by one, in private prayer before God; in the evening each church or congregation be invited to hold a meeting, at which the interests of the Sunday-school should form the theme of the prayers and addresses.

Mr. Sankey's Farewell Service in the Hall of Cooper Union on September 30th was crowded, and an overflow meeting was held in Annex Hall. The services were conducted by C. W. Sawyer. After some singing by Mr. and Mrs. Stebbins, Mr. Sankey rose to sing. He said that the services, in connection with Mr. Moody's preaching, would begin in the North of Ireland, where they should stay for two weeks. Then the winter's work would be begun in London. That city had been divided into districts, and two iron tabernacles had been built, which could be moved from place to place in the city. They were of iron, as the city law would not allow the building of structures of that kind in wood. He then sang a new song, of his own composition, entitled "When the Mists Have Rolled Away." Afterward Mr. Sankey went to the Annex Hall and sang there. Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey sailed for Europe on Tuesday in the Alaska, in company with Major Whittle.

Rev. William Taylor, "the California Evangelist," is now laboring in Chili, and reports the promising state of the missions there, especially of the schools. There are about two hundred students in the College of Santiago, one hundred in Concepcion, and churches in several places. Connected with his work in India are forty-seven stationed ministers, fifty-seven local preachers, and over two thousand lay workers, a fourth of whom are Hindoos.

A Woman's Hair was Given to a Prisoner in a San Francisco jail recently to enable him to escape. A certain change in the manner of a notorious burglar caused his jailers to suspect that he was planning an escape from prison. On September 19th they made a sudden descent on his cell, expecting to surprise him in his preparations. At first they detected nothing to confirm their suspicions, but examining the cell more closely, they found attached to the bars of his window a long hair which was joined to others, making a plait long enough to reach to the ground outside. They looked there and found a large quantity of beautiful hair three feet long which the prisoner could draw up at his convenience, and which he had been laboriously twisting into a cord. The hair was of course confiscated, but even the jailers were moved to pity and admire the devotion of the woman who, to aid the man she loved, had sacrificed her tresses. Bad and depraved as he was, she must have loved him devotedly. The wonder is that a woman capable of such an act should have loved a man so wicked. There is greater wonder still and far more cause for amazement in the fact that the pure and holy God should have so loved the world that had rebelled against Him as to give His Son to die for it (John 3 : 16).

An English Lord Travelling in Arkansas complained to a reporter recently of having lost his supper through the stupidity of a colored waiter. He said that while travelling on the cars he was awakened by the negro and asked if he would have supper at Catfish. He said "Yes," and, being unacquainted with American customs, expected the train to stop at Catfish in a few minutes. About half an hour afterward he saw the negro again strolling through the cars and asked him how far it was then to Catfish. "About twenty-five miles," was the answer. "Then," said Lord Glendale, with some indignation, "why did you disturb me back yonder?" and he rated the man soundly and then settled himself to sleep again. When the Englishman awaked the train was still in motion, and being by that time thoroughly hungry he looked up the negro, and demanded how long it would be before they reached Catfish. "We'se dun passed dar, sah," said the man. "Why didn't you wake me?" Lord Glendale asked. "'Cause yur got mad when I woke yur afo', sah." The Englishman loudly complained of his treatment, but the negro insisted that he had brought it on himself by his ill temper. Sometimes Christian workers when dealing directly with sinners are rudely repulsed. There is time enough to repent yet, the sinner thinks, but those who thus procrastinate generally fall into a spiritual sleep from which they do not awake until too late (Heb. 3 : 12, 13).

An Engineer's Premonition of Danger Saved the lives of his passengers on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad recently. A Western correspondent of the Washington Critic, writing to his journal, gives a detailed account of the occurrence. It appears that early one morning, about two weeks ago, he awaked in his sleeping car, and found the train standing still on a bridge. He arose, dressed, and went out to see what was the matter. He saw smoke ascending from the end of the trestle work farthest away, and on approaching it, saw a huge gap burned away. "Lucky for us," he said, "that the engineer saw the fire in time to save us." "No," said the engineer, who stood hard by, "I saw no fire. I had a presentiment as I approached the bridge. Something seemed to warn me that it was not safe to cross, and it came upon me so strongly that I just stopped the train and got out of the cab, and I hadn't walked twenty steps before I saw that the act had saved many lives, for the whole train would have gone down that hole, although it is but the length of two rails." The engineer told the correspondent that on two other occasions his obedience to a similar presentiment had saved a train. The origin of these premonitions is a mystery, even to scientific thinkers, but facts prove that they do come occasionally to men and that when heeded, disaster has been averted. Would that sinners running a course of sin would listen and give heed to the voice of the Holy Spirit which at some time in life calls upon all, warning them of inevitable disaster (Prov. 1 : 24, 27).

A Girl Decoyed from her Home in Jersey City is now in a hospital in New York. During the latter part of August she attended a Sunday-school picnic, where she met a young girl with whom she became quite intimate. On September 5th she was induced by her new friend to visit New York, and accompanied her to a house she believed was the home of her friend, but she soon discovered it was a haunt of vice. There, she says, she was detained two weeks, and was compelled to associate with the disreputable inmates, by one of whom she was betrayed. Finally she escaped, but was again captured and taken to another house owned by the same proprietor, and it was not until she became ill and had to be removed to the hospital that she was saved. Then the police were sent to close both houses and arrest the inmates. The girl belongs to a very respectable family, but the girl who decoyed her away found that by feeding her vanity with lying promises she could make her a victim, and so earn her own commission from the New York purveyor of vice. The solemn warnings of the wise king are as appropriate for our day as for his (Prov. 4 : 13–16).

A Lawyer's Dog Caused a Delay in the business of the Superior Court of New York last week. A case that had been set down for hearing was called on; the judge, the parties and their witnesses were present, but when the proceedings were about to commence, one of the counsel engaged rose, and addressing the judge, said, "Your honor, the case cannot go on today. I am informed by the counsel for the plaintiff that the counsel's little dog has eaten the order of the court and the plaintiff's affidavit. I have consented to an adjournment until new papers can be prepared." Judge Truax looked as if he would have liked to commit the dog for contempt of court, but the case was adjourned without any penalty being inflicted. The lawyer will doubtless, in future, keep his papers out of his dog's way, or else teach the dog to show respect, as becomes a lawyer's dog, for orders of the court. As it was, the dog only acted according to its nature, and displayed the qualities which have made its name in the Bible a synonym for greediness and impudence. We have more reason to dread men with canine dispositions who abound now in the world and in the church; and the apostolic warning has lost none of its force since it was written (Phil. 3 : 2, 19).

Ladies Poisoned by Bank Bills are Said to have been obliged to leave the Treasury Department. The Washington correspondent of the Boston Traveller in the course of an article describing the interior of the Treasury, states that the ladies engaged in the National Bank Redemption bureau are unable to continue in their employment for a long time. Sooner or later sores break out on their hands and faces, and they are obliged to leave. The chief of the division explained that the cause of the eruption is the arsenic employed in the manufacture of the notes. If the skin is the least abraided, and the arsenic gets to the flesh, a sore will appear the next morning. The habit that every one has of putting the hand to the head and face is the way the arsenic poisoning is carried to those portions of the body. "I have known," he said, "a half dozen cases where ladies have been compelled to resign their positions. There are three who were here six years before they were afflicted with sores. About three months ago they were so visited by them that they had to quit work. They have been away ever since, and the physician's certificate in each case says that their blood is poisoned with arsenic." It was not generally known that the mere counting of money had an injurious effect, though the evil effects of loving money, hoarding it, and endangering the soul's interests to gain it are sadly familiar (1 Tim. 6 : 10).

BANKRUPT DEBTORS DISCHARGED.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And when they had nothing to pay, he frankly forgave them both."—Luke 7 : 42.

Distinctions among the Unconverted — Three Points of Similarity — I. Their Bankruptcy—A Picture of the Condition of the Unforgiven—Their Temptations—To Ignore Their Condition—To Make a Good Show—To Make Promises—To Ask for Time—The Wise Course—II. Their Free Discharge—The Goodness of the Creditor—His Freeness—An Effectual Forgiveness—An Eternal Discharge—To Both Debtors—III. The Connection between Bankruptcy and Discharge — When Boasting Ceased — When Thought Commenced—After Honest Confession—When Discharge is Valued—The Port in the Storm.

THE two debtors differed very considerably in the amounts which they owed; the one was in arrears five hundred pence, and the other fifty. There are differences in the guilt of sins, and in the degrees of men's criminality. It would be a very unfair and unrighteous thing to say that all men are exactly alike in the extent of their transgression. Some are honest and upright, kind and generous, even though they be but natural men; while others appear to be of a malicious, envious, selfish disposition, and rush into evil, sinning, as it were, with both hands greedily. The man who is moral, sober, and industrious is only a fifty pence debtor as compared with the vicious, drunken blasphemer whose debt is written at five hundred pence. Our Saviour recognizes the distinction, because it exists and cannot justly be overlooked.

There are

men, very great distinctions. One of them, a young man, came to Jesus, and he had so many fine traits in his character that the Lord looking upon him loved him; whereas when the Pharisees gathered about him our Lord looked round upon them with indignation. The soil, which was none of it yet sown with the good seed, yet varied greatly, and some of it was honest and good ground before the sower came to it. Sinners differ from each other.

But I call your particular notice to this fact—that though there was one point of difference in the two debtors, there were three points of similarity; for they were both debtors; and so all men have sinned, be it little or be it much; and, secondly, they were both alike bankrupt, neither of them could meet his debt; the man who owed fifty pence could no more pay than he who owed five hundred pence, so that they were both insolvent debtors. But what a mercy it is that they were alike in a third point! for "when they had nothing to pay," their creditor "frankly forgave them both."

O my dear hearers, we are all alike in the first two things! Oh, that we might be all of us alike in this last point, that the Lord our God may grant to every one of us the free remission of sins according to the riches of His grace through Christ Jesus!

Our first point for consideration is, their bankruptcy—"they had nothing to pay;" the second is, their free discharge—"he frankly forgave them both;" and the third is, the connection between these two things; for that little word "when" marks the connection—"when they had nothing to pay, he frankly forgave them both."

I. First, let us think of

THEIR BANKRUPTCY.

This was their condition. They were unquestionably in debt. If they could have disputed the creditor's claim, no doubt they would have done so. If they could have pleaded that they were never indebted, or that they had already paid, no doubt they would have been glad to have done so; but they could not raise a question; their debt could not be denied. Another fact was also clear to them, namely, that they had nothing to pay with. No doubt they had made diligent search; they had turned out their pockets, their cash-boxes, and their lockers, and they had found nothing; they had looked for their household goods, but these had vanished piece by piece. They had nothing at home or abroad that they could dispose of. Things had come to such a pass with them that they had neither stock nor money, nor anything in prospect which they could draw upon; they were brought to the last extremity, reduced to absolute beggary.

Meanwhile, their great creditor was pressing them for settlement. That idea lies in the heart of the text. The creditor had evidently brought his over-due accounts, and had said to them, "These claims must be met. There must be an end to this state of affairs; your accounts must be discharged." They were just brought to this condition—they must confess the debt, and they must also humbly acknowledge that they had nothing to meet it with; the time for payment had come, and it found them without a penny. No condition could be much more wretched.

So far I have stated the parable, and it most truly sets forth the condition of every man who has not come to Jesus Christ and so received the frank forgiveness of his sins. We are all by nature and by practice plunged in debt, and this is the way in which we came to be so. Hear it and mark it well. As God's creatures we from the very first owed to Him the debt of obedience. We were bound to obey our Maker. It is He that made us, and not we ourselves; and we were, therefore, bound reverently to recognize our Creator, affectionately to worship Him, and dutifully to serve Him.

But, dear friends, we have not done His will. We have left undone the things we ought to have done, and we have done the things we ought not to have done, and so we have come in a second sense into His debt. We now stand liable to penalty, yea, we are condemned already.

And we are utterly unable to make any amends for this. If He should meet with us and call us to account, we cannot answer Him one of a thousand. We cannot excuse ourselves, and we cannot by any possibility render to Him His righteous due. If any think they can, let me remind them of this, that to cancel to God we must pay it all. God demands, righteously demands, from us the keeping of His entire law. He tells us that he that is guilty in one point is guilty of all; for God's law is like a fair vase of alabaster, lovely in its entireness; but if it be chipped in any part, it may not be presented in His court; the least flaw in it mars its perfection and destroys its value. A perfect obedience to a perfect law is that which is required by the justice of the Most High; and is there any one of us who can render it, or who can attempt to pay the penalty due for not rendering it? It is certain that to meet the whole payment is impossible; neither in the form of obedience, nor in the form of penalty, may we ever hope to meet it—it would be all in vain to make the attempt.

THE DEBT WHICH WE OWE

Moreover, the debt is

IMMENSE AND INCALCULABLE!

Fifty pence is but a poor representation of what the most righteous person owes; five hundred pence is but an insignificant sum compared with the transgressions of the greater offenders. Even if these sins were somewhat within compass, and if we were not indebted for the future as to all we ever can do, yet what is there that we can do? Does not Paul say of himself that he was not sufficient to think anything of himself? Did not the Lord tell His Israel of old, "From Me is thy fruit found?" Did not Jesus say to His disciples and even to His apostles, "Without Me ye can do nothing?" What then can sinners do? Their bankruptcy is utter and entire; and this is true of every man that is still out of Christ—he is a debtor, and he has nothing to pay.

This being the case, I want to spend a minute in noticing certain temptations to which all bankrupt sinners are much subject. One of these is to try and forget their spiritual estate altogether. Some of you here to-day have never given serious thought to your souls and to your condition before God. It is an unpleasant subject. You suspect that it would be still more unpleasant if you looked into it. The man who is going backward in business has no pleasure in stock-taking. "Oh," says he, "don't bring me my books; I shall not sleep at nights if I look into them." He knows that he is sinking lower and lower, and will soon be a ruined man; and the only way in which he can endure his life is to drive dull care away by drink, or by going into company, or idle amusement. But

WHAT A FOOL HE IS!

Would it not be infinitely wiser if he would look the thing in the face and have it out, and know his actual state? Such ignorance as he chooses is not bliss to a right-hearted man, but suspense and misery. I have often prayed this prayer—"Lord, let me know the very worst of my case," for I do not wish to entertain a hope that will at last deceive me. Disappointment will be bitter in proportion as false hope was sweet. This is the temptation of the bankrupt soul, to shut its eyes to unwelcome truth.

Another temptation to a man in this condition is to make as good a show as he can. A man who is very near bankruptcy is often noticed for the dash he cuts. What a horse he drives as he comes up to business! What fashionable parties he gives! Just so, he desires to keep up his credit as long as ever he can. He is going to make a smash of it by-and-by, but for a season he assumes the airs of my Lord, and everybody near him imagines that he has money enough and to spare. There are some men of like manners; they have nothing that they can offer unto God, but yet they exhibit a glittering self-righteousness. Oh, they have been so good, such superior people, so praiseworthy from their youth up; they never did anything much amiss; there may be a little speck here and there upon their garments, but that will brush off when it is dry. Who could find any fault with such good people? Just so; this profession is the fine horse and trap with which they too are cutting a dash just before going through the court. There is nothing at all in you, and there never was, if you are as nature has made you; wherefore then do you try to brazen it out, and make yourself to seem somewhat when you are nothing. You may by this means deceive yourself, but certainly you will not deceive God.

Another temptation which lurks in the way of a bankrupt sinner is that of making promises of what he will do. Men in debt are generally they will pay next week for certain; but when that next week comes, they meant the next week further on, and then payment shall be doubly certain; yet they put in no appearance even then, or, if they do, they give a bill. Is not that a precious document? is it not as good as the money itself? They evidently think so, for they feel quite as easy as if they had really paid that debt. But when the bill falls due, what then? It falls, never to rise again. Ah me! a bill is often just a lie with a stamp on it. So will debtors go on as long as they can. This is what every sinner does before he becomes cleared by the sovereign grace of God. He cries, "I mean to do better." Dear sir, you cannot raise our hopes now. Neither God nor man will trust you; you have promised these twenty years, and in no one year have you made a real move in the right direction. You have not lied unto men only, but unto God, and how will you answer for it? Know you not that every promise that you make to God which you do not keep is a great addition to your transgressions, and helps to fill up the measure of your iniquities? Give up the way of lying, I pray you.

Another temptation is, always to ask for more time—as if this was all that was needed. "It is not convenient just now, but do wait a little bit, a suitable hour will come." With this temptation Satan has destroyed multitudes of men, tempting them to ask for more time, instead of coming up to the mark at once and asking for immediate pardon. What are the fabled virtues of to-morrow? Why do men dote upon the unknown future? To immediate decision I would press you at this moment; and may God by His Divine Spirit deliver you as a bird from the hand of the fowler, that you may no longer procrastinate and waste your life in disobedient delay.

This being the temptation, let me hint to those of you who are bankrupt what your wisdom is. It is your wisdom to face the business of your soul. Your soul-matters are the most important things you will ever have on hand, for when your wealth must be left, and your estate shall see you no more, and when your body is dead, your soul will still be living in eternal happiness or endless woe; therefore, do not let your state in reference to God have the go-by. It is the most important matter; give it the first place. Settle this business before you attend to anything else. Take care that you and not as one who makes the best of a bad story. Though it be bad, yet still the best thing you can do is to go right through with it in truth and soberness before the Lord. Hope lies that way. Before God nothing but truth can stand; the painted hypocrite is spied out immediately. The Lord takes off all masks, and men stand before Him as they really are, and not as they would seem to be; so be true with yourself. Do not take your pen and write down sixty if you owe a hundred; but put the fair hundred down. Tricks and falsehoods had better be put away once for all when you deal with God.

One thing more: it will be your wisdom to give up all attempts to pay, because you have nothing to pay with. Do not delude yourself into the idea that you will pay one day, for you never will. Do not make the slightest attempt at paying, for you cannot do it; but take quite another course, plead absolute poverty, and appeal to mercy. Say, "Lord, I have nothing, I am nothing, I can do nothing. I must throw myself upon thy grace." Of this grace I am now going to speak. May I so speak as to encourage you who are bankrupts to come to the Lord, that He may frankly forgive you all.

II. Our second head is,

THEIR FREE DISCHARGE.

"He frankly forgave them both." What a blessing they obtained by facing the matter! These two poor debtors, when they went into the office, were trembling from head to foot, for they had nothing to pay, and were deeply involved; but see! They come out with light hearts, for the debt is all disposed of, the bills are receipted, the records are destroyed. Even thus the Lord has blotted out the handwriting that was against us, and has taken it out of the way, nailing it to His cross.

In this free discharge I admire, first of all, the goodness of the great creditor. What a gracious heart He had! What kindness He showed! He said, "Poor souls, you can never pay Me, but you need not be cast down because of it, for I freely cancel your debts." Oh, the goodness of it! Oh, the largeness of the heart of God!

But, then, observe the freeness of it—"He frankly forgave them both." They did not stand there and say, "Oh, good sir, we cannot pay," and plead and beg, as for their lives; but he freely said to them, "You cannot pay, but I can forgive. You ought never to have got into my debt, and you ought not to have broken your promises to me; but behold, I make an end of all this weary business; I freely blot out all your obligations!" This is a fair picture of the grace of God. When a poor sinner comes to Him bankrupt, He says, "I forgive you freely; your offence is all gone. I do not want you to earn a pardon by your tears, and prayers, and anguish of soul. You have not to make Me merciful, for I am merciful already; and My dear Son Jesus Christ has made such a propitiation that I can be just and yet can forgive you all this debt. Therefore, go in peace."

Furthermore, this debt was fully discharged. The creditor did not say, "Come, my good fellow, I will take fifty per cent off the account if you find the remainder." As they had nothing wherewith to pay, they would not have been a bit the better if he had reduced them ninety per cent. If he had taken half the debt, the one would have owed two hundred and fifty and the other twenty-five; but still their case would have been hopeless, since they had not a farthing of their own. Now the Lord, when He blots out His people's sin, leaves no trace of it remaining.

Observe that it was a

VERY EFFECTUAL FORGIVENESS

too. The only person that can forgive a debt is he to whom the debt is due. God only can forgive sin, seeing it is a debt to Him. Suppose I were to forgive you for injuries done by you to the Queen, of what value would my forgiveness be? He against whom I have transgressed is the only one that can pronounce my pardon; but if he absolves me, how effectual is the sentence! When the creditor said, "I freely forgive you both," why, the deed was done; his lips had power, he had finished the debt by his word. And so when the Lord Jesus Christ is looked unto by the eye of faith, there comes a voice from His dear wounds which cries to the poor trembling bankrupt sinner, "Your sins, which are many, are all forgiven."

And I believe that when this is done, I may add another adjective—it is an eternal discharge. That creditor could never summon those debtors again for debts which he had remitted. He could never think of such a thing with any show of justice. He had frankly forgiven them, and they were forgiven. God does not play fast and loose with His creatures, and forgive them and then punish them. I never shall believe in God's loving a man to-day, and casting him away to-morrow.

Only one more remark on this point; this frank forgiveness applied to

BOTH THE DEBTORS—

"he frankly forgave them both." The man that owed only fifty pence needed a free discharge as truly as the debtor who owed five hundred; for though he was not so deep in the mire, yet he was as truly in the slough. If a man was lying in prison for debt, as men used to do under our old laws, if he only owed fifty pounds he was shut within walls just as closely as the greater debtor who owed fifty thousand; and he could no more get out without the payment or forgiveness of his smaller liability than the bigger debtor could. A bird held by a string is as much a prisoner as a bull that is tied by a rope.

Now, you good people who have always tried to do your duty, and are numbered with the fifty pence debtors, you must confess that you have become somewhat indebted to God by committing a measure of sins. Take note that you cannot be saved except by the free forgiveness of God through the precious blood of Christ. The fifty pence debtor must obtain his discharge by grace alone. It is also a most blessed thing to perceive that he forgave the five hundred pence debtor with equal freeness. Perhaps I have some here, men and women, who have never made any pretence of being good, who from their childhood have gone from bad to worse. There is a possibility of free and instantaneous forgiveness for you at this moment. You that are over head and ears in debt to God can be freely forgiven by the same Lord who forgives the smaller debtors.

Ho, you with a little bill, bring it here that infinite grace may write upon it "CANCELLED!" Ho, you with a more weighty account, come and place it near that gracious right hand, for though your bill be never so long and heavy, the hand of Infinite Love can write "CANCELLED" in a moment! My joy overflows at having such a Gospel to preach to you; whatever your guilt, my gracious God is ready to forgive you for Jesus' sake, because He delighteth in mercy.

III. I now beg your very special attention to the last point, and that is between this bankruptcy and this free discharge. It is said "When they had nothing to pay, he frankly forgave them both." There is a time when pardon comes, and that time is when self-sufficiency goes. If any person in this place has in his own conscience come to this point, that he feels he has nothing to pay, he has come to the point at which God is ready to forgive him. He that will own his debt, and confess his own incapacity to meet it, shall find that God frankly blots it out. The Lord will never forgive us until we are brought to the starvation of pride and the death of boasting.

A sense of spiritual bankruptcy shows that a man has become thoughtful; and this is essential to salvation. Must there not be serious thought before we can hope for mercy? Would you have God save us while we are asleep, while we are giddy, frivolous, trifling, and without concern about our sin? Surely that would be giving a premium to folly! God acts not so. He will have us know the seriousness of our danger, for else we shall treat the whole matter with lightness; and we shall miss the moral effect of pardon, while He will be robbed of His glory.

Next, when we come to feel our bankruptcy we then make an honest confession, and to that confession a promise is given—"he that confesseth his sin shall find mercy." The two debtors had owned to their debts, and they had also openly confessed, though it must have gone against the grain a bit, that they could not pay. They humbled themselves before their creditor, and then he said, "I frankly forgive you." If one of these debtors had bounced and bragged, "Oh, we can pay;" in all probability he would have been sent to prison.

As for you, poor trembler, I do not know where you are this morning, but here is comfort for you; when you go unto God in your chamber and cry, "Lord, have mercy upon me, for I am guilty, and I cannot justify myself before Thee, nor offer any excuse to Thee;" then it is that He will say, "Be of good cheer; I have put away thy sin; thou shalt not die." When you have nothing to pay and confess your insolvency, the debt shall be wiped out. When you are brought to your worst, you shall see the Lord at His best.

It is in their utter destitution that men value a discharge. If God were to give His mercy to every man at once, without his ever having had any sense of sin at all, why men would count it cheap and think nothing of it So the Lord takes care that the sinner shall know his need of mercy by feeling the pinch of conscience and the terror of the law. If I may so speak, He puts in the sheriff's officer, and makes by convincing the man of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment. The Lord puts an execution into the heart, and then it is, when the poor creature cries, "I have nothing to pay with," that free discharge is given by the Lord, and heartily prized by him to whom it comes.

Under conviction a poor soul sees the reality of sin and of pardon. My dear hearer, you will never believe in the reality of forgiveness till you have felt the reality of sin. I remember when I felt the burden of sin, and though but a child, my heart failed me for anguish, and I was brought very low. Sin was no bugbear to scare me; it was a grim reality; as a lion it tore me in pieces. And now, to-day, I know the reality of pardon; it is no fancy, no dream, for my inmost soul feels its power. I know that my sins are forgiven, and I rejoice therein; but I should never have known the real truth of this happy condition if I had not felt the oppressive load of sin upon the conscience.

I do believe that the Lord will give us our quittance when we have got to our last farthing, and not till then, because only then do we look to the Lord Jesus Christ. Ah, my dear friends, as long as we have anything else to look to, we never will look to Christ. That blessed port into which no ship did ever run in a storm without finding a sure haven is shunned by all your gallant vessels; they will rather put into any port along the coast of self-deceit than make for the harbor which is marked out by the two lighthouses of free grace and dying love.

WE BREAK TO MAKE.

We are emptied to be filled. When we cannot give, God can forgive. If any of you have any goodness of your own you will perish forever. If you have anything you can trust to of your own you will be lost as sure as you are living men and women; but if you are reduced to sore extremity, and God's fierce wrath seems to burn against you, then not only may you have mercy, but mercy is yours already.

> "'Tis perfect poverty alone
> That sets the soul at large;
> While we can call one mite our own
> We get no full discharge.
>
> "But let our debts be what they may,
> However great or small,
> As soon as we have nought to pay
> Our Lord forgives us all."

Blessed are ye poor, for ye shall be rich! Blessed are ye hungry, for ye shall be fed! Blessed are ye that are empty, for ye shall be filled! But woe unto you that are rich and are increased in goods, and have need of nothing, and boast of your own goodness! Christ has nothing to do with you, and we have nothing to preach to you except this—"They that be whole need not a physician." The heavenly Surgeon did not come to save those who have no need of saving. Let those who are sick prick up their ears and hear with delight, for the Physician is come with a special eye to them. Are you a sinner? Then Christ is the Saviour of sinners. Join hands with Him by faith, and the work is done; you are saved forever! God bless you, for Christ's sake. Amen.

[PORTIONS OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—Psalm 32; Luke 7 : 36–50.]

FREDERICK DOUGLASS,

Chairman of the National Colored Convention at Louisville, Ky.

ON the next page is a portrait of the man whose abilities, industry, and energy have raised him to a commanding if not to the chief position among the colored race in America. At the national Colored Covention held two weeks ago at Louisville, Ky., it was felt that no man could be so appropriately chosen to preside as Federick Douglass, and though there were reasons well understood for his unpopularity with an influential section of the delegates, yet it was proved that any other selection would have been regarded as a slight not to be tolerated by men who held Mr. Douglass in high personal esteem, however diametrically they differed from him on some of his theories.

Frederick Douglass believes that he was born in 1817. He has no means of ascertaining the exact date, as his mother was a slave, and he was himself in slavery until he arrived at maturity, when he made his escape. His early years were passed in the district of Tuckahoe on the eastern shore of Maryland. While about seven years old he suffered much ill-usage from "a black virago," as he still calls her, known as Aunt Kate, who had charge of all the young children on the estate, and who contracted an unaccountable dislike toward him.

At the age of about ten years, Douglass was lent by his owner to some relatives in Baltimore, who treated the boy with great kindness, and under the care of his young mistress he learned the alphabet and afterward taught himself to read and write. About six years later, however, his owner died, and Douglass passed into the ownership, by inheritance, of another master, and was removed from the family from whom he had received much kindness. He lived at St. Michael's, and there with another slave tried to establish a colored Sunday-school, but the school was broken up, and Douglass, having offended his new owner and the overseer, he was sent to a man named Covey to be "broken in." Covey used considerable harshness with the lad, which resulted in a struggle between the two in which Douglass was victorious, and afterward Covey treated him more kindly. Another change of a welcome character came in his lot when he was again sent to Baltimore to be the servant of his owner's brother, who apprenticed him to a ship-carpenter and allowed him to keep a large part of the proceeds of his earnings. The indignities put upon him in the shipyard, however, irritated him, and he resolved to make his escape. An opportunity occurring soon afterward was promptly seized, and Douglass succeeded in reaching New Bedford, Mass.

Douglass spent some very unhappy years there. He was free, but he could not support himself. Even men who were loud in advocating abolition would give no employment to an escaped slave. But he had a chance of improving his mind which he did not neglect, and after a time he was enabled, through the kindness of a friend, to travel to England. He remained there some years, and speaks in glowing terms of the friendly treatment he received there.

In 1846 a number of friends of Douglass, at the instance of Mrs. Henry Richards, of Baltimore, who took a lively interest in him, subscribed funds sufficient to purchase his freedom. His owner, Mr. Hugh Auld, executed a deed of manumission, and Douglass returned to America. He became intimate with John Brown, and a long correspondence passed between the two; but when it became evident that Brown was tending toward insurrection, Douglass, after a vain attempt to dissuade his friend from a project that could only end in bloodshed and ruin, severed his connection with him. There were, however, letters found in Brown's carpet-bag from Douglass, which implicated him, and Douglass had to fly to Canada.

During the war Douglass was frequently at Washington, where he enjoyed the confidence of President Lincoln. It is to be regretted that in the excitement of the time he urged on the President measures of retaliation which, happily, Lincoln had the good sense and humanity to reject. After peace was concluded Douglass devoted himself to the work of elevating his race, in which he has labored with unremitting zeal. Mr. Hayes appointed him in 1877 marshal of the District of Columbia, and when Gen. Garfield came into office he appointed Douglass Recorder of Deeds for the District, in which office he has been retained by President Arthur. Douglass, though now fast verging on his seventieth year, is still active and full of energy. He resides at Uniontown, D. C.

THE FRENCH DILIGENCE.

The illustration on the right of this page represents a scene still common in the rural districts of France, and which was in the ante-railroad days an every-day sight in all the cities and large towns in the country. Travellers possessed of wealth journeyed in their own carriages, but to the great bulk of the population the diligence or coach was the only means of making long journeys, and to this day there are large districts in France in which, through lack of rail facilities, the diligence is a useful and valued institution. It is a lumbering, ungainly, uncomfortable vehicle, as many an American tourist in France can attest. The traveller leaves it at the close of a day's ride with aching bones and all the angles of his body more or less bruised and contused. It generally weighs about four tons and rests on four heavy broad wheels much too small in diameter, according to American views of coach-building.

The body of the vehicle is divided into compartments, and the traveller may select his place according to the rate of fare he pays. There is the coupé in front, with accommodation for three persons; behind that is the intérieur, which will hold six persons; and above in the rear is the rotonde, in which six others may ride and learn how much dust the clumsy conveyance can raise on the country roads. Beside these places for the fifteen passengers, there is the banquette, where the driver and conducteur sit, and where one or two specially favored passengers may also find places. The diligence is drawn by four horses which occupy the attention of the driver, while the conductor has the general responsibility for passengers and luggage, and also manages the drag or brake.

In the early morning at many an inn door in the country districts of France the local diligence may be seen as depicted in the picture above; the passengers saying their adieux to their friends gathered around, the conductor as commander of the caravan in his seat of honor on the banquette with the brake in his hand awaiting the coming of his colleague, the driver, now mounting to the box; while nestling close to his side is some little schoolgirl who is placed specially under his protection for the journey.

CAPTAIN WILSON'S APOLOGY.

"I THINK she will sleep all night, now," said Miss Fanny Knowles, a kind, Christian young lady, as she turned away from the bed of a sick woman and addressed the husband, a rough-looking, Irish laborer, who, with the habit of "the ould countree," raised his hand obsequiously to his forehead in acknowledgment that one of "the quality" was speaking to him. "You will have to watch by her for an hour or two," Miss Knowles went on. "I shall come again early in the morning, and I believe I shall find her much better."

Miss Knowles tripped lightly away, and soon caught her car. A short time afterward she was standing where she had alighted, waiting for a Madison Avenue car, when she noticed a man regarding her intently. Though respectably dressed, he appeared to have been drinking, and she was horrified to see that having apparently satisfied himself about her he was walking unsteadily toward her. She turned away and looked around for a policeman, but there was not one in sight, and she began to feel nervous.

"Miss Knowles, I believe," he said, when he was within speaking distance. "Had the pleasure of meeting you at your uncle's house two weeks ago. Know your uncle well. Allow me to see you home. Disreputable characters about, you know, at night." This with an attempt at dignity.

"Captain Wilson, is it not?" said Miss Knowles. The gentleman bowed in the affirmative. "I do not need an escort, thank you; this car will take me within one block of home." And hailing the car, which by this time, to her intense relief, had come to the corner on which she stood, Miss Knowles boarded it, and Captain Wilson followed. He was, however, sufficiently conscious of his condition not to venture into the light, but remained on the rear platform. But he seemed in his drunken stupidity to cling to the idea that he ought to escort Miss Knowles home, so, when she alighted, he too left the car and offered her his arm. This alarmed her, and she started to run, but the captain laid his hand on her arm and restrained her.

"Captain Wilson," she said, in indignation, "do you wish to insult me? I have told you I do not desire your company to-night."

"Must see you home safely," he said, and again offered his arm with tipsy politeness.

Capt. Wilson's Apology.

At that moment, however, a hand was laid on his shoulder, and he was twisted around. "I am so glad you came," said Miss Knowles, recognizing her sister and brother-in-law, who were returning home from a late meeting. "Captain Wilson appears to be in a condition in which he cannot understand that his company is not desirable."

"Why, Wilson, is it you?" said Mr. Crawford; "now go home, there's a good fellow, and sober up. You would not insult a lady, would you?"

Captain Wilson muttered something about protection not insult, and moved away.

"Wilson is an ass," said Mr. Crawford, with judicial frankness. "He is a good fellow, but weak as water. He will drink with any one he knows, and he cannot stop when he once begins. He has plenty of money and is as generous as a prince, but he is wasting it fast. He will be thoroughly ashamed of this in the morning. I expect you will have him here to-morrow to make an abject apology."

Mr. Crawford's prediction was fulfilled. Miss Knowles was sitting reading in her father's drawing-room, while her sister, Mrs. Crawford, dressed for a walk, was moving about the room waiting for her husband, when Captain Wilson's card was brought up with an earnest request that Miss Knowles would receive him for a few minutes.

"Do not see him, Fanny," said Mrs. Crawford. "I should cut him altogether. It is a disgrace to have anything to say to so disreputable a man."

"I should like to see him," said Miss Knowles, a soft light of pitiful compassion lighting up her dark eyes. "Who knows but a word of kindness may be the means of doing him good."

"That is always your thought, Fanny, you have no self-respect. The proper course, the only dignified one, is to send him away. You will have him insulting you again, if you allow him to talk to you now."

"I will incur that risk in the hope of doing him a service. I am not afraid that he will presume upon it," said Miss Knowles, and, accordingly, Captain Wilson was admitted.

His bearing was a complete contrast to that of the preceding night, and no one would have supposed from his appearance that he was ever anything but the thorough gentleman he appeared. He uttered his apology, too, in tones at once manly and respectful, and he seemed so clearly capable of better things that Miss Knowles felt her heart drawn toward him.

"What you say, Captain Wilson," she said, "gives me the right to ask you if this habit, which you acknowledge degrades you, cannot be overcome? I ask you in all kindness and in sincere pity for you."

"So I believe, madam, but I fear there is no hope for me. My fate is sealed. Years ago I should have never dreamed of becoming the slave I am, and I have made many attempts to reform, but they have all failed. The habit holds me in its power like a child."

"I should expect them to fail," said Miss Knowles, "if your efforts were made in your own strength, but I am sure that if you asked God to take your case into His hands you would be saved. I have known men with not a tithe of your culture and education rescued in answer to prayer. Forgive me for speaking to you so, I am sincerely desirous to see you delivered from the curse, and I know there is no other way."

"Do not apologize, madam. Your compassion overcomes me. I would gladly take your advice if I had any hope, but I lost that long ago."

"There you are wrong, and my advice cannot benefit you while you feel and speak so. If you will consider God's infinite power, you must admit that He is able to save you, and if you will read His promises in His Word, you will see that He is willing. Why, then, do you say you have no hope? If you will have hope, and the confidence that will come if you seek it, and will ask God to save you, believing that He can and will, you will be saved."

"You speak confidently, madam; but I fear you do not know how weak and degraded I am."

For answer, Miss Knowles pressed into his hand her own New Testament, and said, "This book will suit you if you speak sincerely; it is for those who feel weak and degraded."

"I will try," said Captain Wilson; "your confidence gives me courage. May I come and tell you if I succeed?"

"Certainly, and you may come if you fail. I shall be glad if I can help you, and I will certainly pray for you."

Captain Wilson took his leave with a brighter hope in his heart than he had felt for many a day. That hope grew brighter, too, as the days passed, and by the blessing of God his craving for liquor decreased. He conquered, as all those do who trust in the Saviour's power and love, and not in themselves. When he again entered the Knowles's mansion, it was to report that he had taken the young lady's advice and had found that her confidence was justified. Saved himself, his desire was to carry the good news of hope to other hopeless beings.

POVERTY'S PREY.

Anxiety at Home.

It was a pleasant autumn day, and numbers of people were about the roads, sauntering leisurely in the warm and bright sunshine. Again many of them were willing enough to give a penny to the half-shy boy who asked in a quiet tone for alms.

He was willing, he said, to clean boots or clean steps, or do any other job that could be found for him as a labor-test; but very few persons took the trouble to find him work to do. It was much easier to take a penny out of the purse, drop it into his hand, and pass on, with a feeling of satisfaction of at once getting rid of a painful object, and of appeasing the conscience, which seemed about to demand that some remedy should be found for abject poverty like his. Possibly it did not occur to any of these well-meaning and charitable persons, that they were aiding and encouraging the poor lad to break one of the laws of the country.

While it was still day, though the sun was sinking in the sky, David sat down under a hedge to count over his pennies. He placed his old cap between his feet, and dropped in the coins one after another, handling them with an almost wild delight. How rich he would be to go home to his mother, if he had equal luck on his way back! Five shillings for two days' begging! Now that he had found out how easy and profitable it was, and how little risk attended it if you only kept out of sight of the police, his mother and Bess should never know want again. He felt very joyous, and his joy found vent in clear, shrill whistling of the tunes he had learned from street-organs. He was whistling through the merriest one he knew, when a hand was laid heavily on his shoulder; and, looking up, he saw the familiar uniform of a policeman.

"You're in fine spirits, my lad," he said. "What's this you're crowing over, eh? Where did you get all those pennies in your cap? How did you come by them, eh?"

David could not speak, though he tried to seize and hide away his gains; but in vain. The policeman picked up his cap, and weighed it in his hand.

"You've been begging on the roads," he said, in a matter-of-course manner, "and you must come along with me. We'll give you a night's lodging for nothing, I promise you. We must put a stop to this sort of thing."

Still David neither moved nor spoke. This sudden reversal of all his gladness and prospects paralyzed him. He had known all the while that any policeman had the power to arrest him for begging, and lock him for the night in a police-cell, and charge him with his offence before a magistrate. Not a few of his acquaintances had been in jail, and they mostly said it was for begging. The thought of his mother fretting and longing for him at home, and the grief and terror she would feel if he did not get back on Saturday night, as he had promised, flashed across him. The policeman was busy counting over the heap of coppers, and David saw his chance, and seized it. He sprang to his feet, and fled away with as fast steps as if he had been fleeing for his life.

But it was of no avail to try to escape from the policeman, who instantly pursued him. David was weak and tired, and could not have run far if it had been for his life. He felt himself caught firmly by the collar, and shaken, while two or three passers-by stood still, witnessing his capture.

"You young rascal!" said the policeman, "you're only making it all the worse for yourself. Here's five shillings and more in his cap," he went on, addressing the by-standers; "and I'll be bound he's been begging along the roads as if he hadn't a penny. That's how the public is imposed on. He's got more now than I can earn in a day. There's a shame for you!"

"Ay, it is a shame!" echoed one of the spectators, "a big lad of his age, that ought to be at honest work, earning his own bread!"

"Nobody's ever taught me how to work!" sobbed David, standing bewildered and ashamed, the centre of the gathering crowd.

"We'll teach you that in jail, my fine fellow," said the policeman, marching him off, followed by a train of rough lads, which grew larger and noisier until they reached the police-station, and David was led in out of their sight.

It was a dreary night for David. There was no bed in the cell, and no food was given to him. In his anxiety to save all he could to carry home with him, he had not tasted a morsel since morning; and his meal then had been nothing but a pennyworth of bread, which he had taken reluctantly from his treasure. He had been thinking of buying his supper, and what it would cost him, when his gains had been seized from him, and handed over to the custody of the police-superintendent. He was weary, too, foot-sore, and worn out with his long tramp. But neither his hunger nor fatigue pressed upon him with most bitterness.

He crouched down in a corner of the cell, and thought of his mother and Bess looking out for him all Saturday, and waiting, and watching, and listening for him to open the door, and never seeing him at all! His mother had said she would be hungrier for a sight of him than for bread! Would they send him to jail for begging? Boys had been sent there for three days or a week, and his mother would be fretting all that time. He would lose his money too, and go home as penniless as he left it. He hid his face in his hands, and wept bitterly till his tears were exhausted, and a raging headache followed. At times he slumbered a little, sobbing heavily in his short and troubled sleep. When he woke he felt the pangs of hunger sharper than usual; for he had been nearly a night and a day without tasting food, and his hunger made him think again of his mother. Hungry, weary, and bewildered, with an aching head and a heart full of care and bitterness, David passed through the long and weary hours of the night.

It was after mid-day before food was provided for him, and then he could not eat it. He felt sick with dread of the moment when he should be taken before the magistrate. He had seen other prisoners summoned and led away to receive their doom; but this turn seemed long in coming. At last it came. He obeyed the call of his name, and found himself, dizzy-headed and sick at heart, standing in a large room, with a policeman beside him. There was a singing in his ears, through which he listened to the charge made against him, and to the policeman in the witness-box giving his evidence.

"Have you anything to say for yourself?" asked a voice in front of him; and David raised his dim eyes to the face of the magistrate, but did not answer, though his lips moved a little.

"Were you begging?" asked the magistrate again.

"Yes," answered David with a violent effort; "but I am not a thief, sir: I never stole a farthing."

"Is there any previous charge against this boy?" inquired the magistrate.

A second policeman stepped into the witness-box, and David turned his dazed eyes upon him. He had never seen him before.

"I have a previous charge of stealing iron against the prisoner"—

"It's not true!" cried out David in a voice shrill with terror. "I never was a thief. Somebody ask my mother."

"Silence!" said the officer who had him in charge, with a sharp grip of his arm. "You must not interrupt the court."

"He was convicted of theft before your worship six months ago," pursued the policeman in the box, taking no notice of David's interruption. "He went then by the name of John Benson, and was sentenced to twenty-one days."

"Have you anything more to say?" asked the magistrate, looking again at David.

"It wasn't me!" he answered vehemently. 'He's mistook me for some other boy. I never stole nothing, and I never begged afore. You ask my mother. Oh, what will become of my mother and little Bess?"

"You should have thought of your mother before you broke the laws of your country," said the magistrate. "This neighborhood is infested with beggars, and we must put a stop to the nuisance. I shall send you to jail for three calendar months, when you will be taught a trade by which you may earn an honest livelihood."

David was hustled away, and another case called. His had occupied scarcely four minutes. The day was a busy one, as there had been a large fair held in the district; and there was no more time to be spent upon a boy clearly guilty of begging, and who had been convicted of theft. No one doubted for a moment this latter statement, or thought it in the least necessary to inquire if the boy's vehement denial had any truth in it. Another prisoner stood at the bar, and David Fell was at once forgotten.

It seemed to David as if he had been suddenly struck deaf. No other sound reached his brain after he heard the words, "To jail for three months." Three months in jail! Not to see his mother for three months! Perhaps never to see her again; for who could tell that she would live for three months? It was only a few minutes since he heard his name called out before he was hurried into court; but it might have been many years. He felt as if his mother might have been dead long ago; as if it was very long ago since he left home, with her voice sounding in his ears. He seemed to hear her saying, "God bless you, David!" and the magistrate's voice directly following it, "I shall send you to jail for three months." His bewildered brain kept repeating, "God bless you, Davy! I shall send you to jail for three months." It was as if some one was mocking him with these words.

No doubt it was somebody's duty to inform Mrs. Fell of David's conviction and sentence to three months' imprisonment; but whether the official notice was sent to the mother of the boy who had been previously convicted of theft, or failed to reach David's mother through the post, we do not know. She never received the information.

Mrs. Fell and Bess felt the time pass heavily while he was away. The poor woman had always been more careful of her children than the neighbors were; and she had never allowed Bess to play about the streets, if David was not at hand to take care of her. Bess was growing a tall and pretty girl now, and needed more than ever to have somebody to look after her. So she was compelled to stay in-doors, shut up in the close and tainted atmosphere and the dim light of their miserable home. Mrs. Fell did a little washing still by stealth; but she was fearful of the relieving-officer finding her at her tub, and taking off her allowance. She could earn only a few pence, and that with sharp pain; but the pangs of hunger were sharper. Bess was old enough, and willing to help, though she could not earn sufficient altogether for her own maintenance. Still, if David should happen to come back with a little money to go on with, all would be well for another week or two, and some work might turn up for him.

Mrs. Fell was very lonesome without her boy, and sorely did she miss him. She was one of those mothers who think nothing of their girls in comparison with their sons; and David had always been good to her, and cheered her up when she was most downcast. She fancied he was growing like his father; and the sound of his voice or his footstep brought back the memories of happier days. David had promised to be back on Saturday, but she almost expected him on Friday night; but Friday night passed by, and David was still away. During the long, sleepless hours of darkness, she was thinking of him ceaselessly, little dreaming that her boy was spending his first night in jail.

Saturday passed slowly by; and, when evening came, Mrs. Fell set her door ajar, and sat just within it in the dark, looking out into the lighted passage and staircase, common to all the lodgers. David would be sure to whistle as he came down the street, and her ear would catch the sound while he was still a long way off. She felt no hunger to-night, and was scarcely conscious of her pain. All her thoughts and cares were centred on her boy.

"He'd never break his promise, Bess," she said softly. "He knows I'm hungering for a sight of him, and, whatever luck he's had, he's sure to come home to-night. I've wished a thousand times as I'd never let him go; but it's over now, and he shall never go again, if we can only keep him from it. We'll get more washing done, you and me; won't we, Bess? And maybe David will have better luck in getting jobs to do. O my lad, my lad! But he'll be here very soon now."

She checked the sobs which hindered her from hearing, and sat still for some minutes, listening, with strained ears, to catch his whistle amid the hubbub of sounds that noised about her. At last she sent Bess to the street-door to look up the narrow, ill-lighted street, to the corner with the brilliantly illuminated spirit-vaults, round which David might come any moment with the proceeds of his begging expedition. Bess had some bright visions of her own, based upon the stories of successful beggary which the neighbors told to one another; and she was as full of impatient anticipation as her mother.

"It's almost like the time I used to watch for father, Bess, before we were wed," said Mrs. Fell plaintively; "and I was never more on the fidgets then than I am now for Davy, poor lad! I can't keep myself still a moment. Father used to wear a plush weskit as was as soft as soft could be, and I'd dearly like Davy to have one like it. I priced one in a shop one day; but it was more than I could give when I was in full work. And, Bess, I'd like you to have a pink cotton gown, such as I was wed in. But there! It's no use to think on such things. It's God's will, and He knows best. If my lad 'ud only come in, I should care for nothing."

Bess went off to the door, stepping softly past the front room, where their next neighbor, Blackett, lived, and gazed up to the stream of light shining across the road through the tavern-window. She stood there for a few minutes in silence.

"He's comin', mother," cried Bess quietly; and the poor woman's heart throbbed painfully as she leaned back against the wall almost faint from joy, while Bess ran eagerly up the street toward the light, which for a brief moment had irradiated the figure of her brother. But it was not David whom she met, though it was a boy of his age and size; and Bess felt near crying out aloud when she saw who it was. Still he was an old companion and playfellow, and as nearly a friend as Blackett's son could be; for he was Roger Blackett, whose father, living in the front room on the ground-floor, close against the door through which every one went to and fro, was the terror of all the inmates of the crowded house.

ASKING A KING.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 21. 1 Sam. 8: 1-10. Golden Text, Psalm 118: 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Samuel's Ungodly Sons—The Lesson of the Trial—The Demand of the Elders—Heard with Meekness—Samuel's Refuge—The National Trouble—The Remedy Proposed—Farther from God and Nearer the World—The Lord's Answer—A Consolatory Fellowship—The Divine Warning against Monarchical Government—The Warning Unheeded—More Pomp but Less Piety.

THE Prophet Samuel at last grew old, and then he made what seems to have been the first mistake recorded during the time in which God had trusted him with the government of Israel: "he made his sons judges over Israel." This appears to have been done without any distinct direction from God, and no blessing accompanied it. "His sons walked but turned aside after lucre, and took bribes and perverted judgment." There is no such condemnation spoken against him as that which he himself was charged to speak to Eli. God never condemned him because he did not restrain them in their wrongdoing, or said that he honored his sons above God, and we are not told whether these young men became changed in their after life. If we may surmise the reason why God permitted so holy a man as Samuel to have the untold trial of ungodly, unfaithful sons, it would be that Samuel might learn his own utter nothingness before the end of his life on earth.

Many a parent has to learn how powerless human effort is to change the heart of a child; obedience may be enforced, outward conformity to a parent's will may exist, while the heart is bent upon attaining its own ends, and again and again the heart of a parent whose life has been most strictly and conscientiously upright is wrung with grief and deep humiliation because his sons walk not in his ways, because there is crookedness, duplicity, and insincerity found in them. How often a disinterested father has a son who is the exact opposite of himself in character; he sees in his own son a mean, covetous, ignoble spirit, which cuts him to the heart. What then?

IS THERE NO REMEDY?

Yes, bless God; that which man cannot do, God can: "Is anything too hard for the Lord?" When the deep humiliation has done its work, when the heart which has long ago been driven from all self-dependence in other things, such as its own salvation and sanctification or in its work with souls, finds itself equally powerless to instil true principles into the heart of a son or daughter, and can only say about all its efforts to train them for God, "Behold, I am vile; what shall I answer Thee; I will lay my hand upon my mouth" (Job. 40: 4)—then the Lord can fully undertake that which man has abandoned to Him. He will not mix His work with ours, even in the training of our children; we can work under Him, but only under, letting Him have the full control.

It must have been

for Samuel when "the elders of Israel gathered themselves together, and came to Samuel unto Ramah, and said unto him, Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways; now make us a king to judge us like all the nations." Yet Samuel did not deny the fact of his sons' misrule; probably it was a more bitter sore to his heart than to any other. Yet personal feeling did not influence him in his relations with the people; his burden was between his own soul and God, but we are distinctly told that "the thing displeased Samuel, when they said, Give us a king to judge us." These few words are sufficient to show us that God's honor was dearer to Samuel than that of either son or daughter. We have known fathers (zealous winners of souls) so touchy when the least fault has been found with their sons or daughters, whether they were to blame or not, that regardless of the honor of God, and His exhortations to "resist not evil" (Matt. 5: 39), and "to endure grief, suffering wrongfully" (1 Pet. 2: 19), they have insisted on satisfaction being done them by man, just as though God had nothing to do with it. Not so Samuel; he bore the rebuke in silence as from God; and when his heart was grieved that the people desired a king, he neither argued the matter with the people nor attempted to justify himself or his sons; he "prayed unto the Lord." Here was the strength of Samuel's life, he made his every cause God's cause, and thus lived unentangled with the burdens and cares which come upon so many.

But what of the children of Israel who desired a king to judge them

LIKE THE NATIONS?

True, they had cause for complaint; true, the sons of Samuel were culpable in the extreme; but their proposed remedy was to get nearer to the world, to have the line of separation which removed them from other nations broken down, and to be governed by man instead of immediately by God Himself! Unless the heart of man is really surrendered to God, there is nothing which he so much dreads as close contact with God; but when the heart is really given up to Him, there is nothing which gives such joy, as the being thrown off from all else upon God. The children of Israel did not cry unto the Lord, and leave Him to find the cure for their trouble—they went to Samuel to ask for a remedy of their own devising. Oh, if we trust the love of God, shall we not let Him find the remedy for our every evil? He who has heaven and earth at His command, and whose resources are infinite?

The Lord's answer to Samuel was one of intense sympathy with him, but of wounded love as regarded the people, "Hearken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee; for they have not rejected thee, but they have that I should not reign over them." Samuel was only God's servant, His spokesman and interpreter to the people; they might look on their rebellion as being only against Samuel, God reckoned it against Himself. It is easy for man to put God out of the question, but He does not put Himself out of the question. When a son rebels against a parent, he is rebelling against the God who created that relationship; when a pupil rebels against his teacher, he is guilty of insubordination against God; when a servant rebels against her employer, it is God's authority which she sets at naught; and so with all other authority, we cannot deal with man apart from God, "Do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the Lord" (Jer. 23: 24).

There must have been a sweetness and yet a sadness in the wonderful fellowship with Samuel which the Lord manifested when He continued, "According to all the works which they have done since the day that I brought them up out of Egypt even unto this day, wherewith they have forsaken Me, and served other gods, so do they also unto thee." How much sweeter to Samuel was this assurance from God Himself that He was only sharing the very treatment of God, that His very suffering was a separation from all others unto Him—how incomparably sweeter than would have been any attempt to justify himself or his sons, or to stand up for his own petty rights! Oh, what dignity there was in the old man! sharing sorrow and contempt with God above personal burdens, that he might bear the burden of the Lord with Him!

Had Samuel given way to pique or to personal feeling, he might easily have warned the people, on his own account, that they were choosing against their own interests, but it was not until God told him to do so that Samuel alluded to this. God said, "Now therefore hearken unto their voice: howbeit yet protest solemnly unto them, and show them the manner of the king that shall reign over them." Then Samuel warned the people, but only in the words which God had spoken to him; he warned them of the self-seeking, and the oppression it would bring upon all classes; how the taxes would increase; for in addition to paying tithes to the Levites, they would have to pay tithes to the king, "He will take the tenth of your seed, and of your vineyards, and give to his officers, and to his servants; . . . he will take the tenth of your sheep: and ye shall be his servants." And the prophet further continued, "And ye shall cry out in that day because of your king which ye shall have chosen you; and the Lord will not hear you in that day."

THE DESPOTISM, OF MONARCHY,

In spite of this strong, solemn warning, "the people refused to obey the voice of Samuel;" they had set their heart on having a king to reign over them, and nothing would turn them from it. Oh, how often are those words made true in experience, "He gave them their request; but sent leanness into their soul" (Ps. 106: 15). The people said,

"NAY; BUT WE WILL have a king over us; that we also may be like all the nations; and that our king may judge us, and go out before us, and fight our battles." God had spoken to His people by Moses and promised them that they should be "a peculiar treasure unto Him above all nations (Ex. 19: 6), "a special people unto Himself above all people that are upon the face of the earth (Deut. 7: 6); "the Lord your God which goeth before you, He shall fight for you" (Deut. 1: 30). The people were now despising this privilege of being peculiar and separate, by choosing a fallible king before the infallible God to judge them, a weak man before the Almighty God to fight for them. Yet were they worse than many believers? Oh, how many rely much more readily on visible man than on the unseen God for help in times of poverty, sickness, trial, or mourning?

"Samuel heard all the words of the people, and he rehearsed them in the ears of the Lord. And the Lord said to Samuel, Hearken unto their voice, and make them a king. And Samuel said unto the men of Israel, Go ye every man unto his city." Thus the people had their way; from this time they were more like the nations; the immediate interventions of God on their behalf as a nation grew fewer, the distance between them as a nation and their God grew greater; henceforth there was much more of display both of power and glory, but less of the arm of the Lord made bare. God keep us from having our own will. Amen.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The People of the Spanish Capital have been highly incensed by the insult offered to their king in the streets of Paris. Irritation against France spread rapidly through all classes in Madrid, and the excitement throughout the week was intense. Even the opposition party in the Cortes were loud and persistent in urging that a demand for a full and complete apology should be formally presented to the French Government. M. Ferry, the French Prime Minister, promised that when the Chambers assembled an ample public statement should be made, and that the apology which President Grévy presented to the king in Paris should be published in the official journal. With this the Spanish Government appears to be satisfied. It is, nevertheless, apparent that the incident has estranged the good feeling hitherto existing between the two countries.

Germany has Taken up the Quarrel between France and Spain. In a communication to the French Government Prince Bismarck calls attention to the fact that Alfonso's unpopularity was not personal, but was caused by his recent acceptance of a complimentary appointment in the German army, and that the weight of opprobrium was directed against the Uhlan rather than the King. The tone of the communication is one of warning, if not of menace, and brings new humiliation upon France. The incident has increased German influence at Madrid, a result which it is probable the astute German Chancellor foresaw when the Uhlan Colonelcy was conferred on the Spanish King. The isolation of France in Europe is thus extended, while the foreign policy of M. Ferry and his colleagues is adapted to increase rather than dissipate the ill-feeling of other nations.

The Crisis in the Danubian Principalities continues. King Milan has dissolved the chambers before they commenced work. They organized by electing a Radical president and vice-president, which demonstrated the strength of the majority. Then the mandate of the king was received ending the deliberations. The correspondent of the New York Herald at Belgrade says: "The dissolution is due to the great success of the radical party in the recent elections for members of the Skuptchina. The government would have experienced a complete defeat but for the provision of the constitution permitting it to nominate forty members of the chamber. Out of the remaining one hundred and twenty seats, the opposition—that is, the Radicals and Ristic party—carried fifty-seven against only thirty-four that fell to ministerial candidates. Of the seventeen independent and twelve disputed elections about half went to the opposition, which thus numbered over seventy." The real significance of the movement is not in the local issues, which are comparatively trivial, but in the possibility of complications resulting between Russia and Austria, who are watching the situation with jealous rivalry.

O'Donnell, who Murdered Carey in South African waters, adheres to his story that the murder was committed in self-defence, though contradicted by all the witnesses. He has made a statement in which he emphatically denies that he was sent to murder Carey. He says that he and Carey were sitting together in the cabin of the steamer; that Carey began to fasten a quarrel upon him, when O'Donnell remarked about the rumor that Power (by which name Carey shipped) was Carey, whereupon Carey and he started up, each with a pistol drawn. O'Donnell gripped Carey's collar with his left hand, but being paralyzed, lost his grasp. Carey then crushed him down against the end of a table, putting his pistol in O'Donnell's face. O'Donnell grasped the pistol and fired his own, Carey's weapon falling on the floor six feet away. Carey ran, partly stooping, to pick it up, when O'Donnell fired again, not deliberately, but to save his life. According to O'Donnell's statement the story of Carey's son that he took his father's pistol from a bag after the shooting is untrue; he took it off the floor. This story is generally discredited, and the belief prevails that O'Donnell was sent by the Irish assassination societies to murder his victim. General Roger Pryor, of Brooklyn, has been sent to England to assist in the defence of O'Donnell.

Severe Commericial Distress Prevails in Ireland. The Irish correspondent of the New York Times cables that there is a financial crisis which is attributed to the great depression in trade circles, the result of the continuous ferment in which the country has been kept by the action of Mr. Parnell. The banks are exceedingly cautious. Loans are very difficult to obtain, sales are chiefly for cash, and business is thus extremely limited. However much the farmers may have profited by the no-rent policy, it has been most severely felt in Belfast and other manufacturing centres. The ruin which has overwhelmed the great bulk of the gentry is now felt by the shop-keepers, and has diminished their purchases from the manufacturers. This has caused the curtailment of manufacturing, and has consequently reacted upon the working classes. The result has been an extraordinary outburst of feeling, which seems to have re-lit the historical hatred between the Protestants and Catholics. The windows of a convent were smashed by the mob, as well as those of two newspapers devoted to the home-rule policy.

An Important Parliamentary Election Took place last week in England. The Conservative member of the House of Commons from Manchester died, and in the election of his successor the Liberals agreed not to oppose Mr. Houldsworth, who was nominated by the Conservative party; but a contest was forced by a Radical lawyer, Dr. Parkhurst, who made a direct bid for the Irish vote by promising to vote for Home Rule in Ireland and to support Mr. Parnell. He obtained Mr. Parnell's approval, but the Liberals left him severely alone, and he was miserably beaten by a vote of three to one. The smallness of the Irish vote, which turned out in obedience to Mr. Parnell, caused considerable surprise in all quarters, as large numbers of Irish live in Manchester and have votes. Mr. Parnell predicted that the Radical candidate would receive 10,000 Irish votes, but his entire following, comprising English Radicals and Irish Parnellites, was less than 3000.

The Foreign Residents of Canton Apprehend an outbreak against them of the Chinese population. In a cable despatch from Hong Kong, dated October 3d, the writer says: "I have just returned from Canton. Affairs there are in a very critical condition. The populace is greatly excited over the result of the Logan trial. Communication between the English quarter and the city is entirely cut off. Incendiary placards are posted on the walls of the viceroy's palace daily, and are torn down by the police. They proclaim that, should the French fleet threaten an attack, the mob first of all will kill all foreigners and destroy their property. The mob is ripe for rebellion. Mandarins of the highest rank are insulted and spit upon while going through the city. Troops are being drawn from the outlying forts to guard the palace of the viceroy." A fleet of gunboats in the harbor protects the foreign quarter, and arms have been supplied to the merchants and their clerks.

The Commemoration of Martin Luther's birth on November 10th will be observed in England. An influential committee has been appointed to arrange for an appropriate celebration. The General and Executive Committees consist of representatives of all the leading Protestant denominations, including no fewer than twenty-eight of the principal religious societies. There are nine Honoraray Secretaries and six Honorary Acting Secretaries, representative of the various sections of Protestantism. Mr. George Williams, the friend of young men, is treasurer. The organization is now complete. The Rev. Dr. Bonar has composed a beautiful hymn for the occasion, and at the invitation of the committee the Rev Dr. Bullinger has set this hymn, as well as Mr. Martin Tupper's spirited verses to music. Dr. Bonar has also drawn up topics of praise and thanksgiving for the commemoration on the 10th of November.

The Trial of the Imprisoned Leaders of the Salvation Army in Switzerland has resulted in their acquittal. Miss Booth and Miss Charlesworth and four members of the army were charged with disturbing the peace. They pleaded in defence that they simply obeyed the dictates of their conscience. The public prosecutor demanded that they should be sentenced in accordance with the law. The accused persons were found not guilty, and were discharged from custody. A public meeting has been called to demand the expulsion of the army.

The Number of Liquor Stores Owned by the English Episcopal Church is still in debate in England. Canon Wilberforce, whose indefatigable efforts to induce the Church authorities to rid themselves of the property have caused the dispute, still insists that a very large number of saloons are owned by the Church. His view is supported by a vicar who, in a letter to the London Times, says: "I am incumbent of an agricultural parish, of which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are lords of the manor, impropriators of the great tithes, and owners of property bringing them in 3000*l.* ($15,000) a year. In one part of the parish they own a public-house only 230 yards distant from another public-house. The number of houses within 'drinkable' distance of both is under forty. Something may be said for the other public-houses as being required for the accommodation of travellers on the high road, but nothing for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners' beerhouse. The farmers would be glad enough to see both abolished as tending to the ruin and dismissal of many of their laborers." The commissioners pay the vicar less than $1500 a year for his services in the parish.

A Chinese Leper Evangelist.—One of the devoted missionaries of the China Inland Mission speaks, in a recent letter home, of a man—a leper—in a town, Fuh-Kien, in South China, who travelled on foot a hundred miles from his home to the Mission Hospital, to be treated for his disease, not to be cured, but to have his sufferings relieved; for they cannot cure the leprosy. His name is Achee. He went away back to his native village, having been led to accept Christ as his much-needed Saviour and Comforter. He at once, with his heart overflowing with love, gathered around him his fellow-villagers, and told them the grand old Gospel story. Two years afterward a catechist was wanted to go down and tell them more of the doctrine. The agents of the mission found twenty villagers gathered in the house of this poor leper to hear the Word of God, and some of them have been led to the pierced feet of Christ, and found forgiveness and eternal life in His atoning work.

Volume V. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times is now ready, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1882 with complete index. Price $3 including postage. Ten per cent less to ministers and the trade.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

MR. HENRY M. STANLEY, the famous special correspondent of the New York Herald, whose feat in crossing Africa and discovering Livingstone first brought his name prominently before the public, is forty-three years of age. A portrait taken of him when he was in this country some twenty years ago appears this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mr. Stanley's energetic labors and daring explorations have opened up a region unknown before, and have enabled the Christian Church to send missionaries to enlighten the benighted inhabitants. He has carried forward the work Dr. Livingstone commenced, and his labors entitle him to the gratitude of all Christendom.

Mr. Henry M. Stanley was

in 1840. So poor were his parents that at the age of three years, the future explorer was admitted into the poor house of St. Asaph, where he remained until he was thirteen years of age. He received a fair education in that institution, and for two years he acted as assistant teacher in the school. But school-teaching had no attractions for such a temperament as that of Stanley. He threw up his appointment and started out to see the world. He obtained sufficient means to travel to Liverpool, where he took service as a cabin-boy on board a ship bound for the Mediterranean.

The restraints and monotony of sea-faring life soon became irksome to him, and he resolved to desert the ship. He tied up a small bundle of clothing and secured it to his belt, and then dived overboard. (See frontispiece.) But in swimming ashore, his bundle of clothing was lost, and on landing he was nearly naked. Friendless and penniless he begged on the highway until one day meeting a sea captain he was offered another cabin-boy's place on a vessel bound for New Orleans. On his arrival on American soil he soon found friends. A merchant named Stanley especially took a fancy to the bright, intelligent lad, adopted him as his own son, and sent him to school. Henceforward the boy bore the name of his benefactor instead of his own, which was John Rowlands.

He had been assured that he would inherit the wealth of his benefactor, but in 1861, when the merchant died it was found that he had left no will, and the young man found himself at his majority penniless. The war was then raging, and Stanley entered the Confederate service. In one of the early battles of the war he was taken prisoner, but his period of confinement was brief. He had not been long enough in the country to have any profound sympathy with the cause for which he had been fighting, and when an offer was made him to enter the Federal service he promptly accepted it. He was present at the battles of Fort Donelson, Fort Henry, and Pittsburg Landing. His time in the army having expired, he engaged as a newspaper correspondent, and thus witnessed several battles on the Potomac, and the capture of Fort Fisher. On the conclusion of the war, Mr. Stanley received an offer to continue his services on the press, and in that capacity travelled through the Western territories as a newspaper correspondent.

But the spirit of adventure was strong in him, and instead of travelling homeward by the ordinary way he built a raft, and with a companion of his own age, floated down the Platte River to the Missouri River, a distance of over seven hundred miles. (See frontispiece.)

THE FAR EAST.

Arriving in New York, he remained but a brief period. He resolved to endeavor to proceed across Asia, via Smyrna, with two friends. After penetrating three hundred miles into the interior, reaching Afium Kara Hissar, he and his companions were robbed of $6000 by the Koords, and were obliged to go back to Constantinople to get redress, in which they succeeded. Returning again to America, he was engaged by the Missouri Democrat and New York Tribune to accompany the Indian Peace Commissions and Hancock's military expedition against the Kiowas and Cheyennes.

WAR CORRESPONDENT.

When the British campaign in Abyssinia began in 1867, he was engaged by the New York Herald as its correspondent to accompany the British army. Having shown considerable aptitude and energy during this campaign, he was shortly afterward requested to proceed to Crete and describe the state of affairs there during the rebellion. Thence he went to Spain, which at that time was in the throes of revolution, and when that movement terminated, he was ordered to Egypt to await Dr. Livingstone's arrival, who was then reported as coming home. Getting tired of waiting, in October, 1869, he was again sent to Spain by the proprietor of the Herald, to report progress on the Republican revolutionists. He went to Valencia, which was then being besieged, and thence to Madrid, where he received which has since become famous, to "come to Paris" to see Mr. Bennett, some of the subsequent circumstances of which we shall refer to presently.

He had, however, first to attend the inauguration of the Suez Canal, to go up the Nile, then to Jerusalem, then to Damascus, Smyrna, Constantinople, the Crimea, Southern Russia, Ural Mountains, Trebizond, Tifers, through the Caucasus to interview Stoletozf at Bakou, across the Caspian Sea to Krasnavodsk, then through Persia via Teheran, Ispahan, Persepolis, Bushire, Bagdad, Muscat, India, Mauritius, Seychelles, Zanzibar, and thus to Central Africa in 1871, happily reaching Ujiji but twenty-five days after Livingstone arrived. For the past four years Mr. Stanley has been exploring the region of the Congo, in interior Africa, under the liberal auspices and through the royal generosity of the King of the Belgians. Such is the brief story of a life of travel and adventure. Though only forty-three years of age Mr. Stanley's journeys aggregate 150,000 miles.

A MEMORABLE COMMISSION.

It was on October 16th, 1869, that Mr. Stanley was resting at Madrid, after his exhausting professional duties as a special correspondent at the siege of Valencia, previously referred to, when he received a laconic telegram. It read, "Come to Paris on important business." The telegram was from Mr. James Gordon Bennett, the proprietor of the New York Herald. "Down came my pictures from the walls of my apartments on the second floor," says Mr. Stanley, "into my trunks went my books and souvenirs, my clothes were hastily collected, some half washed, some from the clothes-line half dry, and after a couple of hours of hasty hard work, my portmanteaux were strapped up and labelled, Paris."

Mr. Stanley arrived at Paris the following night, and went straight to the "Grand Hotel," to keep his appointment with Mr. Bennett. Mr. Bennett asked, "'Where do you think Livingstone is?' 'I really do not know, sir.' 'Do you think he is alive?' 'He may be, and he may not be,' I answered. 'Well, I think he is alive, and that he can be found, and I am going to send you to find him.'

"'What!' said I, 'do you really think I can find Dr. Livingstone? Do you mean me to go to Central Africa?' 'Yes; I mean that you shall go and find him, wherever you may hear that he is, and to get what news you can of him, and perhaps he may be in want; take enough with you to help him should he require it. Of course, you will act according to your own plans, and do what you think best—but find Livingstone.'

THE COST OF THE JOURNEY.

"Wondering at the cool order of sending one to Central Africa to search for a man whom I, in common with almost all other men, believed to be dead, I inquired, 'Have you considered seriously the great expense you are likely to incur on account of this little journey?' 'What will it cost?' he rejoined abruptly. 'Burton and Speke's journey to Central Africa cost from $15,000 to $25,000, and I fear it cannot be done under $12,500.' 'Well,' replied Mr. Bennett, 'I will tell you what you will do. Draw $5000 now; and when you have gone through that, draw another $5000, and when that is spent, draw another $5000, and when you have finished that, draw another $5000, and so on—but find Livingstone.'"

In the month of August, 1870, Mr. Stanley arrived in India, whence he sailed for Zanzibar on the eastern coast of Africa. He arrived there on January 6th, 1871, having with him W. L. Farquhar, an excellent navigator, and an Arab boy whom he had engaged at Jerusalem, en route, as interpreter.

THE EXPEDITION ORGANIZED.

Zanzibar is the chief commercial emporium of East Africa. It is the great mart to which go the ivory traders from the African interior. To this market come the gum-copal, the hides, the timber, and the slaves. "The land," says Stanley, "is only semi-African in aspect; the city contains so large a number of Muscat Arabs that it is in character fully semi-Arabian." About two-thirds of the entire population are negroes, either enslaved or free.

It was at this place that Stanley organized his expedition for the interior of the Dark Continent. Having collected necessary material for his journey, he beheld his purchases piled up, tier after tier, row upon row, here a mass of cooking utensils, there bundles of rope, tents, saddles, a pile of portmanteaux and boxes, and he was somewhat astonished at his own temerity. There were at least six tons of luggage! "How will it ever be possible," he thought, "to move all this inert-mass across the wilderness stretching between the sea and the great lakes of Africa?" somewhere amid which he believed Livingstone, if alive, to be. But to start without stores would have been foolish and would have involved certain disaster. Carriers were therefore engaged, and twenty-eight days from the date of his arrival at Zanzibar, Stanley bade farewell to the European and American Consuls, and the following day he and his escort and accessories embarked in four dhows for Bagamoyo, a distance of about twenty-five miles, and which was safely reached ten hours afterward. A brief delay for final preparation, and then commenced the march to Unyanyembe. There were in all one hundred and ninety-two persons in the expedition; and on March 21st, the fifth caravan, led by Stanley himself, left the town for the journey westward.

CARAVANS ON THE MARCH.

Steadily tramping onward, facing difficulties and braving perils, crossing morasses, fording shallow streams, and swimming broad muddy rivers, harassed by the defections of his followers, the resistance of suspicious or avaricious natives, and often prostrated by fever, Stanley pressed on. He marched to Ugogo, through Unyanyembe, arriving toward the end of October at Ukawendi, where he entered the thickly wooded region through which the Mtambu flows, and which he designates as

"THE HOME OF LION AND LEOPARD."

Having reached Uvinza on November 3d, a caravan of eighty Waguhha, a tribe which occupies a tract of country on the south-western side of Lake Tanganika, was seen approaching from the direction of Ujiji. "We asked the news," says Stanley, "and were told a white man had just arrived at Ujiji from Manyuema. This news startled us all. 'A white man?' we asked. 'Yes, a white man,' they replied. 'How is he dressed?' 'Like the master,' they answered, referring to me. 'Is he young, or old?' 'He is old. He has white hair on his face, and is sick.' 'Where has he come from?' 'From a very far country beyond Uguhha, called Manyuema.' 'Indeed! and is he stopping at Ujiji now?' 'Yes, we saw him about eight days ago.' 'Do you think he will stop there until we see him?' 'Don't know.' 'Was he ever at Ujiji before?' 'Yes, he went away a long time ago.'

THIS IS LIVINGSTONE!"

Such was Stanley's conclusion, and he at once addressed his men, and asked them if they were willing to march to Ujiji without a single halt, promising them extra pay if they acceded to his wishes. All answered in the affirmative, almost as much rejoiced as Stanley was himself, and with intense eagerness the journey immediately recommenced.

At length there dawned for Stanley the day of his long-anticipated triumph. It was November 10th, the two hundred and thirty-sixth day from Bagamoyo, and the fifty-first day from Unyanyembe. Early on "that happy, glorious morning" as the traveller calls it, Lake Tanganika was sighted—an immense broad sheet, a burnished bed of silver, lucid canopy of blue above, lofty mountains and palm forests surrounding it. They push on rapidly, and soon there is a distance of only five hundred yards between them and Ujiji. At this moment they do not think of the hundreds of miles they have marched, or of the hundreds of hills that they have ascended and descended, or of the many forests they have traversed, or of the jungles and thickets that annoyed them, or of the fervid, salt plains that blistered their feet, or of the hot sun that scorched them, nor of their host of dangers and difficulties, now happily surmounted!

THE TRIUMPH.

This is how their leader speaks of it:

"At last the sublime hour has arrived; our dreams, our hopes, and anticipations are now about to be realized! Our hearts and our feelings are with our eyes, as we peer into the palms and try to make out in which hut or house lives the 'white man with the gray beard' we heard about when we were at the Malagarazi. 'Unfurl your flags, and load your guns!' 'One, two, three—fire!' A volley from nearly fifty guns roars like a salute from a battery of artillery; we shall note its effect presently on the peaceful-looking village below. Before we had gone a hundred yards the people of Ujiji rushed up in hundreds to meet us. We were surrounded by them, and almost deafened with their shouts of welcome—'Yambo, yambo, bana! Yambo, bana!'

SUSI, LIVINGSTONE'S SERVANT.

"Suddenly I hear a voice on my right say, 'Good-morning, sir!' Startled at hearing this greeting in the midst of such a crowd of black people, I turn sharply round in search of the man, and see him at my side, with the blackest of faces, but animated and joyous—a man dressed in a long white shirt, with a white turban around his woolly head, and I ask: 'Who in the world are you?' 'I am Susi, the servant of Dr Livingstone,' he said, smiling, and showing a gleaming row of teeth. 'What! Is Dr. Livingstone here?' 'Yes, sir.' 'In this village?' 'Yes, sir.' 'Now, you Susi, run, and tell the Doctor I am coming.' 'Yes, sir,' and off he darted at once with a speed that was remarkable.

"Soon Susi came running back and asked me my name; he had told the Doctor I was coming, but the Doctor was too surprised to believe him, and when the Doctor asked him my name, Susi was rather staggered. But during Susi's absence the news had been conveyed to the Doctor that it was surely a white man that was coming, whose guns were firing, and whose flag could be seen; and the great Arab magnates of Ujiji had gathered together before the Doctor's house, and he himself had come out from his veranda to discuss the matter and wait my arrival.

INTERVIEW WITH DR. LIVINGSTONE.

"My heart beat fast, but I did that which I thought was most dignified under such extraordinary circumstances. I pushed back the crowds, and passing from the rear, walked down a living avenue of people, until I came in front of the semicircle of Arabs, before which stood 'the white man with the gray beard.' As I advanced slowly toward him I noticed that he was pale, that he looked wearied and wan, that he had gray whiskers and mustache, that he wore a bluish cloth cap with a faded gold band on a red ground round it, and that he had on a red-sleeved waistcoat, and a pair of gray tweed trousers. I would have run to him, only I was a coward in the presence of such a mob; so I walked deliberately to him, took off my hat, and said, 'Dr. Livingstone, I presume?' 'Yes,' he said, with a kind, cordial smile, lifting his cap slightly. I replaced my hat on my head, and he replaced his cap, and we both grasped hands. (See frontispiece.) I then said aloud, 'I thank God, Doctor, I have been permitted to see you.' He reverently answered, 'I feel thankful that I am here to welcome you.'"

After this Livingstone and the man who had travelled so far to find him retired to converse. It was long since Livingstone had seen a white face and he had much to ask, and Stanley had much to tell. The gifts, too, which Stanley had with him were very welcome, and Dr. Livingstone accepted them gratefully. The two men parted with mutual esteem, Livingstone to continue his exploration and Stanley to return home. Never again did Livingstone behold a white face. He died in the African wilds, having given his life to the cause he loved. Fatigue, exposure, and the intense tropical heat did their fatal work, and one morning he was found on his knees, dead, his last words uttered in the ear of the God whom he had faithfully served.

In 1877, Mr. Stanley received a joint-commission from the proprietors of the New York Herald and the London Daily Telegraph, to conduct in Central Africa. In the course of his explorations he came to Bumbireh Island, in Lake Victoria Nyanza. Its king is tributary to Mtesa, Emperor of Uganda. It was at this place that Mr. Stanley had a hairbreadth escape from massacre, and the account is thus related by himself:

"We coasted along on its eastern shore, looking out for a quiet cove, in doing which, had not hunger blinded us, we ought to have been warned from the evidences of excitement we saw that the Bumbireh natives were more disposed to ill-treat us rather than sell us food. However, my hunger-bitten people, now deaf to all considerations of safety, impelled us to a quiet cove at the south-eastern end. The natives cunningly moderated their excitement as we approached, and hesitated near the beach, and smilingly came toward us, until they were knee-deep, when they laid their hands upon the boat, and gently pulled it, as they retreated backward up the beach. As soon as they felt the boat's keel touch the ground they became more amiable than ever, and their demeanor was one of extravagant delight and friendliness.

"It did not take long for a force of two hundred to collect, as the war-cries had pealed over the hills from the first moment they sighted us. They were now strong and confident in numbers, but their demeanor changed in an instant; they laid hold of the boat while we were still seated, and drew her up by main force over the hard, rocky shore, until she was twenty or thirty feet high and dry on land. Then began

A SCENE ALMOST INDESCRIBABLE.

"Twelve captives, including myself, were in their power to wreak their worst passions upon, and how we escaped death, when every bow was drawn to its utmost, and every spear quivered in the hand, as though in the act to launch, and clubs were whirled menacingly round their heads, is more than I can say. Our lives were not worth a moment's purchase. Yet while I took a hard breath to bear and endure the worst, neither arrow flew, nor spear was launched, nor club thrown. A chief named Shekka had come, whom we afterward found out to be the king of the island, and he, with great ostentation, struck his stick on the boat, and announced that such a capture demanded 'talk.'

"About fifty of the principal men went aside about twenty yards to discuss the matter. But these could not agree, and they all rose up with the full intent to murder. I laid my hands upon my revolvers, and kept my eyes open, keenly alive to all that was passing, and those bows drawn tautest received special attention. The steadiness of my looks disconcerted them, and again bows were unstrung, but if they could not make up their minds to despatch us at once, it did not restrain them from acting in the most brutal, wild manner. They seized my hair and tugged it vengefully; one of my men received a severe blow on the head, another received a savage poke in the ribs with the iron end of a spear.

ESCAPE FROM THE SAVAGES.

"Discussion after discussion followed as to what next, and our lives were protracted until 3 P.M., when the big drum summoned all the natives to war. They were kind enough to notify us that they intended to cut our throats, and to tell us in a scornful manner to get ready. We had often given valuable presents, and would have given every cloth in the boat had they demanded it. The final preparations, however, were not to be mistaken, and my instinct warned me that the time had arrived to act. 'Boys, be careful what you answer me. Do you think you could shove this boat in the water, to save your lives?'

"They all replied in a positive manner in the affirmative. I sent Safeni forward to the mustering bands with a fine cloth that I had reserved for a last trial, and the men took their positions carelessly along the sides of the boat. After allowing Safeni time to proceed about twenty paces from us, and seeing that their attention was attracted by his movements, I shouted out 'Push!'

"As soon as I felt the boat begin to move I called out to Safeni, who turned round, and came bounding toward us. But we were soon observed. The distance was nothing, and down the natives poured toward us. The boat was shot into the water. Safeni was just about plunging into the lake when I observed a couple of tall savages in the act, about ten paces from him, of throwing their spears. I hesitated no longer. The two were shot, and we were saved.

"Furious at being baffled, the savages swarmed into three canoes close by, and chased us as we were paddling with the bottom boards of the boat which we tore up. Perceiving that we could never hope to escape with such improvised paddles, I ordered them to cease, and waited for them. Two of the advancing canoes were smashed, and the third was obliged to hasten ashore in a sinking condition. Days of famine, days of suffering, vexation, annoyance, and sickness followed the exposure we were put to after our flight from Bumbireh Island."

Mr. Stanley is now again in Africa exploring under the auspices of the King of Belgium. A letter received by one of his friends last week from him is dated from the Congo, July 14th, and announces, among other interesting details, of his election to

A PECULIAR OFFICE.

Mr. Stanley tells of his mediation between two tribes which were at war, and which, when peace was brought about by his efforts, elected him "Father and mother of their country," a distinction which he also received from another tribe. Mr. Stanley says he enjoys the most robust health, and, in fact, is as strong as ever.

LOOK at it—the sacred chest of the ancients. It was about five feet long, three feet wide and three feet high. It was within and out of pure gold. On the top of it stood two angels facing each other with outspread wings. In that sacred box was the law, and there were in it a great many precious stones. With that box went the fate of the nation. Carried in front of the host, the waters of the Jordan parted. Divinely charged, costly, precious,

MOMENTOUS BOX.

No unholy hands might lay hold of it. It was called the ark of the covenant. But you will understand it was a box, the most precious box of the ages. Where is it now? Gone forever. Not a crypt of church or museum of the world has a fragment of it.

But is not this nation God's chosen people? Have we not passed through the Red Sea? Have we not been led with a pillar of fire by night? Has this nation no ark of the covenant? Yes. The ballot-box, the sacred chest of the nation,

THE ARK OF THE AMERICAN COVENANT.

In it is the law, in it is the divine and the human will, in it is the fate of the nation. Carried in front of our host again and again the waters of national trouble have parted. Mighty ark of the covenant, the American ballot-box! It is

A VERY OLD BOX.

In Athens, long before the art of printing, the people dropped pebbles into it to give expression to their sentiments. After that, beans were dropped into it—a white bean for the affirmative, a black bean for the negative. After that when they wished to vote a man out of citizenship they would write his name upon a shell and drop that into the box.

O'Connell and Grote and Cobden and Macaulay and Gladstone fought great battles in the introduction of the ballot-boxes in England, and to-day it is one of the fastnesses of that nation. It is one of the corner-stones of our government. It is older than the constitution. In it is our national safety. Tell me what will be the fate of the American ballot-box, the ark of the American covenant, and I will tell you what will be the fate of this nation. Give the people once a year or once in four years an opportunity to express their political sentiments, and you practically avoid insurrection and revolution.

Either give them the ballot, or they will take the sword. Without the ballot-box there can be no free republican institutions. Milton visiting in Italy noticed that on the sides of Vesuvius gardeners and farmers were at work while the volcano was in eruption, and he asked them if they were safe. "Yes," said the farmers and the gardeners, "it is safe; all the danger is before the eruption; then come earthquake and terror, but just as soon as the volcano begins to pour forth lava we all feel at rest." It is the suppression of political sentiment, the suppression of public opinion that makes moral earthquake and national earthquake. Let public opinion pour forth, and that gives satisfaction, and that gives peace, and that gives permanency to good govenment. And yet, though the ballot-box is the sacred chest and the ark of the American covenant, you know as well as I know it has its sworn antagonists, and I propose this morning in God's name and as a Christian patriot to set before you the names of some of the sworn enemies of this sacred chest, the ark of the American covenant, the ballot-box.

THE FOES OF THE BALLOT-BOX.

I. First, I remark, ignorance is a mighty foe. Other things being equal, the more intelligence a man has the better he is qualified to exercise the right of suffrage. You have been ten, fifteen, twenty, thirty years studying American institutions, you have canvassed all the great questions about tariff and home rule and all the educational questions, and everything in American politics you are well acquainted with. You consider yourself competent to cast a vote in November, and you are competent. You will take your position in the line of electors, you will wait for your term to come, the judge of election will announce your name, you will cast your vote and pass out. Well done.

But right behind you there will come a man who cannot spell the name of controller, or attorney, or mayor. He cannot write, or if he can write he uses a small "I" for the personal pronoun. He could not tell on which side of the Alleghany Mountains Ohio is. Educated canary birds, educated horses know more than he. He will cast his vote, and it will balance your vote. His ignorance is as mighty as your intelligence. That is not right. All men of fair mind will acknowledge that that is not right. Until a man can read the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, and calculate the interest on the American debt, and know the difference between a republican form of government and a monarchy or a despotism, he is unfit to exercise the right of suffrage at any ballot-box between Key West and Alaska. (Applause.)

In 1872, in England, there were 2,600,000 children who ought to have been in school. There were only 1,333,000, in other words about fifty per cent, and of the fifty per cent not more than five per cent got anything worthy the name of an education. Now, take that foreign ignorance and add it to our American ignorance, and there will be in November thousands and thousands of people who are no more qualified to exercise the right of suffrage than to lecture on astronomy. How are these things to be corrected? By laws of compulsory education well executed. I go in for a law which, after giving fair warning for a few years, shall make

IGNORANCE A CRIME.

There is no excuse for ignorance on these subjects in this land, where the common schools make knowledge as free as the fresh air of heaven. I would have a board of examination seated besides the officers of registration, and let them decide whether the men who come up to vote have any capacity to be monarchs in a land where we are all monarchs. One of the most awful foes of the American ballot-box today is popular ignorance. Educate the people, give them an opportunity to know and understand what they do. If they will not take the education, deny them the vote.

II. Another powerful enemy of this sacred chest, the ark of the American covenant, the ballot-box, is

SPURIOUS VOTING.

In 1880, in Brooklyn, there were a thousand names recorded of persons who had no residence here, and if there were a thousand attempted fraudulent votes in the best city on the continent, what may we expect in cities not so fortunate? What a grand thing is the law of registration! Without it elections in this country would be a farce. There must be a scrutiny on this subject. The law must have keenest twist for the neck of repeaters. Something more than slight fine and short imprisonment. It is an attempt at the assassination of the republic, when a man attempts to put in a spurious vote. In olden times when men laid unholy hands on the ark of the covenant they dropped down dead. Witness Uzzah. And when men attempt to put unholy hands on the American ballot-box, the ark of the American covenant, they deserve extermination.

III. Another powerful foe of this sacred chest is INTIMIDATION.

Corporations sometimes demand that their employés vote in this and that way. It is skilfully done. It is not positively in so many words demanded, but the employé understands he will be frozen out of the establishment unless he votes as the firm do. So you can go into factory villages, and having found out the politics of the head men in the factory, you can tell which way the election is going. Now, that is damnable. If in any precinct in the United States a man cannot vote as he pleases, there is something awfully wrong.

How do you treat that employé who votes differently from what you do? Oh, you say you do not interfere with his right of suffrage. But you call him into your private office, and you find fault with his work, and after a while you tell him there is an uncle, or an aunt, or a niece, or a nephew that must have that position. You do not say it is because he voted this or that way, but he knows and God knows it is. If that man has given to you in hard work an equivalent for the wages you pay him, you have no right to ask anything else of him. He sold you his work; he did not sell you his political or religious principles. But you know as well as I do there is sometimes on that sacred chest, the ark of the American covenant, a shadow corporate or monopolistic.

I do not wonder at the vehemence of Lord Chief Justice Holt, of England, when he said: "Let the people vote fairly. Interference with a man's vote is in behalf of this or that party, I give you notice that if an offender against the law comes before me, I will charge the jury to make him pay well for it." No shadow plutocratic, or mobocratic, or capitalistic. Every man voting in his own way—God and his own conscience the only dictator.

IV. Another powerful foe of that sacred chest, the ark of the American covenant, the ballot-box, is BRIBERY.

You know something of the hundreds of thousands of dollars that were expended to carry Indiana in 1880. You know something of the vast sums of money expended in Brooklyn and New York in other years to carry elections. Bribery is one of the disgraces of this country. It is often the case that a man is nominated for office with reference to his capacity to provide money for the elections or with reference to his capacity to command money from others. You know the names of men who have at different times gone into the Gubernatorial chair or Congressional office buying their way all through. I tell you no news. Your patriotic heart has been pained again and again with it.

Very often it is not money that bribes, but it is office. "You make me President and I'll make you Secretary of State, or Attorney-General, or something else; you make me Governor and I'll make you Surveyor-General; you make me Mayor and I'll put you on the Water Board; you give me position and I'll give you position." That is the form of the bribe often and often in these great cities. I do not say it is in our city, but you know again and again throughout the land these have been the forms of bribe offered. So it is often the case that by the time a man comes to an office to which he has been elected, he is from the crown of head to the sole of foot mortgaged with pledges, and the man who goes to Albany or to Washington to get an office is applying for some position which was given away three months before the election. Two long lines of worm fence, one worm fence reaching to Albany and the other to Washington, and there a great many citizens astride the fence, and they are equally poised, and they are waiting to see on which side there is most emolument, and on this side they get down. But bribery kicks both ways. It kicks the man that offers it and the man that takes it. Bribery to-day you will admit to be one of the mightiest foes of the American ballot-box.

V. Another great enemy of that sacred chest is DEFAMATION OF CHARACTER.

Can you find out from the newspapers when two men are in office which is the best? How often in the autumnal elections the good man is denounced and the bad man applauded, so that you can come sometimes to no just opinion as to who is the best man, and there are hundreds and thousands of electors who go up to vote so utterly befogged they know not what they do. Is not that a fearful influence to be brought upon the ballot-box of this country? It has been so ever since the foundation of this government. Defamation of character.

Thomas Paine writes Washington a letter, and publishes it, saying: "Treacherous in all private friendship and a hypocrite in public morals, the world will be puzzled to know whether we had better call you an apostate or an impostor, and whether you abandoned good morals, or never had any." That is Thomas Paine's opinion of George Washington.

John Quincy Adams declared that he was solaced in regard to the scandals and the anathemas inflicted upon him by the fact that his father, John Adams, had to go through the same process, and John Quincy Adams declared he really thought in that present election there were men who gave their entire time to manufacturing falsehood in regard to him. Martin Van Buren was always pictorialized as a rat. Thomas H. Benton and Amos Kendall were always pictorialized as robbers with battering-rams breaking in the door of the United States Bank.

On the day on which Thomas Jefferson was inaugurated President of the United States, March 4th, 1801, the following appeared in the Sentinel of Boston: "Monumental inscription. Yesterday expired, deeply regretted by millions of grateful Americans, and by all good men, the Federal Administration of the Government of the United States, animated by Washington, Adams, Hamilton, Knox, Pickering, McHenry, Marshall, and Stoddard; aged twelve years. Its death was occasioned by the secret arts and open violence of foreign and domestic demagogues. As one tribute of gratitude in these times this monument to the talents and services of the deceased is raised by the Sentinel." Under such defamation as that Thomas Jefferson went into office.

My father told me that when Andrew Jackson was running for President of the United States, the whole land was flooded with coffin handbills—pictures of six dead men, in allusion to the six deserters whom Andrew Jackson had had shot, and all the pictorials of those times represented Jackson as taking his office from the hand of the devil.

I saw a few summers ago at Put-in-Bay, Ohio, in a museum, a prominent paper of 1844, which spoke of Henry Clay as a gambler, a libertine, and a murderer; and the manner in which he was defamed and the outrages which were heaped upon him may be well guessed from Mr. Clay's eulogy of his native State, Kentucky. He said: "When I seemed to be assailed by all the rest of the world, she interposed her broad and impenetrable shield, repelled the poisoned shafts that were aimed for my destruction, and vindicated my good name from every malignant and unfounded aspersion."

Defamation! It is

THE CURSE OF THE AMERICAN BALLOT-BOX.

Just as soon as in the great cities a man is put up for office he is made the target. The fact that he is up is prima facie evidence that he must be brought down. His public life and his private life are scrutinized, and all the electric lights are turned on. How often it is that men have gone down under such things. In every autumnal election the air is filled with carrion crows scenting carcases. Caw! Caw! Caw! There are newspapers in the United States that in the great autumnal elections take wild license for liberty. They are filled with calumny. The editorial columns of such papers reek with it; their columns are stuffed with it. There are newspapers in the United States which in the great popular elections breakfast and dine and sup on indecency. They wallow in it. Swine in the mire. They give more for one quill of filth than a whole hogshead of decent product. There are in these great autumnal elections men sitting in editorial chairs who write with a quill, not plucked from the stupid goose, or the sublime eagle, but from a turkey buzzard! Ghouls! Ghouls! They tip the city sewer into their editorial inkstands. Defamation of character is one of the curses of the American ballot-box to-day. In your great Presidential elections who can tell from what he reads who is the man he ought to vote for? Bad men sometimes applauded, good men denounced.

VI. Another powerful foe of the sacred chest, the ark of the American covenant, the ballot-box, is the

ROWDY AND DRUNKEN CAUCUS.

The ballot-box does not give any choice to a man when the nominations are made in the back part of a groggery. When the elector comes up he has to choose between two evils. In some of the cities men have come to the ballot-box to vote, and have found both names such a scaly, greasy, and stenchful crew they had no choice. You say vote for somebody outside. Then they throw away their vote. Christian men of New York and Brooklyn, honorable men, patriotic men, go and take possession of the caucuses. First having saturated your pocket handkerchief with cologne or some other disinfectant, go down to the caucus and take possession of it in the name of the Lord God Almighty and the American people, though after you come back you should have to hang your hat and coat on a line in the back yard for ventilation.

In some of the States politics have got so low that the nominees no more need good morals than they do a bath-tub. Snatch the ballot-box from such men. Where is the David who will go forth and bring the ark of the covenant back from Kirjath-jearim? Do you not think politics have got to a pretty low ebb in our day when a Tweed could be sent to the Legislature of New York, and a John Morrissey, the prince of gamblers, could be sent to the American Congress?

Now, how are these things to be remedied? Some say by a property qualification. They say that after a man gets a certain amount of property—a certain amount of real estate—he is financially interested in good government, and he becomes cautious and conservative. I reply, a property qualification would shut off from the ballot-box a great many of the best men in this land. Literary men are almost always poor. A pen is a good implement to make the world better, but it is a very poor implement to get a livelihood ordinarily. I have known scores of literary men who never owned a foot of ground and never will own a foot of ground until they get under it. Professors of colleges, teachers of schools, editors of newspapers, ministers of religion, qualified in every possible way to vote, yet no worldly success. There has been many a man who has not had a house on earth who will have a mansion in heaven.

There are many who through accidents of fortune have come to great success while they are profound in their stupidity, as profound in their stupidity as a man of large fortune with whom I was crossing the ocean, who told me he was going to see the dykes of Scotland! When a member of my family asked a lady on her return from Europe if she had seen Mont Blanc, she replied: "Well, really, I don't know; is that in Europe?" Ignorance by the square foot. Property qualification will not do. The only way these evils will be eradicated will be by more thorough legal defence of the ballot-box and a more thorough moralization and Christianization of the people. That ark of the covenant was carried into captivity to Kirjath-jearim, but one day the people hooked oxen to a cart, and they put this ark on the cart, and the cart was taken to Jerusalem—the ark of the covenant coming with the shouting and thanksgiving of the people. And though the American ballot-box, the ark of the American covenant, our sacred chest, has been carried again and again into captivity by fraud and iniquity and spurious voting, I believe it will be brought back yet by prayer and by Christian consecration, and will be set down in the midst of the temple of Christian patriotism. Whose responsibility? Yours and mine.

A poor soldier went to a hairdresser in London. He wanted to get back to the army. He had overrun his furlough, and he wanted some help to get back in quick transit. The money was given to the poor soldier, who said to the man who had offered the kindness: "I have nothing to give you in return but this little worn-out receipt for making blacking." He gave it, not thinking there was any value in it especially, and the man who took it did not suppose there was any special value in it; but it yielded the man who took it $2,500,000, and was the foundation of one of the greatest estates in England. And that little vote, that insignificant vote which you take out of your pocket—insignificant in your sight and insignificant in the sight of others—may start an influence that will last all through the progress of this government.

I charge you, then, as American citizens to remember your responsibility on the first Tuesday of November. It will begin early,

THE SNOW-STORM OF SUFFRAGES.

It will snow all day—snow on until noon, snow on until night. The flakes will fall in every town and village and neighborhood, the white flakes. The octogenarian will come up, his hand trembling, and with spectacled eye he will scrutinize the vote and drop it and pass on. The young man who has been waiting for his time will come up, and proudly and blushingly deposit his first vote and pass on. The capitalist will come up with diamonded finger, and the laborer with hard fist, and the one vote will be as good as the other. Snow-storm of suffrages. when these white flakes will be gathered together and compacted into an avalanche that will slide down in expression of the will of the people. Stand out of the way of it! In the awful sweep of this white avalanche let political fraud go down a thousand feet under.

You have not only a vote, you have a prayer. The prayer may be mightier than the vote. Oh, as citizens of this beautiful city, and of this State, and of this nation, let us do our whole duty. We cannot live under any other form of government than that which God has given us in this country. The stars on our flag are not the stars of a thickening night, but the stars sprinkled amid the bars of morning cloud. We are going to have on this entire continent. Let the despotisms of Asia keep their feet off the Pacific coast, and let the tyrannies of Europe keep their feet off the Atlantic coast. We are going to have one government. Mexico will follow Texas into the Union, and Christianity and civilization will stand side by side in the halls of the Montezumas. And if not in our day, then in the day of our children, Yucatan and Central America will come in dominion, while on the north Canada will be ours, not by conquest—oh, no, American and English swords may never clash blades—but we will woo our fair neighbor of the north, and then England will say to Canada, "You are old enough for the marriage day," and then turning, will say, "Giant of the West, go take your bride." And then from Baffin's Bay to the Caribbean there will be one government under one flag, with one destiny—a free, undisputed, Christianized American continent. God save the city of Brooklyn! God save the commonwealth of New York!

GOD SAVE THE UNION!

THE PRIESTHOOD OF MELCHISEDEC:

ITS MILLENNIAL CHARACTER.

By the late Rev. William Maude.

"Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec."—Heb. 7 : 21.

How Melchisedec is Introduced—His History Typically Instructive—Who was He?—An Eminent Type of Christ—Christ's Functions in the Millennium—The Final Struggle between the World-Powers and Christ—Christ's Regal Priesthood—The Priest-King on the Throne—The "Day of Christ" which Abraham "Saw"—Melchisedec's Offering.

The grey dawn of patriarchal history reveals to us no more majestic and significant figure than that of Melchisedec "King of Salem" and "priest of the most high God," who met Abraham, returning from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer, the king of Elam, and his three confederate kings, in "the Valley of Shaved, or the king's dale;" a locality which has generally been identified with the valley of the upper Kedron, where Absalom, long afterward, reared a pillar (II Samuel 18 : 18), and which, we are told by Josephus, was only two furlongs from Jerusalem.

It is in the fourteenth chapter of Genesis that Melchisedec is historically presented to us in the following words: And Melchisedec, king of Salem brought forth bread and wine; and he was the priest of the most high God. And he blessed him, and said, Blessed be Abram of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth; and blessed be the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand. And he gave him tithes of all" (vs. 18–20). This incident and its record, although so brief, and standing in such singular isolation from the thread of the history which it interrupts, is not only in itself most striking and interesting, but also profoundly instructive in

ITS TYPICAL TEACHING.

How suddenly and altogether unexpectedly does Melchisedec here appear before us—a most kingly and majestic form, yet clad in priestly robes, and with the mystic emblems of eucharistic offering—bread and wine—in his hands. We see those priestly hands raised in blessing; we observe the great patriarch, Abraham—the father of the faithful and the friend of God—bowing before the mysterious priest-king, and presenting to him the tithes of all his spoil; and then, as abruptly as it appeared, the vision passes away, and for nearly a thousand years the voice of inspiration utters not again the name of Melchisedec.

Then, however, in an ecstatic Psalm of a most distinctly Messianic character, and descriptive of our Lord's exaltation in the day of His power, we meet with it once more, in the solemn declaration: "The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest forever, after the order of Melchisedec" (Ps. 110 : 4). Again, something like a thousand years pass away, and then, once more, the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews takes up the subject of this mysterious personage, who, "without father, without mother, without genealogy, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God; abideth a priest continually" (Heb. 7 : 3); and on the two brief references to Him above given, which are all that the Scriptures elsewhere contain, founds an argument to show the superiority of Christ's Priesthood, as being "after the order of Melchisedec," to that of Aaron, or Levi, which it has superseded.

WHO WAS MELCHISEDEC?

Much labor has been wasted in attempts to answer the question, "Who was Melchisedec?" Later Jewish tradition identifies him with Shem; and it is certain that that patriarch was not only alive in the days of Abraham, but even continued to live till Jacob was fifty years old (compare Gen. 11 : 11, with vs. 12–26; 21 : 5; 25 : 7–26). According to others, he belonged to the family of Ham, or of Japheth; and it has been said that this is necessarily implied by the language of the Apostle, when, drawing a parallel between Melchisedec and Christ, he says that our Lord belonged to "a tribe of which no man gave attendance at the altar." Some, again, have suggested that He was an incarnate angel, or other super-human creature, who lived for a time among men. Others have held that he was an early manifestation of the Son of God; and a sect, called the Melchisedecians, asserted that he was "an incarnation of the Holy Ghost."

But, in all these conjectures, the fact has been strangely overlooked that the reticence of Scripture on the point is typical and significant, for, could it be determined who Melchisedec really was, it could no longer be said that he was "without father, without mother, without genealogy;" which statement is to be understood, not as implying that he was not a natural descendant of Adam, but that he designedly appears and disappears in the sacred narrative, without mention either of his parentage or death.

AN EMINENT TYPE OF CHRIST.

There can, however, be no question that, whoever Melchisedec may have been, he was an eminent type of Christ. This is placed beyond doubt, not only by the language of the 110th Psalm—the Messianic character of which has ever been recognized by Jews and Christians alike—but especially by the argument of the Apostle, in the seventh chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, in the course of which there occurs the explicit declaration, that he was—in the various respects mentioned—"made like unto the Son of God."

But another question, hardly less important, though very little attention has been directed to it by the commentators, remains to be answered—namely, under what aspect does our Lord's priesthood more particularly correspond to the priesthood of Melchisedec? Or, in other words, Was Christ made a priest "after the ordet (i.e. 'the similitude') of Melchisedec" at His First Advent, when He appeared to offer the one great sacrifice for sin, forever; or, will He be so constituted, at His Second Advent, when, during His Millennial reign, the regal office, heretofore as it were in abeyance, shall be exercised in conjunction with the priestly?

In one sense, it must, I think, be admitted that this Melchisedec priesthood of Christ dates from His ascension, and is now possessed by Him in the heavens, at least de jure; still, it will not, I apprehend, be exercised by Him de facto till after He appears the second time, "without a sin-offering," like the Jewish high priest when he came forth from the most holy place, having presented the blood before the throne, to bless the people. The grounds upon which this conclusion is based are the following:

FUNCTIONS IN THE MILLENNIUM.

1. In the first place it seems to be indicated, not obscurely in the very language alike of the Apostle and the Psalmist, when literally translated. "Thou art a priest for the age (eis ton aiona) after the order of Melchisedec" (Heb. 7 : 21). So I would render a sentence so important and full of meaning that the Apostle quotes it no less than five times, making it the basis of his lengthy argument. And the language of the 110th Psalm exactly corresponds in the Hebrew, for the learned Bennet thus renders the fourth verse: "The Lord hath sworn and will not repent, thou art a priest for the future age (aldhibharti), according to my appointment, O King of Righteousness" (Olam Heneshamoth). So the Jewish Targum on this verse runs: "Thou hast been appointed prince of the age to come, and that for Thy merits' sake, because Thou art a righteous king."

But in the first three verses of this Psalm we have a description of the assumption of Christ's future kingly rule, and the question therefore, is naturally suggested, Will not Christ, when He thus assumes the kingly, lay aside His present priestly office? No; the Psalmist seems to say, for "The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, thou art a priest (also) for the future age," i.e., the Millennial age, of the introduction of which this whole Psalm treats. But of what character is His priesthood? "After the order of Melchisedec;" in other words, as we shall immediately see, a priesthood exercised in conjunction with kingship. I conclude, therefore, that the Melchisedec priesthood of Christ is His Millennial priesthood, in contradistinction to that which He is at present exercising, which is rather the antitype of the priesthood of Aaron. A careful study of the seventh and two following chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrews, will greatly strengthen this supposition.

(To be concluded.)

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Listening at the Door.—Mr. Robertson at a recent meeting related the following: "Two young women at one of our meetings were brought to the Lord a few nights ago. Since then they have been holding a prayer-meeting with other Christians in one of the rooms where they are employed; and a young man listening at the door, and hearing himself prayed for, was awakened on the spot, as well as others in the place, and led to give himself to Christ."

Trusting to a Twig.—The Rev. Mr. Cobim said: "A lady who was in great anxiety dreamed that she was hanging on by a slight twig over a horrible precipice. Shudderingly she looked downward, but could not see the bottom. She felt the twig giving way slowly but surely, and her doom seemed fixed. In the midst of her fears she heard a voice say, 'Let go the twig, and I will save you.' As a last resort she did so, and fell into the arms of Christ.

A Mother's Fears for Her Sons.—At a Fellowship meeting, Mr. Hill said: "A lady had two sons who were just at the age when young men are obliged to sustain their own part in the fight for daily bread. Her heart was much troubled, as all her efforts to lead them to Christ were apparently futile, and she feared that without the grace of God her boys would be led into the downward road, with little to check them. She consulted her pastor, saying, 'I have tried everything, but have failed to make any impression upon their minds.' Quietly the minister inquired, 'Have you tried faith?' 'Tried faith? What do you mean?' I have nine children who are all converted, and my plan was to place them in the hands of God, believing His promises to be true.' The lady left the study very thoughtful, and returned in a fortnight with the pleasant news, 'I tried faith, and my boys have now given their hearts to Jesus.'"

Students Out for a Holiday.—Mr. Simpson said at one of the noonday meetings: "I went to the Vale of Leven recently, and my memory travelled back forty-four years ago from this time, when three students during the Communion holiday went into the village of Alexandria to hold a Gospel-meeting. After a vain search for a suitable place, they were forced to be contented with the back room of a beer saloon. The room was only eighteen feet square. That meeting was blessed by God, and it was the first of a series of meetings at which hundreds were converted to Christ. One of the converts is now a leading Doctor of Divinity in London. As I sat on the platform of the gorgeous Town Hall, seated for twelve hundred people, and which was crowded to the doors, I could not help contrasting it with that humble effort commenced in weakness, and I raised my heart in a song of thanksgiving to God for His goodness to the children of men."

A Brickmaker's Shout.—"You Must Understand that we have no halls to meet in, and therefore our work is almost all individual dealing, and meetings in the miners' houses. I have seen a hundred people crammed into one small room, fourteen of them standing on the bed with their shoes off. After a meeting, I spoke to one man who is a sort of contractor in a large brickfield. I asked, 'Would you like to be saved?' 'I would give all the world, if I had it, to be a saved man just now,' he answered, 'It costs nothing,' was my reply, 'the poorest man or woman or child can have it free.' 'What must I do?' 'Trust in the Lord Jesus and leave it to Him; He will save you.' I then took him to the Bible, out of which I read him several promises suitable to his condition. You should have heard his shouts of gladness when he got outside the meeting, telling all who were near that he had found Christ as his Saviour and was saved."

A Nervous Publican.—The Rev. Dr. Wallace said: "When, a little while ago, we had our grand demonstration by the Mizpah male choir under their leader, Mr. Moodie, at East Campbell Street, we were in the open air, and half a dozen men gave five minutes' testimony each for half an hour. There an immense crowd surrounded us, and while we were in the midst of the service I felt a gentle touch on my back. It was so light that I thought it a woman's, but when I turned round I found that it was a stalwart man who had touched me. He imploringly besought me to stop the proceedings, as it made him and others very nervous. Who do you think he was? Why, he was a man who owns one of the largest beer saloons in the east end, and he has several smaller ones in the town. I wish all the grog sellers in Great Britain would grow so nervous that they would have to give up their debasing business, and seek Christ for pardon and everlasting life."

An Earl as a Railway Porter.—Mr. Hill Related at a recent noonday prayer-meeting in Glasgow: "I was in a provincial town some time ago, when I was told of a nobleman who for many years worked as a porter in the railway station, because he did not know his true position in the world, till one day a gentleman entered the station, and after saluting him, said, 'Sir, may I ask your name?' 'John ——,' was the answer. 'I have come to tell you that you are the Earl of ——, and entitled to a large estate,' replied the visitor. Do you think that that man stood about the station touching his cap for tips any longer? Not he. He took possession of his inheritance at once. That is just what we Christians should do. The Holy Spirit tells us that we are 'heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ;' therefore, let us take full possession of our inheritance, as Christ has done. He has condescended to call us brethren; we, if we believe Him, must humbly claim our Brother's help in all our difficulties, instead of begging from those who have not our privileges."

Half a Life-time in Jail.—A Gentleman Said: "I am a stranger here, but propose to tell an incident which occurred in a mining district where I have been laboring for twenty years. In the village of Golspie, there is a man who has actually spent half his life-time in jail. He was in jail for four-and-a-half years at one time for nearly killing a man. We were holding an open-air meeting on the day he was released after serving sixty days in prison for some offence against the law. He was standing in the crowd, and the peculiarity of his cropped head attracted my attention. The Holy Spirit carried home the Word to his soul, and this outcast was welcomed by Jesus. I could hardly believe that he of all men was a Christian, but seeing him at one of our meetings, I asked him, 'Is it really true, Gilmour, that you are converted?' 'Yes, it is, an' am real happy,' was his answer. You can hardly conceive the difference which his conversion has made, even on his face. Formerly it had a sullen, hang-dog look, now it is open and frank; his eyes meet mine as freely as any man's, and the general expression is that of a truly happy man."

Caught by a Novelty.—"A Woman Came in from a country town a few weeks ago, and on the Sabbath morning found that she was without money or friends in a strange town. A good Samaritan in the guise of a policeman directed her to our Free Breakfast, where she got her hunger of body satisfied. The novelty of hearing the Gospel in the same place as that in which she had taken her food amused her, and induced her to stay. The preaching of a full Christ for needy and empty sinners made her exceedingly anxious, so that she stayed for personal conversation about her soul. We learned that in prosperous days her besetting sin was pride, but when people come to our Breakfast they are generally humbled indeed. She was no exception to the rule, and listened meekly to the Gospel message and received it into her heart. Some years ago her husband was converted, but left her for America, owing to her unfeeling and unceasing persecutions on account of religion. His last words to her were, 'Light can have no fellowship with darkness, so I must leave you.' She is now going on well. If those who work among the deserving poor have the same reward as we who labor among the undeserving poor, their happiness must be great."

JOE CURTIS'S BATTLE.

By Rev. Charles Courtenay.

"I've done it! I've done it at last!"

Joe Curtis was quite alone when he spoke these words, and was sitting on a bank by the roadside. He had come down into the country to work, but his errand had been sadly neglected, for, instead of working, he had been idling away his time in the village public-house.

Look at him as he sits there, and say what more melancholy sight could meet the eye anywhere. What the drink can do to a well-built, strong, and skilful working man, is well set forth there in Joe Curtis.

But what has he done, this man? What has he "done at last?"

Do you see that carpenter's pencil in his hand? With that long unused pencil he has just been doing the best work it has ever been put to. Just five minutes ago, while sitting on that same grassy bank, he had been fumbling in his pocket for some more pence to spend on beer, when has hand struck against a piece of paper. He took it, curious to know what it was. Spreading it out before him, he read it, and after he had well mastered its contents, with sudden eagerness he seized the pencil, and with trembling hand, scrawled his name upon it; after which achievement he uttered aloud the above words: "I've done it! I've done it at last!"

That little bit of paper had a rather curious history, which you will like to hear. It had been thrust into his hand a good month ago by a zealous temperance advocate. He accepted it, not with any good intentions, but solely for the purpose of lighting his pipe with it when needed. Surely such a grimy piece of paper had never been put to such good use before. Do I now need to say that the paper was a temperance pledge?

For some time Joe seemed so utterly surprised at what he had done, that he could only repeat, "I have done it!" And once or twice he was seized with such misgivings as to the said deed, that he held the paper between his two hands, as though he seriously contemplated tearing it into small pieces. At length, dashing his hat down tighter upon his head, and springing to his feet, with great determination he strode off toward his lodgings, and past the public house, looking straight before him.

It was late at night before our friend thoroughly took in what he had done that day. Little by little light broke in, until, at length, so firmly did he realize it all, that two or three times during the night he woke up saying most emphatically, "I've done it! I've done it at last!"

"Won't my wife be glad?" was Joe's first thought the next morning, and his face lit up, as he dwelt for a moment on the pleasure it would give her. But "What will my mates say?" was a question which cast a great shadow over his whole being. He would be the only teetotaler among them. And he knew enough of their ways and opinions to be sure that his change would meet with a rough reception. And who can blame the man for trembling as he brooded for a time on this gloomy prospect?

So troubled was Joe Curtis as he dwelt on his darkening future, that he did what he had never known himself do since he left the Sunday School, he opened a Bible. It was his landlady's Bible which she had left in the room, though Joe had never cast his eye on it before. Half ashamed, he turned over a few leaves, until his eye was arrested by the underlined passage: "Be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus." As he read it over, Joe felt a strange softening come over him, such as he had never felt before.

Leaning his head upon the Bible, he began to think. He thought of his past drunken, misspent life. He thought of the future judgment. He thought of his ill-used wife; and as he thought, her pale face seemed to float before his eyes, and look forgivingly upon him. "Ah! she's been a good wife to me," he whispered with a sob, "though I've acted like a brute to her. And yet she forgives me. Won't He forgive me too? He loves me more than she does." Slipping down upon his knees, Joe prayed.

It was a very short prayer. And then Joe got up, and questioned himself thus: "Joe Curtis, you're sorry, aren't you, for your past life? Yes, and you intend to lead a new one, don't you? Yes. Do you believe He heard that prayer you said just now? Yes. And, Joe Curtis," he continued, "do you believe He's answered it?" Very quickly and earnestly, there came the reply, "Joe Curtis does believe that the Lord has forgiven him." And "He'll make me strong, too," he continued; "He's promised it. And I'll just go and be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus." Should he tell his wife about his double change? Should he blaze it abroad among his fellow-workmen? These were questions of some importance, but he soon answered them. "I'll just see whether it is all real or no first," he wisely replied. "They'll find it out fast enough if there's anything in it. I'll wait a bit."

For the first time for years Joe Curtis went to his work without dropping in at the beer house on his way. And not a few opened their eyes when he was seen ready for his day's work at the first stroke of the bell.

"What's come over Joe Curtis?" they said one to another.

For some time Joe said nothing to any one. He was thinking what he should say for himself when the first laugh arose. He had not been a teetotaler long enough to have any arguments at his command. He knew nothing of what the doctors said. He could quote no authority of any kind. It was only when he thought of the promise of the All-wise One that he felt calm at the conflict in which he would soon be engaged.

"Come, mates," shouted the foreman about eleven o'clock, "who's for beer?" In the twinkling of an eye every tool but one was thrown to the ground, and every form but Joe's surrounded the jar. After they had all been satisfied, it was noticed by one of the men that Joe Curtis was not with them. And, on looking for him, they wondered to see him working away very steadily alone.

"Joe," shouted two or three voices at once, "here's your beer waiting for 'ee."

"No thank'ee, mates," said Joe; "I'd rather not."

For a moment or two so surprised was everybody that nothing was said. Soon, however, they found their tongues, and calling to the men who were about to resume work, that "Joe Curtis had turned his back upon good beer," they quickly surrounded poor Joe.

"Why, Joe, are 'ee poorly, man?" said one.

"Have 'ee had bad news?" asked another.

Question after question was poured in upon him, so astonished were they. That he had become a teetotaler, never dawned upon their minds for a moment. They were soon enlightened.

"Mates," said Joe, "I've signed the pledge!"

CURRENT EVENTS.

In Ohio Last Week the Democratic Party carried the State, electing Judge Hoadly Governor by a plurality of about 12,000. The exact figures have not been computed at the time of writing, but it is believed that the whole State government has been changed, and that the Democrats will hold all the offices. An estimate based on late returns states that in the Legislature the Democrats will have a clear majority of 24 on joint ballot, the House being composed of 61 Democrats and 44 Republicans, and the Senate of 20 Democrats and 13 Republicans. This result, if it is sustained, will enable the Democratic Party to elect a United States Senator to succeed Mr. Pendleton. There was a heavy vote, estimated at 715,000, which is but little less than that cast at the last Presidential election. The Prohibition Amendment is said to have been defeated.

The Republican Party was Victorious in Iowa. The late returns give Governor Sherman a majority over the Democratic candidate of about 26,000, and over the Greenback candidate of about 160,000. In the Senate the Republicans expect to have an overwhelming majority, but in the House the result will be a close vote. The new Legislature will elect a United States Senator to succeed Mr. Allison. In Iowa as in Ohio the untiring exertions of Prohibitionists succeeded in bringing out an exceptionally heavy vote.

A General Rearrangement of Commands has been necessitated by the retirement of General W. T. Sherman from the command of the army. He will be succeeded by Lieutenant-General Philip H. Sheridan, who will go to Washington and assume command of the army. Major-General John M. Schofield will assume command of the military division of the Missouri. Major-General John Pope will have command of the military division of the Pacific and of the Department of California. Brigadier-General C. C. Augur will command the Department of the Missouri. Brigadier-General R. S. Mackenzie will command the Department of Texas. The Department of the South will, on November 1st, 1883, be merged in the Department of the East under the command of Major-General Hancock. He was offered the command of the division of the Missouri, but declined it, preferring to retain his present command, the military division of the Atlantic.

The Discovery of an Immense River in Alaska, hitherto unknown to geographers, has been made by Lieutenant Storey, who went up on the revenue steamer Thomas Corwin to distribute rewards to the Tchuckchee Indians of Alaska. The river had been vaguely spoken of by Indians to former explorers, and Lieutenant Storey determined to see if it existed. Accompanied by one attendant and an interpreter he proceeded inland from Hotham Inlet in a southeasterly direction until he struck the mysterious river. He traced it to its mouth, a distance of about fifteen miles, where he saw such huge pieces of floating timber as to satisfy him that the stream must be of immense size. He retraced his steps for a distance of fifty miles, where he encountered natives who told him that they had come down the river a distance of fifteen hundred miles, and that it went up higher than that. Having no time to go further, Lieutenant Storey returned. The Indians stated that the river in some places is twenty miles wide. It lies within the Arctic circle, but in August, when Lieutenant Storey was there, he found flowers and vegetation not hitherto discovered in so high a latitude. A despatch from Lieutenant Schwatka, who is also in Alaska, states that he has been exploring the Yukon, and that he had to travel nearly three thousand miles to reach the head waters of the river, which stream lies entirely within the boundaries of our polar possessions, and that in descending the river on a raft the distance covered was nearly two thousand miles. He describes the river as being one of the largest in the world, discharging fifty per cent more water than the Mississippi, and being at places seven miles in breadth.

Rumors as to the Bad Behavior of the Crew of the Proteus have been in circulation since the failure to carry relief to Lieutenant Greely, and the wreck of the ship was announced. A soldier who accompanied the expedition has now confirmed the rumors. He said recently to a reporter in reply to the query why the expedition did not stay at Littelton Island: "I think with the kind of men they were, if we had stayed there, and there had not been enough food, not one of our party would have lived to see the spring. I think so from the growling I heard, which amounted to threats. In my opinion, if we had anything that these men wanted they would have taken it. If it had ever come to the point of actual want, we would have suffered. Those sailors were the greatest cowards I ever saw. The crew were regular pirates, who stole everything they could lay their hands on—valuable articles from the boxes thrown on the ice when the ship was sinking, the soldiers' clothing, buffalo overcoats and robes, and liquor, on which they got drunk within an hour after the Proteus went down. Captain Pike did his utmost to restrain them, but failed."

A Successful Experiment in Enforcing Prohibition, which is often a more difficult task than enacting it, has been long in operation in Manitoba. It is described in a recent issue of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper. It appears that twelve years ago the Canadian Government resolved to prevent the drinking of liquor in that part of Manitoba where the Indians were located, and it was done. A mounted police force patrolled all roads leading into the territory, and all liquors found on traders or travellers entering it were confiscated. The same policy was maintained when the Canadian Pacific Railroad invaded the region, and all the workmen engaged in constructing that line were shut off from liquor as rigorously as the Indians had been. The results have been absolutely peaceful with the red men, and among the whites an absence of the crimes which have usually marked the construction of a railroad in a new country.

How Employers May Avoid Strikes was Explained on Saturday to the Senate Committee on Labor and Education by a New York manufacturer. He said the plan had been tried in his own business with perfect success. He employs twenty-two hundred work people, and has had no strike or disturbance. This is due to the fact that the firm settles any difficulty that may arise between it and its employés by a system of arbitration. Differences are adjusted by the submission of all questions to a board of arbitration composed equally of representatives of the workingmen and of the employers, with the odd member selected from a class of workmen not directly affected by the question at issue. Employers and employed abide by the decisions of the board, in which both have confidence—the workmen, because its decisions have at times been advantageous to them and the employers for the same reason. Upon its decisions wages have been both raised and lowered. Another conciliatory influence is the establishment of a sick fund, to which the employers and workpeople contribute. The fund was established in 1879. Since then $14,831.49 has been collected, $9074.77 paid out, and there is a balance of $5756.72 on hand. The men are pleased with the interest the employers take in their welfare, and have never manifested any disposition to make trouble.

The Congregational Council, which Held its sessions last week at Concord, N. H., received on October 12th the secretary's report, which showed a net gain of 262 churches during the past three years and 5079 in membership. The addition to churches by profession averaged 12,500 annually. The contributions for Sabbath-schools last year amounted to $300,000, and for charitable objects upward of $6,000,000. There are 874 more churches in the United States than there are clergymen to supply them. A telegram was received from the General Association in California, saying: "We are with you in sympathy and faith, and propose to raise $1,000,000 yearly to save the country to Christ, and $750,000 to convert the world." The Rev. Dr. E. B. Webb, of Boston, made an earnest appeal in behalf of the American Board of Foreign Missions. He said the organization had expended $591,000 in its work last year, and that it proposed to devote a like or even a larger sum annually, if it can be raised.

A Party of Missionaries, under the Auspices of the American Baptist Missionary Union, sailed from New York on Saturday on the steamer Furnessia for India. The Rev. W. E. Witter and wife, from La Grange, N. Y., will go to Sibsangor; the Rev. S. W. Rivenburg, from Clifford, Penn., to Molong; the Rev. C. E. Burdette, of Peoria, Ill., to Tura, Assam, and Miss Ulyssa B. Johnson, of Elyria, Ohio, to Tovoy, Burmah. Farewell services were held on Friday evening at the Madison Avenue Baptist Church. The missionaries were introduced, and each spoke of the work to be undertaken. They graduated recently from the Baptist Theological Seminary at Rochester, N. Y. They will go to Liverpool and thence to Calcutta. The Rev. J. R. Goddard and wife will sail next Tuesday on the Assyrian Monarch, returning to their work in Mingpo, China.

The Synod of the Reformed Church Assembled at Reading, Pa., on October 10th, in its 137th annual session. The meetings continued one week. The opening sermon was preached by the Rev. George H. Johnston, of Philadelphia, the retiring president. Missionary, Sunday-school and church work were considered and reports read from various congregations, theological seminaries and publication boards under control of the Synod. The Rev. Dr. Thomas C. Porter, of Lafayette College, Easton, was elected president for the ensuing year.

Arrangements to Celebrate the Four Hundredth anniversary of the birth of Martin Luther on November 10th, have been made by the Martin Luther Society of New York. Jacob F. Miller presided, and there were present many members of the various Lutheran churches in the city. Mr. Jacob F. Miller, the president of the society, announces that Steinway Hall has been offered free of charge for the evening, and it has been decided to hold the celebration there. The Executive Committee report a programme for the occasion, which includes several hymns composed by Martin Luther, and an address by the Rev. Dr. Joseph A. Seiss, of Philadelphia.

The New York Young Men's Christian Association have issued an attractive programme for the season. Besides the ordinary attractions of the building—gymnasium, bowling-alley and baths, reading room and library—it includes evening classes in German, French, Spanish, phonography, writing, book-keeping, and vocal music; lectures by well-known platform speakers; social receptions and literary debates. An active membership in the Association, with full ticket entitling the member to all privileges, may be secured on payment of five dollars annually.

An Infinitesimal Inheritance has Fallen into the possession of a number of people by the death of a man who resided in Mecklenburg County, North Carolina. He left about $1500 in personal property and 850 acres of land. He was not married, and died without a will, and his property, therefore, is to be divided among his relatives. The lawyers will have to trace them to the fifth generation. He had eleven brothers and sisters, all of whom are dead except one, and the descendants, who are entitled to an interest in the estate, are scattered throughout all the Southern States, West Virginia, Ohio, and Illinois. When the estate is divided, the shares of those in the fifth generation will not be more than one seven hundred and forty-second part of it. The Christian who rejoices in the knowledge that he is an heir of God and joint-heir with Christ, has no fear that his inheritance will decrease as fellow-heirs multiply. The riches of God are inexhaustible (Rev. 21 : 7).

A Risk an Insurance Office Declined is Described in a Boston journal. A man entered an insurance office in that city recently, and throwing on the table a folded document said to the clerk, "I want that renewed; it has run out." The clerk opened the paper and smiled grimly. "Sure it has run out?" he asked. "Oh, yes," was the reply, "my wife told me so this morning." "Well, I'm sorry for you," said the clerk, "but we do not take that kind of risks," and he handed back the document to the busy gentleman, who glanced at it and saw that in his hurry he had presented his marriage certificate for renewal. In this case the mistake was only ludicrous, but there is an increasing tendency in these days to regard marriage as a terminable contract, the results of which not even an insurance company could afford to guarantee. If young people contemplating marriage, however, would submit their project in prayer to God before joining their hands, they would have the best insurance for their happiness (Ps. 128).

The Loss of a Hat had Fatal Consequences on the Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad on October 10th. An officer of the road was riding on a hand-car on that day, accompanied by his wife and baby and his daughter-in-law and her husband and child. When near Wausau the wind carried away the hat of one of the ladies, and in instinctively raising her hand to catch it, her baby dropped out of her arms, and fell in front of the car. The child was caught in the gear of the wheels and instantly killed. The car was thrown from the track and was hurled some distance. Both women are probably fatally injured, and the other child will die. The lady's action was evidently an involuntary one, and the fatal results have doubtless caused her poignant grief. The trivial value of the property she tried to save, compared with the precious lives lost by her endeavor to save it, must aggravate her anguish. The day will come when those who have gained millions of money at the cost of their souls will experience similar remorse (Luke 12 : 16-21).

The Death of a Miser is Reported from Walden, N. Y. He was a stonemason by trade, and for forty years worked at his occupation without losing an hour's time. He sponged his living wherever he could, frequently compelling his mother, who supported herself by domestic drudgery, to contribute to his wants. Ten years ago he took up his abode in the garret of an old stone house, where he lived the life of a hermit, until the house was torn down, when he was forced to try a miserable house in an out-of-the-way place, where he lived until he was found dead in his hut on October 9th. When his mother, at eighty years of age, was worn out with hard work and years, she applied to her son for support for the rest of her life. He told her he would see that she was taken care of. He purchased her a pair of shoes and then walked her twenty miles to the poor-house. Taking the shoes from her he turned her over to the poor authorities and left her without a word. She died in the institution soon afterward, and was buried a pauper. The man was a typical miser in appearance. His tall, gaunt form was covered with a mass of patches of all colors and sizes. He had not permitted a comb, razor, or pair of shears to be placed to his hair or beard for a quarter of a century, and it had grown to extreme length and was a tangle of snarls. He would not allow any one to enter his place, and is believed to have starved himself to death, yet he leaves $50,000 in government bonds beside other securities, and a stranger will inherit the whole. This form of idolatry, as the Bible warns us, generally leads men to disregard their filial duty (Prov. 15 : 27).

A Name Scratched Out of a Bible Recently prevented the restoration of a girl to her home. The girl was arrested by the police, for wandering abroad and having no settled abode. Her mother appeared and acknowledged she was her daughter, but said she was irreclaimable. She had more than once taken her home. The judge suggested that the mother should give the girl one more trial. The mother said she dare not, as the father "had scratched her name out of the family Bible." The girl was committed to jail by the judge as a vagrant. It may be supposed that the father of the girl must have finally given her up before he thus erased her name from the family record. The girl may yet learn that though her name does not appear on the fly-leaf of the family Bible at home, entitling her to be received in the family circle, yet she may find herself through repentance and faith in Christ included in that all comprehensive "whosoever," and so secure an entrance into the circle of the washed and forgiven above (Rev. 22 : 17).

A Dog at the Telephone Received and Sent a communication satisfactorily a few days ago. A gentleman who possesses a remarkably intelligent dog, between whom and himself there exists strong affection, recently lost the animal in the city streets. Jack was happily found by a friend of his owner, who recognized him immediately, and at once called up his friend by telephone. "Have you lost your dog?" "Yes, have you seen him?" was the reply. "Suppose you call him through the telephone." The dog was lifted up and the ear-piece placed at his ear. "Jack! Jack!" called his master. Jack instantly recognized the voice, and began to yelp. He licked the telephone fondly, seeming to think that his master was inside the machine. At the other end of the line, the gentleman recognized the familiar barks, and shortly afterward he reached his friend's office to claim his property. The believer, whose communion with his God is close and constant, hears Him speaking to him continually in all the events of life, and recognizes a voice unheard by the world. With him faith is the evidence of things not seen (John 10 : 3-5).

A Bargain between two Soldiers has Resulted in the arrest of one of them. On October 10th an artilleryman in the British service, stationed at Kingston, Ont., agreed with a sergeant in the United States artillery to trade uniforms. The exchange was carried out, and soon the men appeared in the uniform of the service to which they did not belong. What their intention was as to their future proceedings does not appear, but the transaction was brought to an ignominious termination by the arrest of the United States officer on the charge of having in his possession a uniform belonging to the Queen of England. It is probable that our government may have something to say to the Englishman if they find him. If the exchange had been made in time of war the consequences would have been more serious for the men than they are likely to be in these days; but even now such proceedings will not be tolerated. Some recent pulpit utterances and the conduct of some professors of religion suggest the thought that the loose principles of the soldiers may be in operation in the Church, and that is a grave matter, because between the forces of God and those of Satan there is perpetual war (Isa. 29 : 15, 16).

"LET NOT YOUR HEART BE TROUBLED."

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also. And whither I go ye know, and the way ye know."—JOHN 14 : 1-4.

WE may well feel glad that God's people, whose lives are recorded in the Old and New Testaments, were men of like passions with ourselves. I have known many a poor sinner pluck up hope as he has observed the sins and struggles of those who were saved by grace, and I have known many of the heirs of heaven find consolation as they have observed how imperfect beings like themselves have prevailed with God in prayer, and have been delivered in their time of distress. I am very glad that the apostles were not perfect men; they would then have understood all that Jesus said at once, and we should have lost our Lord's instructive explanations; they would also have lived above all trouble of mind, and then the Master would not have said to them these golden words, "Let not your heart be troubled."

It is, however, most evident from our text that it is not according to our Lord's mind that any of His servants should be troubled in heart. He takes no delight in the doubt and disquietude of His people. When He saw that because of what He had said to them sorrow had filled the hearts of His apostles, He pleaded with them in great love, and besought them to be comforted. As when a mother comforteth her child, He cried, "Let not your heart be troubled." Jesus saith my friend, if you are one of His downcast ones. He would not have you sad.

THE SAME TO YOU,

Is it not a thing greatly to be admired that the Lord Jesus should think so carefully of His friends at such a time? Great personal sorrows may well be an excuse if the griefs of others are somewhat overlooked. Jesus was going to His last bitter agony, and to death itself, and yet He overflowed with sympathy for His followers. Had it been you or I, we should have asked for sympathy for ourselves. Our cry would have been, "Have pity upon me, O my friends, for the hand of God hath touched me!" But, instead of that, our Lord cast His own crushing sorrows into the background, and bent His mind to the work of sustaining His chosen under their far inferior griefs. He knew that He was about to be "exceeding sorrowful, even unto death;" He knew that He should soon be in an agony through bearing "the chastisement of our peace;" but ere He plunged into the deep, He must needs dry the tears of those He loved so well, and therefore He said most touchingly, "Let not your heart be troubled."

While I admire this condescending tenderness of love, I at the same time cannot help adoring the marvellous confidence of our blessed Lord, who, though He knows that He is to be put to a shameful death, yet feels no fear, but bids His disciples trust implicitly to Him. The black darkness of the awful midnight was beginning to surround Him, yet how brave His word—"Believe also in Me!" He knew in that threatening hour that He had come forth from the Father, and that He was in the Father and the Father in Him; and so He says, "Ye believe in God, believe also in Me."

These words are in themselves much better than any sermon. What can our discourse be but a dilution of the essential spirit of consolation which is contained in the words of the Lord Jesus? Now let us, first, taste of the bitter waters of heart-trouble; and, secondly, let us drink deep of the sweet waters of divine consolation.

I. First, then, let us taste of

THE BITTER WATERS.

"Because I have said these things unto you, sorrow hath filled your heart." It was this—Jesus was to die: their Lord, whom they sincerely loved, was about to go from them by a shameful, painful death. What tender heart could bear to think of that? Yet He had told them that it would be so, and they began to remember His former words wherein He had said that the Son of man would be betrayed into the hands of wicked men, and would be scourged and put to death. A bitter draught this! In proportion as they loved their Lord they must have deeply grieved for Him; and they needed that He should say, "Let not your heart be troubled."

To-day those who love the Lord Jesus have to behold a spiritual repetition of His shameful treatment at the hands of men; for even now He is crucified afresh by those who account His cross a stumbling-block and the preaching of it foolishness. Ah me! how is Christ still misunderstood, misrepresented, despised, mocked, and rejected of men! A malignant spirit is manifested to the Gospel as once it was to Christ in person. Some with coarse blasphemies, and not a few with cunning assaults upon this part of Scripture, and on that, are doing their best to bruise the heel of the seed of the woman. In proportion as you feel a zeal for the Crucified, and for His saving truth, it is wormwood and gall to live in this age of unbelief. Christ Jesus is nailed up between the two thieves of superstition and unbelief, while around Him gathers still the fierce opposition of the rude and the polished, the ignorant and the wise.

In addition to this, the apostles had for an outlook the expectation that their Lord would be away from them. They did not at first understand His saying, "A little while, and ye shall not see Me; and again, a little while, and ye shall see Me, because I go to the Father." Now it dawned upon them that they were to be left as sheep without a shepherd; for their Master and head was to be taken from them. This was a bitter sorrow; and something of this kind of feeling often crosses our own hearts as we tremble for the ark of the Lord. My heart is sad when I see the state of religion among us. Oh, for an hour of the Son of man in

THESE DARKENING DAYS!

It is written, "There shall come in the last days scoffers;" and they have come, but, oh, that the Lord Himself were here in person! Oh, that the Lord would pluck His right hand out of His bosom, and show us once again the wonders of Pentecost, to the confusion of His adversaries, and to the delight of all His friends. He has not come as yet! Well-nigh two thousand years have rolled away since He departed, and the night is dark, and there is no sign of dawn. The ship of the church is tossed with tempest, and Jesus is not come unto us. We know that He is with us in a spiritual sense; but, oh, that we had Him in the glory of His power! Surely He knows our need and the urgency of the times; yet are we apt to cry, "It is time for thee, Lord, to work; for they make void thy law."

But they felt a third grief, and it was this: that He was to be betrayed by one of themselves. The twelve were chosen men, but one of them was a devil and sold his Lord. This pierced the hearts of the faithful—"the Son of man is betrayed." He is not taken by open seizure, but He is sold for thirty pieces of silver by one whom He intrusted with His little store. He that dipped with Him in the dish had sold Him for paltry gain. This cut them to the heart, even as it did the Master himself; for our Lord felt the treachery of His friend.

Of this bitter water the faithful at this hour are made to drink; for what see we at this day? What see we in various places but persons that are reputed to be ministers of the Gospel whose main business seems to be to undermine our holy faith, and batter down the truths which are commonly received in the Christian church? Certain of them preach as if they were ordained not of God, but of the devil; and anointed not by the Holy Spirit, but by the spirit of infidelity. Under the banner of "advanced thought," they make war upon those eternal truths for which confessors contended and martyrs bled, and by which the saints of past ages have been sustained in their dying hours.

It is not an enemy; then we could have borne and answered it. If the outward and avowed infidel attacks inspiration, let him do so. It is a free country, let him speak; but when a man enters our pulpits, opens the sacred volume, and denies that it is inspired, what does he there? How does his conscience allow him to assume an office which he perverts? To make him a shepherd who is a wolf; to make him a dresser of the vineyard who, with his axe, cuts up the very roots of the vines; this is an incomprehensible folly on the part of the churches. It is a dagger to every believing heart that Judas should be represented in the Christian Church by so many of the professed ministers of Christ. They betray their Master with a kiss.

Then there came another pang at the back of this; for one of them, though true-hearted and loyal, would that night deny his Lord. Peter, in many respects the leader of the little company, had been warned that he would act the craven and vehemently deny his Lord. This is bitterness indeed, of which those that love the church of God are compelled full often to drink, to see men whom we cannot but believe to be the disciples of Jesus Christ carried away by temptation, by fear of man, or by the fashion of the times, so that Christ and His Gospel are virtually denied by them. The hearts of some who best love Jesus grow heavy at the sight of the worldliness and lukewarmness of many of His professed followers. Hence it seems to me to be a most seasonable hour for introducing you to the sweet waters of our text, of which I bid you drink till every trace of bitterness is gone from your mouth; for the Master saith to you, even to you, "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in Me."

II. Under our second head let us drink of the

and refresh our souls. First, in this wonderful text our Master indicates to us the true means of comfort under every sort of disquietude. How puts He it? "Let not your heart be troubled"—believe. Kindly look down your Bibles, and you will see that this direction is repeated. He says in the opening of the eleventh verse, "Believe Me;" and then, again, in the second clause, "Believe Me." I thought as I tried to enter into the meaning of this sacred utterance that I heard Jesus at my side saying thrice to me, "Believe Me! believe Me! believe Me!" Is there no other cure, then, for a troubled heart? No other is required. This is all-sufficient through God. Regard this as the one and only physic for the disease of fear and trouble. Jesus prescribes, "Believe, believe, believe in Me!" Believe not only in certain doctrines, but in Jesus Himself—in Him as able to carry out every promise that He has made. Believe in Him as you believe in God. One has been at times apt to think it easier to believe in Jesus than in God, but this is a thought of spiritual infancy; more advanced believers find it not so.

These disciples knew that the Saviour was to be away from them, so that they could not see Him nor hear His voice. What of that? Is it not so with God, in whom we believe? "No man hath seen God at any time"—yet you believe in the invisible God working all things, sustaining all things. In the same manner believe in the absent and invisible Christ, that He is still as mighty as though you could see Him walking the waves, or multiplying the loaves, or healing the sick, or raising the dead. Believe Him, and sorrow and sighing will flee away.

But now our Lord proceeded to say that though He was going from them He was only going to His Father's house. "In my Father's house are many mansions." Ay, but this was sweet comfort. "I am going," said He, "and on My way you will see Me scourged, bleeding, mocked, and buffeted; but I shall pass through all this to the joy and rest, and honor of my Father's house." He was, in fact, as a son who is returning to his father's house, from which he had gone upon his father's business. He was going where He would be with the Father, where He would be perfectly at rest, where He would be above the assaults of the wicked; where He would never suffer or die again; He was going to reassume the glory which He had with the Father or ever the world was. Oh, if they had perfectly understood this, they would have understood the Saviour's words, "If ye loved Me, ye would rejoice, because I said, I go unto the Father." Imagination fails to picture the glory of our Lord's return, the honorable escort which heralded His approach to the Eternal City, the heartiness of the welcome of the Conqueror to the skies. "He was seen of angels." They beheld that "joyous re-entry," the opening of the eternal doors to the King of Glory, and the triumph through the celestial streets of Him who led captivity captive and scattered gifts among men.

GOING HOME,

Thirdly, our Lord gave His servants comfort in another way; He gave them to understand by implication that a great to the Father's house. He did not only assure them that He was going to His Father's house, but He said, "In My Father's house are many mansions." These mansions are not built to stand empty. God doeth nothing in vain; therefore it is natural to conclude that a multitude of spirits, innumerable beyond all count, will rise in due time to occupy those many mansions in the Father's house. Now I see in this great comfort to them, because they doubtless feared that if their Lord was absent His kingdom might fail. How would there be converts if He were crucified? The Lord Jesus in effect said, "I am going, but I shall lead the way for a vast host who will come to the prepared abodes. Like the corn of wheat which is cast into the ground to die, I shall bring forth much fruit, which shall be housed in the abiding resting-places." This is one part of our comfort at this hour. Little boots it how men fight against the Gospel, for the Lord knoweth them that are His, and He will ransom by power those redeemed by blood. He has a multitude according to the election of grace whom He will bring in. Though they seem to-day to be a small remnant, yet He will fill the many mansions.

But our Lord went much further, for He said, "I go to prepare a place for you." I think He did not only refer to the many mansions for our spirits, but to the ultimate place of our risen bodies, of which I will speak before long. In our Lord's going away, as well as in His continuance in His Father's presence He would be engaged in preparing a place for His own. He was going that He might clear all impediment out of the way. He was going there to assume the reins of Providence, having all things put under His feet, and having all power given to Him n heaven and in earth He might bless His people abundantly. By being in heaven our Lord occupies a vantage-ground for the sure accomplishing of His purposes of love. As Joseph went down into Egypt to store the granaries, to prepare for Israel a home in Goshen, and to sit upon the throne for their protection, so hath our Lord gone away into the glory for our good, and He is dong for us upon His throne what could not so advantageously have been done for us here.

A PLACE NOT A STATE.

At the same time, I am inclined to think that there is a special sense in these words over and above the preparing of heaven for us. I think our Lord Jesus meant to say, "I go to prepare a place for you" in this sense—that there would in the end be a place found for their entire manhood. Mark that word, "a place." We are too apt to entertain cloudy ideas of the ultimate inheritance of those who attain unto the resurrection of the dead. "Heaven is a state," says somebody. Yes, certainly, it is a state; but it is a place too, and in the future it will be more distinctly a place. Observe that our blessed Lord went away in body; not as a disembodied spirit, but as one who had eaten with His disciples, and whose body had been handled by them. His body needed a "place," and He is gone to prepare a place for us, not only as we shall be for a while, pure spirits, but as we are to be ultimately—body, and soul, and spirit.

When a child of God dies, where does his spirit go? There is no question about that matter; we are informed by the inspired apostle—"absent from the body, present with the Lord." But that is a spiritual matter, and something yet remains. My spirit is not the whole of myself, for I am taught so to respect my body as to regard it as a precious portion of my complete self—the temple of God. The Lord Jesus Christ did not redeem my spirit alone, but my body too, and consequently He means to have a "place" where I, this person who is here, in the wholeness of my individuality, may rest forever. Our ultimate abode will be a state of blessedness, but it must also be a place suited for our risen bodies. It is not, therefore, a cloud-land, an airy something, impalpable and dreamy. Oh, no, it will be as really a place as this earth is a place. Our glorious Lord has gone for the ultimate purpose of preparing a suitable place for His people. There will be a place for their spirits, if spirits want place; but He has gone to prepare a place for them as body, soul, and spirit. I delight to remember that Jesus did not go as a spirit, but in His risen body, bearing the scars of His wounds. Come, you that think you will never rise again, you who imagine that the scattering of our dust forbids all hope of the restoration of our bodies; we shall go where Christ has gone, and as He has gone. He leads the way in His body, and we shall follow in ours. Well might the apostles' hearts be comforted when they learned the blessed errand upon which their Lord was going!

The next consolation was the promise of

HIS SURE RETURN:

"If I go away to prepare a place for you, I will come again." Listen, then! Jesus is coming again. In the same manner as He ascended He will return—that is, really, literally, and in bodily form. He meant no play upon words when He so plainly said, without proverb, "I will come again," or more sweetly still, "I go away and come again unto you." This is our loudest joy-note, "Behold, He cometh!" This is our never-failing comfort.

Observe that the Saviour, in this place, says nothing about death, nothing about the peace and rest of believers till He is come; for He looks on to the end. It is not necessary to put every truth into one sentence; and so our Lord is content to mention the brightest of our hopes, and leave other blessings for mention at other times. Here the consolation is that He will come, come personally to gather us in. He will not send an angel, nor even a host of cherubim to fetch us up into our eternal state; but the Lord Himself will descend from heaven. It is to be our marriage-day, and the glorious Bridegroom will come in person. When the Bride is prepared for her Husband, will He not come to fetch her to His home?

O beloved, do you not see where our Lord's thoughts were? He was dwelling upon the happy day of His ultimate victory, when He shall come to be admired in all them that believe. That is where He would have His people's thoughts to be; but alas! they forget His advent. The Lord shall come; let your hearts anticipate

THAT DAY OF DAYS.

His enemies cannot stop His coming! "Let not your heart be troubled." They may hate Him, but they cannot hinder Him; they cannot impede His glorious return, not by the twinkling of an eye. What an answer will His coming be to every adversary! How will they weep and wail because of Him! As surely as He lives He will come; and what confusion this will bring upon the wise men who at this hour are reasoning against His Deity and ridiculing His atonement! Again I say, "Let not your heart be troubled" as to the present state of religion; it will not last long. Do not worry yourselves into unbelief though this man may have turned traitor, or the other may have become a backslider, for the wheels of time are hurrying on the day of the glorious manifestation of the Lord from heaven! What will be the astonishment of the whole world when with all the holy angels He shall descend from heaven and shall glorify His people!

For that is the next comfort—He will receive us. When He comes He will receive His followers with

A COURTLY RECEPTION.

It will be their marriage reception; it shall be the marriage supper of the Son of God. Then shall descend out of heaven the new Jerusalem prepared as a bride for her husband. Then shall come the day of the resurrection, and the dead in Christ shall rise. Then all His people who are alive at the time of His coming shall be suddenly transformed, so as to be delivered from all the frailties and imperfections of their mortal bodies: "The dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." Then we shall be presented spirit, soul, and body "without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing;" in the clear and absolute perfection of our sanctified manhood, presented unto Christ himself. "Let not your heart be troubled," all this is near at hand, and our Lord's going away has secured it to us.

For this was the last point of the consolation, that when He came and received His people to Himself He would place them eternally where He is, that they may be with Him. O joy! joy! joy! unutterable joy! Can we not now, once for all, dismiss every fear in the prospect of the endless bliss reserved for us?

"See that glory, how resplendent!
Brighter far than fancy paints!
There in majesty transcendent,
Jesus reigns, the King of saints.
Spread thy wings, my soul, and fly
Straight to yonder world of joy.

"Joyful crowds, His throne surrounding,
Sing with rapture of His love;
Through the heavens His praises sounding,
Filling all the courts above.
Spread thy wings, my soul, and fly
Straight to yonder world of joy."

The Lord talks to us as if we now knew all about His goings and doings; and so we do as far as all practical purposes are concerned. He says, "Whither I go ye know." He is not gone to a place unknown, remote, dangerous. He has only gone home. "Whither I go ye know." When a mother sends her boy to Australia she is usually troubled because she may never see him again; but he replies, "Dear mother, the distance is nothing now, we cross the ocean in a very few weeks, and I shall speedily come back again." Then the mother is cheered; she thinks of the ocean as a little bit of blue between her and her son, and looks for him to return, if need be. So the Saviour says, "Whither I go ye know." As much as to say—"I told you, I am going to your own Father's house, to the mansions whither your spirits will soon come, and I am going for the blessed purpose of making it ready to receive you in the entirety of your nature. You are thus made to know all about My departure and My business. I am going to a glorious place which eye hath not seen, but My Spirit will reveal it to you. You know where I am going, and you know also the way by which I am going—I am going through suffering and death, through atonement and righteousness; this is the way to heaven for you also, and you will find it all in Me. You shall in due time enter heaven by My atonement, by My death, by My sacrifice, for 'I am the way.' You know the way; but remember and not the end. Do not imagine that the wicked can make an end of Me; but believe that Christ on the cross, Christ in the sepulchre, is not the end, but the way."

IT IS ONLY THE WAY,

This, beloved, is the way for us as well as for our Lord. He could not reach His crown except by the cross, nor His mediatorial glory except by death; but that way once made in His own person is open for all who believe in Him. Thus you know where the Lord has gone, and you know the road; therefore, be encouraged, for He is not far away; He is not inaccessible; you shall be with Him soon. "Let not your heart be troubled."

O brave Master, shalt thou be followed by a tribe of cowards? No, we will not lose heart through the trials of the day. O holy Master, Thou didst meet Thy death with song, for "after supper they sang a hymn:" shall not we go through our griefs with joyful trust? O confident Lord, bidding us believe in Thee as in God Himself, we do believe in Thee, and we also grow confident. Thine undisturbed serenity of faith infuses itself into our souls, and we are made strong. When we hear Thee bravely talking of Thy decease which Thou hadst to accomplish at Jerusalem, and then of Thy after-glory, we also think hopefully of all the opposition of ungodly men, and, waiting for Thine appearing, we solace ourselves with that blessed hope. Make no tarrying, O our Lord! Amen.

KAMA, THE CONVERTED KAFFIR CHIEF.

In the year 1819, a large number of emigrants went out from England to settle in Southern Africa on the northern border of Cape Colony. Among them were a party of Wesleyan Methodists who were accompanied by a zealous preacher. They had not been there long before they were brought in contact with a tribe of Kaffirs whose separate existence had a remarkable origin.

Five generations back—for Kaffirs fix remote dates by a reference to their genealogical tables—during the reign of Tshirvo, there flourished a noted councillor, named Kwani, who, together with another, whose name has not been preserved, exercised a most commanding influence in the tribe. They exercised in some degree the functions of the Governors of our States, among which, owing to the death penalty being the punishment for the majority of crimes, the pardoning power was of the highest importance. The power of life and death, or the confiscation of property for alleged witchcraft or political offences, was vested in their hands, and Kwani's fellow-councillor always saw that the extreme penalty was enforced.

But Kwani took a different view. Assuming that by preserving instead of destroying life the interests of his chief would be better served, he resolved to carry out his idea. His own wild country on the mountainous fastnesses of the Orange River favored his views; hence when any criminal case was brought to him for adjudication, not only was the escape of the criminal connived at, but an asylum was found for him, where he was soon joined by his family, and the means of supporting them granted to him. This course, however, could not long escape observation; and a quarrel with his fellow-councillor threatening to bring it prematurely to light, he resolved to anticipate his enemy, and bring the matter to his chief's notice in his own way.

No sooner was his resolve formed than executed. Sending out the "gathering cry" through mountain cavern, crag, and hill-side, he collected his rescued ones, placed himself at their head, and marched direct to his chief's residence. Arrived there, a herald stood up, and in the name of the chief demanded who they were, and what their errand?

Kwani stood forth, and in manly and touching language gave the fullest information regarding their history, and his own action in regard thereto, and then boldly asked whether he had not better served his chief by preserving than by destroying his subjects? The chief in glowing terms commended his councillor, ratified the pardon he had accorded, constituted the rescued followers a distinct tribe, with the name of Amagunukirebi, conferred upon Kwani the chieftainship of that tribe, and invested him on the spot with the insignia of his rank. All restraint was withdrawn, and the hills re-echoed the shouts which burst unrestrained; for the loathed outcasts were no longer criminals or wanderers, but pardoned, organized, and free.

Such was the origin of the tribe who now came in contact with the Christian emigrants. They were among the most intelligent of the Kaffir race, and the young Wesleyan preacher proposed to his people that a mission should be founded for them. The project was adopted, and a deputation was sent to Kama who, as the lineal descendant of Kwani, was chief of the tribe. Kama received the deputation kindly and gave permission for a service to be held. Thereafter regular mission work commenced, and Kama himself was the first convert baptized.

LANDING AT A SOUTH AFRICAN PORT.

The picture on the right of this page, engraved specially for The Christian Herald by Mr. T. Hollidge, on his recent return from Africa, represents the transfer of passengers from the vessel to the shore, or vice versa. At most of the ports in this region there is a sand-bar which prevents steamers of large draught from going alongside the wharf or landing-stage for the disembarkation of those who wish to go ashore. In addition to which the sea is generally very rough, and any attempt to cross the bar would almost inevitably be attended with disaster, perhaps the loss of the ship, and the lives of all on board.

Vessels accordingly anchor a mile or more from land. This necessitates a short voyage for all who desire to leave the vessel for the land, or the land for the ship. To meet this requirement the enterprising citizens have organized a company which runs a fleet of trim launches about the size of our ferry-boats. As soon as a vessel from a foreign port is sighted, one or more of these launches goes out beyond the bar to meet her, and bring off her passengers.

The transfer of the passengers from the ship to the launch is, however, a critical operation. The turbulence of the sea precludes the use of the ordinary gang-plank, and the resources of the managers have been taxed to find some comfortable and safe mode of transit. The outcome has been a somewhat peculiar expedient. On board the launch is a large basket cylindrical in shape, capable of holding three or four persons. A stout ring is in the upper portion of the basket and to this is attached a strong rope. When the launch is alongside, the rope is connected with a donkey-engine on the launch, and being passed over a swinging pulley or crane is raised and swung on board the vessel. Then a door in the side like an elevator door is opened, and three passengers enter; the door is closed and the donkey-engine on the launch is again at work. The basket is raised, the crane swings, and the basket lowered to the deck of the launch. This process is repeated, until by instalments the launch receives its complement of passengers.

Strangers who for the first time travel to southern Africa are generally nervous about making this little trip in the air from the ship to the launch. But there is no alternative. The voyage across the ocean is ended, the land is in sight, the ship which for several weeks has been their floating home must be quitted for terra firma, and the ride through the air is the first stage of the brief passage. Then the captain and his officers come forward and assure them that they may safely trust themselves to the basket, and eventually they all travel in that way. It is something like this with all our lives. We go through the journey of our lives, but when the time comes for us to lie on our death-beds and make the passage to the world beyond, the heart often fails. We "have not passed that way before," but the passage must be made. Well is it, then, if the dying man has full assurance that he will certainly stand in the eternal city, and that in all that lies between him and the shining shore he will be kept safely by the Captain of his salvation.

A SCOTTISH SHEPHERD'S WAIF.

(See Illustration.)

A carriage was being rapidly driven one summer day some twelve years ago over a rough mountain road in Argyllshire, Scotland, when suddenly there was a tremendous lurch to one side, and it was almost overturned. A lynch-pin in one of the wheels had been broken, and the wheel had come off. What was to be done? The nearest blacksmith lived three miles away, and until he could be sent for, there was no hope of moving the vehicle. The occupants of the carriage were a child, the daughter of the laird, and her nurse. The latter was much distressed and unable to suggest any plan. At length the coachman settled the matter by sending the footman, who had been ignominiously jerked from his place on the box when the wheel came off, to fetch the blacksmith. The wheel was temporarily replaced, and while the footman went on his errand the coachman went comfortably to sleep on the box and the nurse settled herself in a corner inside and followed his example.

That proceeding made it dull for the child, who from the window of the carriage could see the bright open country all aglow in the sunshine beckoning to her. Childlike, she opened the door and went out. The novelty of wandering alone whither she would, unchecked by her nurse, was sufficiently delightful, and she ran and walked hither and thither far away from the path. She had been amusing herself for more than an hour before she felt tired, and then she thought of the nurse and the carriage. Neither were in sight, and after running a few yards in one direction and then in another the little girl realized that she was lost, and sat down to cry. Her distress, however, did not continue long; for she was thoroughly tired, and soon fell fast asleep on a mossy bank.

How long she slept she did not know, but she was awakened by a dog's cold nose against her face, and she raised a scream of terror, whereupon the collie set up a series of barks in chorus. Soon she saw the bonnet of a Scotch shepherd on the hill above her, and then the wearer came in sight, a man with a grave but kindly face and carrying a shepherd's crook, who looked at her in silent wonder. But he was quickly at her side, and gently raising her and calling off his dog, asked her how she came in such a place.

"Mamie, Mamie, I want Mamie," was all the little girl could say through her sobs. The shepherd looked on in bewilderment. A lost lamb he would have known what to do with, but a lost child puzzled him. At length, telling her, "nae ta greet," he picked her up and carried her up the hillside to look for Mamie. Who Mamie was, and where she might be found, Dugald Morrison had no idea; so, comforting the child as best he could and holding her easily on his arm, while she clung to him convulsively, he strode on with his dog at his side to his hut near the sheep pens. There he gave her warm milk, and having soothed and quieted her he laid her down on his own bed, assuring her that Mamie would soon appear.

Dugald sat by her side, and, looking at the long, fair hair of the child and her delicate complexion he wondered what would have happened to so delicate a creature had he not providentially found her. He took down his Bible, it was the only book he had or cared to have, to read his evening portion. Instinctively he turned to that grand old story the Master told of the sheep lost on the mountains whom the shepherd left his ninety-and-nine sheep to find. He read it again, and as he turned to look at the sleeping child he wondered if she would in the years to come ever be found of the Great Shepherd when she wandered in the paths of the world. A strange yearning over the child came over the old shepherd's heart, and he knelt down and prayed for her.

He prayed long and earnestly, for his solitary monotonous life was seldom broken in upon by any incident, and this had stirred him deeply. It was quite dark when he rose from his knees and looked out. Far down the hill he saw lights, and presently recognized that men with lanterns were ascending. He expected they were searching for the child, and so, the better to guide them, he flung open his door and let a flood of light stream out in the darkness.

A few minutes passed, one question was asked and answered, and then the golden-haired child was clasped in her father's arms and smothered with kisses. The laird listened with a grateful heart to Dugald's account of his providential discovery, which with characteristic modesty he credited to his dog. It was of no use offering the old man a reward; he would accept none. He was glad, he said, to have found "the bairnie."

The father tenderly carried the child away. His heart was too full to utter many words, but he hoped that Dugald would understand that his silence was not caused by a lack of appreciation of his kindness. He held out his hand at parting and shook Dugald's hand as that of a friend, a mark of delicate kindness the old man would be sure to value. Then with his golden-haired child tightly clasped in his arms he hurried away.

Dugald still occupies his mountain hut, but it has been repainted and refurnished. A large picture of the Good Shepherd bearing a lamb in His arms is on the wall, and a beautifully bound Bible with large type occupies a place of honor on the old bureau. The collie dog is stretched across the doorway, but round his neck is a handsome collar bearing an inscription. The shepherd's life is not quite so monotonous now, for he has a frequent visitor, the laird's daughter, now a golden-haired lady, whom he thinks the best and loveliest woman in the world as she smiles and blushes as he reminds her of the day they first met, when he carried her in his arms and soothed her to sleep.

Hope Deferred.

BESS controlled herself as she came face to face with Roger Blackett. The tears could not be wholly suppressed, but they were quickly dashed aside before the boy could see them. They had welled up into her eyes the moment she had found that the boyish figure she had seen from her mother's door was not her much-loved and long-expected brother. It seemed so like him that Bess had felt sure, and now the disappointment was cruel. And worse than all she had unwittingly deceived her mother. When she said, "He's comin', mother," she had caused the widow's heart to leap for joy. The poor suffering creature hungered for the sight of her lost boy, and Bess knew that the arrow of disappointment which had pierced her own heart would be a hundredfold more poignant to her mother. She dreaded going back to tell her that she had been mistaken—that after all Davy was not coming.

All this passed through her mind as she stood at the corner of the street. It was really less than a minute, yet to Bess it seemed hours. Then it occurred to her that Roger might have seen Davy. The next best thing to returning with her brother would be to take news of him.

"Roger, have you seen our Davy anywhere?" Bess inquired.

"No, I haven't," he answered. "Is father in the house, Bess?"

"Ay," she said.

"Then I'll stay outside," he went on. "He does nothing but bang me, and curse at me for an idle dog and a cowardly soft. He's drove the rest of 'em into thievin', and he'll never let me a-be till he's drove me to it. I was very near it to-night, Bess."

"Oh, don't!" she cried, "don't! I'd never do worse than beg, if I was you. I know David ud die afore he'd steal, and so 'ud mother. We'd all clem to death afore we'd take to thievin'."

"I'd have been drove to it long ago," said Roger, "if it hadn't been along of you and your mother, Bess. Father's always larfin' at folks like you settin' up to be honest; and he's always sayin' as I haven't got a drop of real blood in me. I'm bound to be drove to it, however long I fight shy of it. Only it 'ud vex you, Bess."

"Ah!" she answered earnestly, "mother 'ud never, never let David or me speak to you again. She's set dead agen thievin', mother is. She won't let us know any jail-birds. You see," continued Bess with an air of pride, "none of us has ever been in trouble—up before the justices, you know. We've never had nothink to do with the police, 'cept civility; and the police has nothink to do with us. Better starve nor steal, mother says."

But Bess had been so long in the street, that Mrs. Fell's impatience had conquered her. She had crept to the street-door, and was making her way painfully toward them.

"Bess, is it Davy?" she called. "Be sharp, and bring him here."

"We're coming, mother," cried Bess. "It's only Roger. You go back, and let him come into our room for a bit, for company. You come with me, Roger, and talk a bit to mother; she's frettin' after Davy so! You ask her about the parson's garden, and the place where she used to live, and anything you can think of, for a bit, till Davy comes."

The two children stole softly past the closed door of the front room, and hid themselves in the darkness of Mrs. Fell's kitchen.

"It's nobody but poor Roger," said Bess, softly. "Davy's not come yet, and Roger's afeard of his father till he gets dead drunk. Let him stay with us a bit, mother."

There had always been a dread in Mrs. Fell's mind of her children growing too intimate with Roger Blackett, whose two elder brothers were openly pursuing the successful calling of thieves, with occasional periods of absence supposed to be passed in prison; but she had been too much afraid of Blackett to forbid all intercourse with his sons. Roger was nearly fourteen, and had not been in trouble yet; so she could not very well refuse to let him enter her room.

"He's welcome," she said coldly, "as long as he keeps himself honest."

"That won't be for long," muttered Roger; "father's always a-goin' on with me to keep myself, and I've got no way o' keepin' myself, save thievin.' He's getting angrier with me every day."

"But there's God'll be angry with you if you thieve," said Mrs. Fell; "and, if you make Him angry, He can do worse at you than your father. You ought to be afeard of Him."

"Where is He?" asked Roger.

"He lives in heaven, where good folks go when they die," she answered; "but He sees everything, and can do everything. Everything as happens is just what He pleases. He could make us all rich and well and happy in a moment o' time, if He choose; but it's His will we should be poor and ill and miserable, and it's all right somehow; so we must keep still, and believe as it's all right. I know I often says, 'It's God's will,' and it seems a little better. But what I was going to tell you is, that God won't ever have thieves in heaven. There's a great pit somewhere, full of fire and brimstone, where all wicked folks go; and, if you thieve, you'll go there. I don't know exactly where it is, or how it is; but it's all Gospel, they say. It's worse than hundreds of jails."

The woman's low, weak, faltering voice, uttering these terrible words in the darkness, made Roger's heart shrink with a strange awe and dread. He was glad to feel Bess close beside him, and to know that she was listening as well as himself.

"God's worse than father," he said, trembling.

"No, no," continued Mrs. Fell. "I've heard folks preachin' in the streets, and some among 'em said He loves us all somehow. I heard one of 'em saying over and over again, 'God is love.' And he'd some little tickets, about as big as pawntickets, with those words printed plain on 'em, and he gave one to everybody as asked him. I s'pose there's some truth in it. 'God is love,' I say to myself hundreds o' times in the night, when I lie awake for pain; and there's comfort in it. Ay, when my pains are worst, and when I'm faintin' with hunger, if I say, 'God is love,' it helps me on a bit. It's all I know, and I don't know that very clear."

"Do God love everybody?" inquired Roger anxiously.

"Yes," she answered.

"Do He love father?" he asked again.

"Yes, I s'pose so," she said in a tone of doubt.

"Then I don't think much of God," went on Roger. "He didn't ought to love father. He ought to put him in that pit o' fire and brimstone; for he's a thief, and he wants to make me a thief. And, if he loved any on us, he'd never let us be drove to thievin' and beggin'. Folks say as Davy's gone a-beggin'. No: God loves rich folks maybe; but He don't care a rush for poor folks."

"I can't tell how it is," moaned Mrs. Fell; "only it's a comfort to me to say, 'God is love,' and make believe it's true. And my Davy'll never be a thief, Roger—never! If folks do say he's gone a-beggin', they can't say worse of him. Ah, I wish he'd only come!"

But though she and Bess sat up till long after midnight, and until every inmate of the overcrowded tenement had returned to their miserable dens, and there was not a sound to drown the echo of any footstep coming down the street, there was still no sign of David's coming. Bess fell asleep at last on the floor at her mother's feet; but she kept awake, shivering with cold and pain, and heart-sick with vague terrors as to what should keep the boy away.

As day after day passed on, bringing no tidings of David, the mother's anguish of soul grew almost intolerable. It seemed to overmaster her bodily pain, and render her nearly insensible to it. Every morning she wandered about, asking news of her boy from everybody who had ever known him, until her strength was worn out; and then she would stand for hours, leaning against the wall at the street-corner, looking along the road, and straining her eyes to catch some glimpse of him amid the ever-changing stream of people passing by. She could no longer bring herself to stand at her washing-tub, cheating the parish by earning a few extra pence for herself by the toil of her hands. Little by little, all that was left of her few possessions found their way to the familiar pawnshop, till her room was as bare of furniture as it was possible to be, and yet be a human dwelling-place.

There was one treasure she had never parted with, however pressing and bitter her necessities had been through her long years of widowhood. It was the one possession which had been the pride of her heart. This was her wedding-ring, of good solid gold, bought for her and placed upon her hand by the husband she had lost twelve years ago. She had been too careful of it to wear it while at work; but every evening and every Sunday her children had been used to see the golden glitter of it on her finger, and to regard it with a sort of reverential delight. It was the visible sign to them of their dead father, and of the good times their mother could tell them of, but which they had not known themselves. They had gone to bed many a night supperless that they might keep the mother's ring from the pawn-shop, and run no risk of losing it.

But things had come to such a pass during David's absence that the ring must go. It was still little worn, not much thinner than when David Fell, the carpenter, had wedded his young wife with it. Next to any grief or calamity befalling her children, this was the sharpest trial Mrs. Fell could undergo. Bess helped her to crawl to the pawnbroker's shop—for she would not trust it even to Bess—and she laid it down on the counter with a pang nearly heart-breaking. The pawnbroker fastened a number to it, gave her a ticket, and pushed a few shillings toward her.

"Take care of it!" she cried, with vehement urgency in her tone; "take care of it. I shall redeem it; It's God's will!" she sobbed, her dim, eager eyes following it as the pawnbroker opened a drawer, and dropped it carelessly among a heap of pledges similar to it.

As Mrs. Fell, leaning heavily on the arm of Bess, crept homeward, after her sorrowful visit to the pawnbroker, they saw an old man, one of their neighbors, making his way, with a shambling and limping tread, along the uneven pavement before them. The lamps were lit down the narrow and dirty street, and the light fell on the dingy figure of the old man as he passed under them with his stooping shoulders and his long, rugged locks of gray hair falling below his battered and broken hat, round which still clung a little band of black material that had not become quite brown with rain and sunshine.

He was a small man, and seemed to have withered and shrunk into a more meagre thinness than when his clothes had been bought, now many years ago. The face under the battered hat was of a yellow brownness, and much wrinkled, with shaggy eyebrows hanging over his eyes. There was a gleam in these dim and sunken eyes, as if it was possible for him to smile; but the possibility seldom became a fact. He looked half asleep as he shuffled along; and in a low, husky voice he was dreamily crying "Cresses," but not at all as though he expected any one of his neighbors to spend a penny on his perishable stock.

"There's poor old Euclid!" said Mrs. Fell in a tone of pity, as if she was looking at one whose circumstances were as bad, if not worse, than her own.

The old man's baptismal name was Euclid, his surname Jones; but in the multitude of Joneses his surname had long been lost, and was almost forgotten. He was the son of a village schoolmaster in some quiet spot in Wales, who had called his only child Euclid, with a vague and distant hope of seeing him some day a distinguished mathematical scholar. But the schoolmaster and his wife had both died before little Euclid had fairly mastered the alphabet, and from that time he had lived among the neighbors, now with one and now with another, passing from cottage to cottage, until he was old enough to scare crows and tend pigs. Little learning did Euclid get at these early employments.

In course of time he drifted up to London, where he worked on the roads till he was disabled by an accident. He had married a wife, who bore him eight children, born and bred under every chance against health and life, and dying all but one, just as they grew old enough to do something for themselves, after they had tested their father's love and endurance to the utmost. His wife was dead also. He had buried them all in their own coffins, unassisted by the parish, a remembrance which stirred up his downcast heart with a feeling of honest pride whenever it crossed his brain.

Life had brought to Euclid an enigma to solve, stiffer and more intricate than the most abstruse mathematical problem—how to keep himself and his off the parish during life, and how to get buried, when all was over, without the same dreaded and degrading aid. The problem was but partially solved yet; there still remained his youngest child and himself to die and be buried.

Euclid turned in at the same door as that to which Mrs. Fell was painfully creeping. He lived in the one attic of the house, having the advantage over Mrs. Fell in more light and fresher air, and in the quietness of a story to himself; but he possessed few other advantages. His household goods were as poor as hers had been before all that was worth pawning had gone to the pawn-shop. The fireplace consisted of three bars of iron let into the chimney, with a brick on each side for a hob, on one of which stood a brown earthenware teapot simmering at the spout, as if the tea had been boiling for some time.

There was a bed on the floor close by the handful of fire, and Euclid's first glance fell upon it; but it was empty, for a sickly-looking girl of eighteen was sitting on a broken chair before the fire, cowering over it with outstretched hands. She had wrapped herself in an old shawl, and was holding it tightly about her, as though she felt the chill of the November evening; but she smiled brightly when the old man's wrinkled face and dim eyes met her gaze, as he stood in the doorway an instant, looking anxiously and sadly at her.

"Come in, daddy, and shut the door," she said cheerfully. "I'm not bad to-day; but you're late—later than ever. It's gone six, and I thought you would never, never come."

"Folks did not care to buy creases this cold day," he answered, his husky voice striving to soften itself into tenderness; "but, Victoria, my dear, you've not waited tea for me?"

"I should think I have," she said, rising from the only chair, and compelling him with all her little strength to sit down on it, while she took an old box for her seat. "I couldn't relish the best o' tea alone at this time o' night, and you in the streets, daddy. So we'll have it at once; for it's been made, oh! hours ago—at least, it's near an hour by the clock. That clock's real company to me, father," she added, looking proudly at a little loud-ticking clock against the wall, which seemed the best and busiest thing in the bare room.

"I ain't got no 'erring for you, Victoria," he said regretfully, "nor nothing else for a relish—nothing save a few creases, and they'd be too cold for your stomach, my dear. If you feel set on any thing, I'll take a penny or two from our little store, you know. It's all quite safe; isn't it, my dear?"

"Yes, yes," she answered, a shadow flitting across her face for a moment; "you needn't never be afeard of that not being safe. I'm not set on anythink, daddy."

"How much is it now, Victoria?" he inquired, his eyes glistening a little as he listened eagerly to her reply.

"It's two pound, sixteen shilling, and ninepence three farthings," she answered without hesitation. "I take good care of it."

"I think we shall do it, Victoria," he said, with an air of satisfaction; "and after that, my dear, there will be nobody but me; and I'm not afeard but I'll save enough for that. No, no; I shouldn't like any on us to die like a scamp upon the parish, and be buried in a parish coffin."

SAUL CHOSEN KING.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 28. 1 Sam. 10 : 17-27. Golden Text, ver. 24. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Samuel's Consecrated Ear—Preoccupied Ears—The Lord's Voice Unheard—Saul's Early Humility—How Samuel Honored him—Directions for the Way—Significance of the Bread and Wine—The National Convention—Choosing by Lot—Saul's Shrinking—The Provisions of the Law — No Stranger to Rule — Limiting the Monarchy.

"SURELY the Lord God will do nothing, but He revealeth His secret unto His servants the prophets" (Amos 3 : 7). Samuel's was set apart for the service of his God ; and our loving, condescending God never despises such an offering. Thus the Lord, having brought about an occasion for Saul, the son of Kish, to seek for Samuel, by the loss of his father's asses, "told Samuel in his ear a day before Saul came, saying, To-morrow about this time I will send thee a man out of the land of Benjamin, and thou shalt anoint him to be captain over My people Israel. . . . And when Samuel saw Saul, the Lord said unto him, Behold the man whom I spake to thee of ! this same shall reign over My people" (chap. 9 : 15, 17). Many sigh when they read words such as these, and say, "Oh, that God would speak to me in this distinct way !" Perhaps He is doing so all the time, but the ear is preoccupied with suggestions as to whether this or that may possibly be His will ; His voice is so still, so small, that it needs absolute stillness in the soul in order to hear it at all. It was Samuel's constant privilege to hear it, he knew it better than any voice on earth, and he was but a man, with like passions as we have.

To Saul's inquiry for him, he replied that he was the seer, and at once invited him to the high place to eat with him, promising on the morrow to let him go, and that he would tell him all that was in his heart : he told him also not to set his mind on the asses, for they were found, and then to follow up this most unexpected greeting, he added, "And on whom is all the desire of Israel ? Is it not on thee, and on all thy father's house ?" Saul must have known and taken part in the movement of the children of Israel to set up a monarchical government, but it had probably never for a moment crossed his mind that he should be chosen king. Judah was the leading tribe and he was a Benjamite. Thus he answered, "Am not I a Benjamite, of the smallest of the tribes of Israel ? and my family the least of all the families of the tribe of Benjamin ? wherefore then speakest thou so to me ?" At this time Saul was little in his own eyes, it had been well for him and for Israel if he had continued so. God hates self-glory, yet how great a temptation it is to value our little unworthy selves even over trifles. If we have succeeded in doing so much work in a short time, how we like to get the credit of it, how satisfied we feel ! if in anything we have excelled others, if only in tidying a room, or in opening a window that sticks, or making a dull fire burn, how the mean little self within us looks for some little credit ! Nothing but the real presence of Christ makes us little in our own eyes, and it is only the little ones who are really God's royal ones.

Saul and his servant were brought into the chief room and the chief place ; and a specially reserved portion was set before Saul, was shown him. After the meal was over, Samuel communed with Saul. It was with Samuel as when Elijah anointed Elisha in his room ; the people of Israel were the children of the old prophet, and he was a father to them, and now they were to pass into the hands of another. They arose early, probably neither had slept much that night. "And Samuel called Saul to the top of the house, saying, Up, that I may send thee away." They walked together, the old man and the young one, until they came to the end of the city. Then "Samuel said to Saul, Bid the servant pass on before us (and he passed on), but stand thou still awhile, that I may show thee the word of God. Then Samuel took a vial of oil, and poured it upon his head, and kissed him, and said, Is it not because the Lord hath anointed thee to be captain over His inheritance ?" In God's eye Saul was already king, although the people as yet had not proclaimed him as such, and many eyes might see in him only Saul, the son of Kish. And thus with God's heirs ; many do not see heaven's royalty in a hack-driver, a servant-maid, an errand-boy, a poorhouse inmate, a converted pariah in India, yet the Lord's anointing may be upon them, visible to Him and to those who see from His standpoint.

HONOR UPON HONOR

Then Samuel gave Saul the most minute instructions ; telling him all the incidents which should happen on his journey, for he was himself instructed of God about all these things. Oh, what glimpses we get of the loving care of our Father, even in what seem to be trifles ! First Saul would meet two men who would tell him that the asses were found, and that his father had become anxious about him. But he was not therefore to return home ; "Thou shalt go on forward from thence :" mightier matters were awaiting him, he must not allow even family claims to hinder. Then at Mount Tabor he should find three men who would meet him with bread and wine. There may be some great significance in this, Saul was to receive two loaves of bread, but it is not said that the wine was offered him. If the bread and wine are types of the life and nature of Christ, and Saul partook in part only, this may account for a man whose heart was changed, who was turned into another man, so completely falling away from God as he did.

From Tabor he was to go on to the Philistine garrison on "the hill of God," and there a company of prophets with musical instruments should meet him, "and they shall prophesy. And the Spirit of the Lord will come upon thee, and thou shalt prophesy with them, and shalt be turned into another man. And it shall come to pass that when these signs are come unto thee, do for thee for God is with thee" (margin). All this seems to have been promised Saul without any seeking on his own part, he simply fell in with the will of God. Yet a certain responsibility was laid upon him ; as soon as the Spirit of God came upon him, he was to do as his hand should find. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might ; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest" (Eccl. 9 : 10). Oh, how often we fail to do what our hand finds to do, how often the fear of man or fear of consequences has hindered God's children from co-operating with the Holy Ghost ! Saul was then to go down to Gilgal where Samuel would meet him and offer sacrifices, and he was to tarry seven days until the prophet should come. "And it was so, that, when he had turned his back to go from Samuel, God gave him another heart : and all those signs came to pass that day." When he met the band of prophets, he, who had probably been quite indifferent hitherto, began to prophesy among them. This seems to have set people talking, the change must have been most apparent, his acquaintances asked one another what was come to him, so that it became a proverb, "Is Saul also among the prophets ?" Curiosity was aroused—and relations are always the most curious of all—Saul's uncle cross-questioned him about his journey, but could extract nothing from him but the story of the asses.

AS THINE HAND SHALL FIND ;

THE NATIONAL CONVENTION.

At last Samuel came and "called the people together unto the Lord to Mizpeh," and then addressed them on the part of God, "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I brought up Israel out of Egypt, and delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of all kingdoms, and of them that oppressed you ; and ye have this day rejected your God; who Himself saved you out of all your adversities and your tribulations : and ye have said unto Him, Nay, but set a king over us." It must have been with subdued hearts and with a deep sense of shame that the people presented themselves by tribes and thousands that lots might be cast and their king chosen. The lot fell upon Saul, but he was not to be found, and instead of seeking him "they inquired of the Lord." It is a common saying that "God will help those who help themselves," and many count it almost sacrilege to ask God where to find a lost person or thing, yet He did not blame Samuel and the people for doing so, but answered at once that Saul had hidden himself among the stuff. An instinctive shrinking, which we can well understand, had led him to be absent from the assembly when he was chosen king. "They ran and fetched him thence : and when he stood among the people, he was higher than any of the people from his shoulders and upward. And Samuel said to all the people, See ye him whom the Lord hath chosen, that there is none like him among all the people ? And all the people shouted, and said, God save the king." Thus they had the best among them, to outward eyes, for their king, but the sad sad fact became history, and has been handed down through three thousand years that they had rejected the Lord as their king.

"Then Samuel told the people the manner of the kingdom." In Deut. 17 : 14-20 we see how God had made provision against the time when His people should dwell in the land, and should say, "I will set a king over me, like as all the nations that are about me." First the Lord ordained that no stranger should rule over them, and without doubt this law gave rise to the question about the tribute money, "Is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar, or not ?" (Matt. 22 : 17.) "Thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee, whom the Lord thy God shall choose : one from among thy brethren." The second law was that the king should not multiply horses to himself, nor cause the people to return to Egypt with the object of obtaining horses. Was not this in order that the people having no mounted soldiery should trust the Lord to fight their battles for them ? The third law was that the king should not multiply wives unto himself, the fourth, that he should not greatly multiply to himself silver and gold.

Thus the Lord made provision that the chosen King of Israel should be dependent, humble, pure, that he should be preserved from self-dependence and self-exaltation, that he should be an intelligent but faithful instrument in the hands of God. And, moreover, a final rule was made, "And it shall be, when he sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write him a copy of this law in a book, out of that which is before the priests the Levites ; and it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life ; that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, to keep all the words of this law, and these statutes, to do them :

THAT HIS HEART BE NOT LIFTED UP

above his brethren, and that he turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand or to the left : to the end that he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he, and his children, in the midst of Israel." Such was the manner of the kingdom which Samuel told the people and "wrote in a book and laid it up before the Lord." Then Saul went home, not as he had left his home a few days before, now he was a changed man and an anointed king, with a body-guard of "men whose hearts God had touched." And at first all seemed to go well. When men of Belial despised him he held his peace, and it seemed as though the change might be good for the country ; but as we shall see later this good beginning did not last. The Lord teach us how to bear prosperity, Amen.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The French Government Appear Anxious to settle the Madagascar difficulty. M. Ferry, the Prime Minister, has ignored his Foreign secretary, whose blunders in the Madagascar negotiations and in those relating to Tonquin have been notorious, and has conducted the arrangements with the ministers of other countries in person. Lord Granville has been assured that ample compensation to English subjects in Madagascar for trade damages will be made. M. Ferry also communicated through Lord Lyons to the British Government the draft of the treaty prepared for presentation to the Hovas, which is stated to be in such a form that England can recommend its acceptance. M. Challemel-Lacour has offered his resignation to M. Grévy, which the latter has postponed accepting until after the Chambers meet.

The Consequences of the Insult Offered to the King of Spain by the Parisian mob are still agitating the courts of Europe. On October 10th a despatch from the Paris correspondent of the London Standard said: "There is strong apprehension that if Spain does not obtain satisfaction for the insults to King Alfonso, Germany will interpose and exact it. It is asserted that Germany will require an apology as well as Spain. The report of the refusal of France to make further reparation has been confirmed." On Thursday the Spanish Cabinet, being unable to extract any further apology from France or to induce M. Grévy, the President of the French Republic, to act the manly and straightforward part of publishing the apology he had privately tendered to King Alfonso, resigned their offices. It is not known if their successors will press their demands upon France. Meanwhile the French Government affect to regard the incident as at an end, and with characteristic conceit glory in their conduct. M. Ferry, in a speech delivered on Saturday at Rouen, alluded to the apology made to King Alfonso for the treatment he received in Paris. He said President Grévy had shown with what serene majesty the chief of a republic can repair the errors of an unthinking crowd. He dwelt upon the advantages enjoyed by a practicable, sensible and prudent but not blustering republic. It may be hoped that some day France may have an opportunity of becoming practically acquainted with those advantages, if she can get rid of the men who now control her policy.

The Prospects of a Final Withdrawal of British troops from Egypt are strong, in spite of the clamor being raised by an influential part of the press for annexation of the country. General Sir Evelyn Wood has offered, with the help of native troops alone, to answer for the preservation of order in the Nile Valley. The London Times has published a statement that General Wood was willing that the bulk of the English troops should come home. The government will be likely to accept the offer gladly to rid themselves of a serious responsibility; nevertheless the evacuation cannot be completed until Parliament is consulted. It is probable that two or three regiments will remain to give confidence to Europeans. General Wood speaks enthusiastically of the native army.

A Conservative Campaign in Ireland has been conducted during the past week by Sir Stafford Northcote, the leader of the party in the House of Commons. It was an arduous undertaking to convince Irishmen that the Conservatives were their friends, they having opposed all concession to Ireland for many years past. Sir Stafford Northcote appears to have failed ignominiously. Mr. G. W. Smalley cables to his journal that the Conservative statesman's visit is attended with disturbance, and has resulted only in a revival of religious and political fanaticism. His tour is of very doubtful value to the Conservative party. He has neither delivered a watchword nor offered a policy. There has been plenty of empty declamation to the effect that the Union must be maintained, but there has been no reference to the Land Question, and not even any discussion of the peasant proprietary schemes put forward by some of his supporters. The Parnellites make much of this. They say rightly that this is not the way to captivate Northern farmers nor to win the Northern counties for the Tories. Another correspondent describes the speeches delivered as revealing "an abyssmal barrenness of mind and expression."

The Trial of O'Donnell, the Murderer of the Irish informer, was set down for hearing on Monday last, but the lawyers for the defence were sanguine of securing a postponement. It is stated that the police have failed to obtain any evidence showing connection between O'Donnell, the slayer of James Carey, and the Irish Invincibles. The defence, which will be set up on the trial will be that of self-defence, and a positive denial that O'Donnell was actuated by any political motives in shooting Carey. Counsel for O'Donnell ask for the postponement of his trial on the ground that essential witnesses for the defence have not yet arrived in London.

Lord Lansdowne, the new Governor-General of Canada, and Lady Lansdowne sailed on October 12th for Quebec, on the steamer Circassian. The Mayor of Londonderry presented an address to Lord Lansdowne previous to the departure of the latter for Canada. Lord Lansdowne, in reply, dwelt at some length upon the fact that the Irish race comprised a large portion of the population of Canada. He eulogized his predecessors, Lords Dufferin and Lorne, whose administrations of the government of the Dominion of Canada, he said, would be his guide.

An Imposing Celebration of the Anniversary of the discovery of America took place in Madrid on October 12th. There was a splendid banquet in the Opera House, which was brilliantly illuminated and decorated with the flags and coats of arms of Spain and the republics of North and South America. All the representatives of the American republics were present. The company included statesmen, politicians of all parties, literary men, artists and diplomats. The four tiers of boxes were crowded with the élite of Madrid society. Speeches in several languages were delivered, interspersed with musical selections, and the festivities ended with the unveiling of a statue of Columbus, which stood on the stage at the head of the table.

Secret Societies Exist in China and Exercise power as irresistible as in Western countries. An incident which recently occurred illustrates the power of the Society of the White Lily, which is only one of many kindred societies. A Frenchman, who is the proprietor of a saw-mill in China, had a dispute with a native employé, and kicked him in the presence of his workmen. An hour afterward the bell rang for the dinner hour, and the Chinese workmen filed out as usual for their mid-day meal. But when the bell rang for the resumption of work, not one Chinaman returned. The Frenchman became uneasy, and entered the works. A short examination showed him that all his saws and bands had been broken, and that a notice from the Chinese secret society was posted on his mill-door, warning all Chinamen off. When he went home, he received a letter telling him that the secret society intended to punish him with death for what he had done. A little reflection convinced him that it would be better to leave the place, which he did instantly.

Tourguenieff, the Eminent Russian Author, was buried in St. Petersburg on October 9th amid signs of general public mourning. The corpse was brought from France, where the distinguished writer died. As it was borne into the city the windows, balconies, and roof-tops were occupied for a mile away. The bier, after the funeral service, was placed on a platform of heavy metal and silently borne to the car, which was drawn by six horses, and was placed under a gorgeous baldachin of gold, surmounted by plumes of white ostrich feathers. The cortége then started for the cemetery, which was surrounded by 5000 troops. Only persons provided with tickets were allowed to enter. They were composed of every class of Russian society. There were 176 deputations. Every portion of the empire was represented in the funeral procession. At the head walked the peasant serfs of the dead novelist, many of them weeping. Behind came a group of students, who had brought two banners, with anchors of hope and broken chains, emblematic of freedom, on them, but those were at once seized by the police. The gathering dispersed quietly, leaving the grave literally covered with wreaths and trophies, twenty-two of which were borne to the cemetery by women.

The Centennial Conference of the Evangelical Alliance is to be held in Norwich, England. Papers are to be read on such subjects as the following: "The Religious Indifference Existing among Various Classes," "The Public Ministry of the Word of God," "The Influence of Martin Luther upon the Protestant Reformation, and the Present Condition and Needs of the Reformation Churches." Among those who are to take part in the work before the Conference are Lord Polwarth, the Rev Dr. Oswald Dykes, and the Rev. Dr. John Stoughton, the famous ecclesiastical historian.

Miss Booth, the Leader of the Salvation Army on the Continent of Europe, has been ordered to leave Switzerland with her colleagues. A brief cable message states that after Miss Booth and Miss Charlesworth were released from prison, a meeting was called to demand of the authorities the expulsion of the Salvation Army from the country. Two thousand persons were present. The proceedings were conducted in an orderly manner. A resolution demanding the expulsion of the English Salvationists was adopted. The Councillor of State was present, and said that the body to which he belonged would do its duty and close the gates of Switzerland to those who were trading upon her hospitality. The State Council thereupon issued a decree expelling from the country the two ladies and all foreigners suspected of an intention to organize meetings in Switzerland.

Preparations for Celebrating the Centenary of Sir Moses Montefiore are being made by Jews in all parts of the world. The distinguished Hebrew philanthropist will be one hundred years old if he lives until October 2d, 1884. It is proposed to present him with a testimonial to which Jews of all nationalities will be invited to subscribe. The venerable baronet during his long life has been an active and munificent friend of his race.

The Difficulties in the Way of an Aristocratic wedding under monarchical government are illustrated in a recent report from England. A younger son of the Duke of Argyll, wishing to marry an untitled lady, of course asked his father's consent. The duke is said to have replied that personally he had no objection to the match; but in view of the fact that his eldest son had espoused a daughter of the Queen, he thought it right to ask Her Majesty's consent. The Queen referred the question to the petty German princelet, who has acted as her adviser since her bereavement. The princelet submitted the question to his sovereign, the Emperor of Germany, who after consultation with his chancellor was graciously pleased to give his approval, and it was thus eventually decided that the marriage might take place.

THE eminent Italian orator, whose portrait appears this week on the frontispiece of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is known in his own country as Pietro Eremita, or "Peter the Hermit." This name was given him because the fervor of his eloquence and the resistless energy of his preaching aroused the better principles and the religious spirit of the whole country. Thirty years ago the condition of Italy was deplorable. She had sunk into a state in which the grand traditions of ancient Rome were a reproach to her. The land whence the legions of Cæsar went forth to conquer the world was divided into a number of petty States, weak and poor. The land in which had been born great poets, painters, historians, and statesmen was sunk into corruption and degradation, and the people were ignorant, superstitious, and priest-ridden; it seemed as if the history of Italy as a nation had closed. People asked, "Is the nation dead? Can national life be evoked from bones so dry?"

There were patriots who believed that there was a future for Italy, and they looked longingly for a national deliverer. But no human being could achieve that task. It needed such a man as the prophet Samuel to deliver Italy from the slough in which she lay. And in our day there are no such men. But the work that was too great for one man could be achieved by the

of several. There was needed an enthusiast, whom we usually call a fanatic; and Mazzini, the devoted, self-sacrificing patriot, appeared. A soldier, brave, determined, intrepid was required; and Garibaldi was ready. A statesman, wary, adroit, astute was indispensable; and Cavour was raised up. Finally an evangelist was demanded who could tell the people the way to spiritual emancipation and of the truth that could make them free; and Gavazzi stood forth, prepared of God for the work. Under God, Italy owes to those four men—Mazzini, Garibaldi, Cavour, and Gavazzi—her unity and all that she now enjoys of civil and religious liberty. She could have dispensed with neither of the four. Three of them did their share of the work and departed from the world; the fourth, whose mission is incomplete and whose labors are still sorely needed, Gavazzi, the God-sent, spiritual deliverer, still lives and toils for the spiritual enlightenment of his country.

Alessandro Gavazzi, who is now seventy-four years old, was born in 1809 at Bologna, where his father was an eminent barrister and judge, and he had nineteen brothers and sisters, who were all of tall and commanding figures like himself. He was educated at the university of his native place, but at the age of only sixteen years he of the Barnabite order (one section of the frontispiece represents him in his convent cell engaged in Bible study), and four years later he was appointed Professor of Rhetoric at Naples, where he laid the foundation of his reputation as an orator. The qualities at the base of Father Gavazzi's character are thoroughness and earnestness of purpose, and he displayed these characteristics at the outset of his public career by a style of preaching which could not have failed to excite attention. Setting light by church forms and ceremonies, he alarmed his fellow-priests by urging purity of life and practice, and boldly denounced the corrupt court of Pope Gregory XVI., a proceeding for which he was imprisoned and kept there till the death of that Pope.

On the accession of Pius IX., Gavazzi was one of the foremost supporters of the liberal policy with which that Pope began his pontificate. But when he went in person to Rome, and labored for the diffusion of political enlightenment and patriotic aspirations among the masses, the timid Pope drew back and even forbade him to preach.

SERMON IN UNIVERSITY CHURCH.

On January 22d, 1848, however, after the effort of the Italian patriots to deliver their country had been checked by the Austrians, Gavazzi could not resist the temptation to break silence. His friend and fellow-exile, Signor Nicolini, thus refers to the occasion. He says: "We were praying to God in our University Church for our brethren who had been slaughtered by the Austrians at Milan and at Mantua. The church was full to suffocation; the ceremony most affecting. All the studious youths, and all the noble and illustrious citizens of Rome, attired in deep mourning and bearing branches of cypress on the breasts of their coats, were present. In devout and profound silence we were listening to the solemn chants with which the church echoed, when, all of a sudden, a unanimous cry was heard from the audience for Gavazzi, who was present to ascend the pulpit. He did so (see frontispiece), and I never heard him more eloquent."

The people were powerfully stirred, and the movement commenced there spread rapidly. A legion of volunteers numbering 16,000 was raised, and they took an oath to drive the Austrians out of Italy. The Pope, carried away by the movement, sent Gavazzi his blessing, and appointed him almoner and grand chaplain of the forces. The night before they started, the fiery leader preached to 30,000 people in the Coliseum. But the Pope soon changed his mind and recalled the legion, and then Gavazzi and the more determined of the soldiers refused to obey. In Florence, Genoa, and Bologna he preached his patriotic mission and made collections for his followers, and one oration, delivered to a vast assemblage in the city of Venice, produced twenty thousand dollars. Men emptied their purses on the platform; women took off their jewels, and even cut off their hair as contributions to the popular cause.

BATTLE WITH AUSTRIANS.

Meanwhile the Austrian troops were pouring down on the Venetian territory The Italians met them at Cornuda. Throughout all the horrors of the war, Gavazzi never deserted his post, and in every fierce encounter he was to be seen among the foremost, exhorting and encouraging the men before the fight, and after it, giving every kind of consolation to those who had been sufferers. At Treviso Gavazzi was seen supporting on his bosom a wounded man. The bullets were falling like hail. The grape-shot was making sad havoc. Charles Gavazzi trembled for his brother, and cried out to him, "Alessandro! Alessandro! do not expose yourself. Go behind that tree!" (See frontispiece.) The fearless monk stirred not from the spot. The patriots were obliged to retreat; but Gavazzi did not move till he had seen the last wounded man safe in an ambulance. He then fled to Genoa.

Gavazzi, however, did not remain long inactive. In November, 1848, Europe was electrified by the news of from Rome. The tyranny of the priests, which the Pope at first attempted to check, but ultimately was compelled to connive at, drove the people of Rome into insurrection. There were grave charges of vice and sinful indulgence brought against cardinals and lower officials of the papal court, but these the Romans would have left unnoticed except that such charges brought the government into contempt. It was the impossibility of obtaining justice in the courts, the knowledge that the taxes levied were applied to the support of luxury and were stolen and squandered by officials that exasperated the people. They rose in rebellion and the Pope had to fly for his life. Gavazzi immediately returned to Rome.

No sooner had the Pope fled than in the Vatican was the first dungeon to be thrown open to the free air of truth and gladness, and cleansed of its holy enormities. The cry went forth, "To the Vatican." And thither those brave and noble hearts hastened with choking vengeance and mutterings of terrible wrath, foremost in their midst Gavazzi—the only priest permitted, being a liberal, to share the honor of unlocking the dreadful Golgotha (see frontispiece). A Republic was proclaimed, and Gavazzi was one of the most popular of the leaders. But in April of the following year a French expedition took possession of the city, after a siege of thirty days, and reinstated Pius in his place; and the patriot was glad to escape to England, where, as well as in the chief towns of Scotland, he delivered numerous addresses, in the English language, on the political aims of his country. He also visited the United States and Canada.

But during his travels in Protestant lands Gavazzi, who had all his life preferred the spirit of Christianity to the letter of it, had come under the influence of the untrammelled Gospel, and had undergone that change of heart which Christ called

CONVERSION.

To quote the words of his secretary, Dr. Thompson, "he now saw clearly that no mere patriotism could give to Italy or any other country the future it needed. Henceforth, leaving political affairs to others, he devoted himself to the spiritual regeneration of his people. Born to be a leader among men, beloved and revered by all who knew him, swaying multitudes like flames moved by the wind, he cast behind him every dream of earthly ambition, and became simply and only a herald of the cross." Accordingly, when Italy became united and the Government of Rome was wrested from the Pope in 1870, and religious liberty was proclaimed throughout Italy, he appeared there as the foremost of its evangelists.

Various denominations of England and America, as well as several indigenous reformed churches, hastened to open missions in the field which had for centuries been under the sway of Rome; but it was not till 1870 that a successful effort was made to unite the different bodies. In that year Gavazzi induced the prosperous and influential congregation of Milan to invite delegates from the other congregations to meet them in General Assembly, and the result was the formation of of Italy with a Declaration of Principles and a Constitution, each particular church, in its local affairs standing independent of all the others. According to its constitution the Free Church is governed by its General Assembly, which is composed of deputies from the particular churches, and which has met every year since 1870. A Declaration of Principles unanimously adopted by the first General Assembly at Milan contains the articles of belief in evangelical churches.

The statistics of the Church, which was started with only 23 small congregations and 400 communicants, are as follows: 15 ordained ministers, 15 evangelists, 49 elders, 67 deacons, 11 deaconesses, 1800 communicants, 265 catechumens, 724 Sabbath-school children, 1328 pupils in day and night schools, 21 teachers in the day schools, 1593 regular hearers of the Gospel, 1261 additional occasional hearers at each service, 36 churches, and 35 out-stations more or less frequently visited. The contributions of these churches in 1879, for evangelization alone, amounted to 1855.01 francs ($343.18), and the total sum collected for all objects was 12,223 francs ($2261.25).

There is a theological school in Rome with 17 candidates for the ministry. Father Gavazzi is their instructor in "sacred oratory" (homiletics), and the Rev. Mr. Henderson, of the Free Church of Scotland, is Professor of Theology. Over the door is the inscription, in Italian, English, and German, "The Free Church in Italy."

Father Gavazzi has been five times excom-gether to thank the Author of their changed circumstances, they did not fail to remember in prayer the homes still cursed with the drink. "God save the drunkards," pleaded Joe, and his wife and children said "Amen," with all their hearts. And as the days rolled on and their bright home grew brighter, "God save the drunkard" was their cry still. And shall not we, too, my dear reader, as we lay down this simple little story of "Joe Curtis's battle fought and won," say also, "God save the drunkard?"

THE PRIESTHOOD OF MELCHISEDEC.

ITS MILLENNIAL CHARACTER.

By the late Rev. William Maude.

THE FINAL STRUGGLE.

2. AGAIN, the Millennial character of the priesthood of Melchisedec is, it seems to me, indicated by the fact that it was after the slaughter of the Canaanitish kings that Abraham was met and blessed by Melchisedec. Now this slaughter of the four kings (four being the world number) is evidently typical of the last great conflict, in the vicinity of Jerusalem, of which Zechariah speaks (Zech. 14 : 2–5).

Thus, also, in the 110th Psalm, after the mention of the Melchisedec priesthood of the King Messiah, the Psalmist goes on to say, addressing Jehovah: "The Lord at thy right hand shall strike through kings in the day of His wrath. He shall judge among the nations: He shall fill the places with the dead bodies: He shall wound the head (the Hebrew singular) over divers countries;" "evidently referring," says Dr. De Burgh, "to the same defeat of Antichrist and his confederate subject kings predicted in Psalm 2—so strikingly parallel to this - and more fully in Rev. 19 : 11 to the end, in connection with the Second Advent of Christ, in which event the type shall have a further fulfilment; for, as it is recorded that it was 'on the return of Abraham from the slaughter of the kings' that Melchisedec, the king-priest, 'met and blessed him' (Heb. 8 : 1, with Gen. 14 : 17–20), so is the true Melchisedec revealed to bless His people on the occasion of their triumph over the powers of the world, by whom, at that time, they will be oppressed and held captive."

CHRIST'S REGAL PRIESTHOOD.

3. But most especially and unmistakably is the Millennial character of the Melchisedec priesthood proved by the fact that it is a regal priesthood. It is written, as we have seen, concerning Melchisedec, not only that he was "first (by interpretation of his name) King of Righteousness, and after that King of Salem, which is, King of Peace;" but also, that he was at the same time "the priest of the most high God." Now all this is luminously descriptive of the King Messiah. For these three titles—"King of Righteousness," by interpretation of the name Melchisedec; "King of Salem," afterward Jerusalem (Ps. 76 : 2; Gen. 14 : 18); and "King of Peace," are not titles appertaining to Christ's kingdom in the heavens, but to the future kingdom of Messiah on earth, as foretold by the prophets.

Christ will be "King of Righteousness" in those yet future days of which the Lord speaks, by Jeremiah: "Behold, the day is come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In His days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely; and this is His name whereby He shall be called,

THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS"

(Jer. 23 : 5, 6). He will be "King of Salem," when, as the same Prophet says, "They shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord; and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the Lord, to Jerusalem: neither shall they walk any more after the imagination of their evil heart" (3 : 17); and when, as predicted in Ps. 110, "Jehovah shall send the rod of His strength out of Zion;" and, lastly, "King of Peace," when, as the antitype of Solomon, whose name also, being interpreted, is "Peace," He shall sit upon "the throne of His father David;" and the glowing language of Isaiah shall be fulfilled: "Unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given; and the government shall be upon His shoulder; and His name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the PRINCE OF PEACE" (Isa. 9 : 6).

THE PRIEST-KING ON THE THRONE.

But "this Melchisedec" was not only "King of Salem," but at the same time "the Priest of the most high God." And so we read, concerning the King Messiah, in the sixth chapter of Zechariah (vs. 12, 13): "Thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, saying, Behold the man whose name is the Branch; and He shall grow up out of His place, and He shall build the temple of the Lord; even He shall build the temple of the Lord; and He shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon His throne; and He shall be a Priest upon His throne: and the counsel of peace shall be between them both." Christ is now indeed our great High Priest (Heb. 8 : 1, 2).

But He is not as yet a priest upon His throne. In the coming age, however, He shall indeed be a King-Priest, after the likeness of Melchisedec, having not only pardon to bestow upon His friends, but also power to deal with His enemies; and the blessed result of this joint exercise of the priestly and kingly functions will be "peace;" "the counsel (or mystery) of peace shall be between them both;" that is, between the two offices as exercised in conjunction. In other words, that peace which was heretofore sought in vain by the separate exercise of the priestly and kingly power, of king, as in the case of Israel, and of priest, as in the case of the Christian Church, shall then at last be perfectly secured by the concurrence of the two offices, in active exercise, in the one Messiah. For, when Christ, as the Priest-King—the antitype of Melchisedec—shall sit on the throne of His glory, the "counsel" of God shall be realized in the establishment of "peace," alike for the Church, Israel, and the world at large.

THE "DAY OF CHRIST."

Again, a very interesting confirmation of the view advocated in this paper is afforded by our Lord's remarkable declaration to the Jews, which we find recorded in the eighth chapter of St. John's Gospel: "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see My day, and he saw it; and was glad" (verse 56). Now, by the "day" of Christ we are not, I apprehend, to understand, as is too generally done, the days of His humiliation, but the day of His glory; the same "day of Christ," in fact, which is spoken of in Phil. 1 : 10 and 1 Cor 1 : 8; the "day of the Lord" in contradistinction to "man's day" (II Peter 3 : 10; 1 Cor. 4 : 3, margin). It was this later day of Christ that Abraham rejoiced to see; "and," our Lord adds emphatically, "he saw it and was glad."

But how or when did He thus see it? Here commentators are much divided in opinion. But if the expression simply means, as many suppose, no more than that He had by faith a prophetic foresight of the future glory of Christ—the second clause of the verse just repeating the first—what pertinence was there in the retort of the Jews, "Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham?" (verse 57). "And if it mean that Abraham was then beholding, in his disembodied spirit, the incarnate Messiah, as Stier, Tholuck, Alford, etc., understand it, the words seem very unsuitable.

"Plainly it speaks of something past—he saw (eide) My day, and was glad (echare); that is, surely, while he lived." I am disposed, therefore, to understand the assertion as referring to this very meeting between Abraham and Melchisedec, and to the practical confession by the latter of his inferiority. For if we look at the preceding context of the chapter in which our Lord makes this statement, we shall see, from the 53d verse, that the question which was in controversy between Christ and the Jews was the superiority or otherwise of Abraham over Himself. "Art thou greater than our father Abraham," etc. Now where in the history of Abraham, as recorded in the Bible, can we discover so striking an instance in which, on the one hand, the patriarch "saw the day of Christ," and on the other, confessed his own inferiority to Him, as when he bowed himself before Melchisedec, the priest-king, "made like unto the Son of God," who, in the realization of the Divine purpose, shall be, in the coming Millennial age, "a priest for the age, after the order of Melchisedec?"

MELCHISEDEC'S OFFERING.

But, lastly, the nature of Melchisedec's offering—if offering it was—of "bread and wine," points to the same conclusion. The Apostle Paul, speaking of the Aaronic priesthood, says, "For every high priest taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that He may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins" (Heb. 5 : 1). But in the case of Melchisedec we have the apparent anomaly of a priest without any sacrifice, save the eucharistic offering of bread and wine. Can he, then, in this aspect, be supposed to adumbrate the priesthood of Him who, not "by the blood of goats and calves, but by His own blood, entered in once for all into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us?" (Heb. 9 : 12).

The answer is—yes, provided His Millennial priesthood be typified. Christ entered the most holy place, not made with hands, even heaven itself, as the antitype of Aaron; and as such He entered as an atoning Priest "not without blood." But when He comes forth again, it is not as the antitype of Aaron, but as the antitype of Melchisedec—a priest without any bleeding sacrifice whereby to make atonement, but whose offering is acceptable on the ground of a perfect and everlasting sacrifice already made. "So," says the apostle, "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without a sin-offering unto salvation" (Heb. 9 : 28).

Thus even the "bread and wine" which Melchisedec "brought forth," acquire new significance when viewed in the light of this interpretation. There is no evidence to show that they were intended merely for the purpose of refreshment; on the contrary, Abraham distinctly mentions (verse 24) that the young men had already eaten of the spoil. It seems to follow, therefore, that the bread and wine were intended to have a mystical significance—that they were, in fact, the elements of an eucharistic offering. And, thus viewed, they again seem to point, at least indirectly, to the Millennial character of Christ's Melchisedec priesthood. For as they naturally, though not perhaps designedly, direct our thoughts to the use of in the great Christian ordinance of the Lord's Supper, wherein "as oft as we eat the bread and drink the cup, we do show forth the Lord's death till He come" (1 Cor. 11 : 26), so does that ordinance in turn remind us of the memorable words of our blessed Redeemer on the occasion of its first institution, when, having taken the cup and given thanks, He said, "I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom" (Matt 26 : 29).

On the ground, then, of a fivefold analogy (1) that our Lord as the antitype of Melchisedec is to be "a priest for the age;" (2) that it was when Abraham was returning from the slaughter of the kings that Melchisedec met and blessed him; (3) that the Millennial priesthood of Christ will be one exercised in conjunction with kingship; (4) that it is probably in reference to His meeting with Melchisedec that Abraham is said to have seen Christ's day; and (5) that Melchisedec was a priest without a sacrifice, while the bread and wine which he brought forth were, as in the Lord's Supper, predictive of Millennial blessings—I arrive at the conclusion that it is in His coming kingdom that Christ shall hereafter be manifested as "a priest for the age, after the order of Melchisedec."

CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

A Postal-Card from Baltimore, Signed "A Southern Reader," has been received at the office of this paper. The writer, who states that he "speaks the feelings of many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD," very kindly gives advice as to the conduct of the paper and its political attitude. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is at all times thankful for suggestions, though it is not always possible to use them. Our Baltimore friend, whose orthography, like his temper, is somewhat peculiar, would have seen, if he had read the paper attentively, that it could not be used for the advocacy of the policy he mentions. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is not, never has been, and, so long as it continues under its present management, never will be, a political organ. It takes, however, an impartial interest in political affairs, and while it does not indorse or advocate the policy of either the Republican or Democratic party, it gives information as to the doings of both, and reserves to itself the right, as occasion may demand, to approve or condemn the conduct of either. It also urges its readers to do their duty as Christian patriots in laboring earnestly to secure for this great country a righteous and efficient government, believing that they incur a serious responsibility when, through ignorance or apathy, they permit such cases of national iniquity as have occurred during the past ten years to be consummated without making vigorous protest. The present degradation of politics will continue so long as Christian men hold aloof and refrain from exercising their rights to prevent sin being committed in the name of the whole people (Prov. 14 : 34).

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Prohibition Amendment in Ohio, According to recent reports, failed of adoption by 35,397 votes. The law required that the amendment should receive a vote equal to a majority of all cast at the election. As it received 320,454, and the total vote cast was 711,681, there was a majority against it of 70,793. These are not the official figures, but they have been carefully gathered, and are not likely to be materially changed by the official count. It is stated that fully one-third of the Prohibition vote was cast by Democrats. The Prohibitionists have no reason to be dispirited by their failure. A vote of 320,454 in the great State of Ohio indicates remarkable progress of temperance principles. In entering upon another campaign they may draw encouragement from the fact that it needed the change of less than a tenth of the votes cast against them to have given them the victory this year.

The Governor of Utah, the Hon. Eli Murray, confirms the statement of Dr. Talmage and other observers that there is no hope of suppressing polygamy except in military force. In a despatch to Secretary Teller, received on October 15th, Governor Murray, after describing the conspiracy which exists in Utah to defy Congress, the President, and the Supreme Court, says: "I am impelled to warn you, my Secretary, and through you the country, of dangers that beset the country, and to make an earnest appeal for the adjustment of all wrongs, and the establishment of good government in Utah by Congress, and, I may be pardoned for saying, I believe it to be its duty to do this quickly. The history of all States demonstrates that times come when military aid is necessary to support the civil authority. I know of no reason that takes Utah out of the rule. The Utah militia organized under the law and the proper proclamation of my predecessors, but purposely organized to be independent of Federal authority, is not and cannot be made available. It therefore only remains for this Territory that the military forces of the United States be made available, and I present, with the necessity, the recommendation that it be made lawful for soldiers of the United States to be used for the execution of processes out of the courts of the United States, in the hands of the United States Marshal of Utah, and that their services, in case of riot, of insurrection, of domestic violence, and for the preservation of the peace, may more readily be made effective than under the present provision of law." It remains now for Congress to decide whether it will allow its laws and the Governor to be openly defied, or place in the hands of the Executive the power to enforce the law by United States troops. There appears to be no other alternative.

An Important Decision was Rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States on October 15th. A number of cases have been submitted to it from different parts of the country, with the view of testing the constitutionality of the Civil Rights Act. The decision now given, declaring that famous act unconstitutional, is likely to lead to considerable agitation. The act provided that all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States should be entitled to equal accommodations and privileges in inns, public conveyances on land and water, and in theatres and other places of public amusement, subject only to conditions established by law and applicable alike to persons of every race and color. Penalties were provided for violations of the rights defined, and provisions were made for their enforcement in the Federal courts. The court has now decided that Congress had no power under the thirteenth or fourteenth amendment to pass the act, or to legislate directly in the matter, but only to interfere for the protection of citizens in cases in which a State passed laws nullifying the amendment. This decision does not apply to Territories or to the District of Columbia, but only to States.

The Centennial Celebration at Newburg on October 18th was a complete success. The event commemorated was the proclamation of peace on October 18th, 1783, between the colonies and George III., King of Great Britain. Fully 25,000 persons assembled in the space in front of Washington's Headquarters, where a stand had been erected from which spoke the orators of the day. A genial and hearty speech from Senator Bayard, of Delaware, and an eloquent address by Hon. W. M. Evarts were the chief features of the celebration. The day was one long to be remembered in Newburg, and in spite of the long processions it passed off harmoniously.

The Anxiety Generally Felt as to the Fate of Lieutenant Greely and his companions will be somewhat relieved by the report of Lieutenant Garlington, published last week. In reviewing the situation of Lieutenant Greely and his party, Lieutenant Garlington says: "I am of the opinion that if Lieutenant Greely should reach Littleton Island this season, he will divide his people among the different Esquimaux settlements, and the stores he will find on his line of retreat supplemented by the game of that region, will be sufficient food for his party during the coming winter. Unless the condition of the ice permits Lieutenant Greely to leave Discovery Harbor in his boats, I do not think he will attempt the journey to Littleton Island this season. Previous experience shows that a sledge journey in the fall of the year in that latitude is attended with so many difficulties as to make it almost impossible. He has at Discovery Harbor a good house, plenty of fuel and provisions, with what game the country affords to carry him to next spring. He could then start South as early as the state of the season permitted, and reach Cape Sabine without much comparative difficulty. This will, in my opinion, be the course adopted by Lieutenant Greely unless he has found Lady Franklin Sound and Kennedy Channel free of ice, which is improbable."

An Interesting Service was Held on Sunday, October 14th, at Bedford, N. Y. Rev. S. Irenæus Prime, D.D., preached in the Presbyterian Church there a sermon celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the delivery of his first sermon, which was preached from the same pulpit in 1833. Dr. Prime reviewed, in the course of his sermon the stirring events, national, social and religious, of the past half-century, during which he had been preaching and laboring in the cause of Christ. He said that fifty years ago there were only 1855 ministers in the Presbyterian Church. To-day there are 6288. The membership has increased from 233,580 in 1833 to 727,712 in 1883. The foreign missionary work of all the Protestant churches fifty years ago showed 67,775 converts. In 1880 there were 664,417. There is not a single minister living who was a member of the New York Presbytery when Dr. Prime joined.

Mrs. Shipman, the Gospel Temperance Evangelist, who has conducted with remarkable success the mission of the Blue Ribbon Gospel Army in York, England, is now visiting this country. During the past week she addressed meetings in New York City at the Florence Mission, the Twenty-seventh Street Midnight Mission, at Carmel Church, the Thirtieth Street Mission, and the M. E. Church in Forsyth Street. She will remain in New York a few weeks and will then visit Boston and other cities. Managers of missions desiring to avail themselves of her services during her visit may address her at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and their letters will be forwarded.

A New Time Standard has been Adopted by the Convention of Railroad Managers at Chicago, which will make a material difference in the arrangements of business men in many cities. Under the new system there are to be only four standards of time for the whole country, and these just one hour apart—namely, the seventy-fifth meridian, or eastern time, and ninetieth meridian, or central time; the one hundred and fifth meridian, or mountain time, and the one hundred and twentieth meridian, or Pacific time. These are substantially Philadelphia, St. Louis, and Denver times, the one hundred and twentieth meridian being as near Carson City as any other prominent point. New York time is four minutes faster than the eastern or seventy-fifth meridian time, and Philadelphia only one minute slower. Chicago time is nine minutes faster than the central, or ninetieth meridian time, and St. Louis only one minute slower. Denver is exactly on the one hundred and fifth meridian, and San Francisco just ten minutes slower than one hundred and twentieth meridian time.

The Benefits of the John F. Slater Fund were epitomized in the reports presented to the trustees at their annual meeting in New York last week. It appears that the fund's income for the current year is about $60,000, of which $20,000 has already been appropriated, $16,250 having been allotted to twelve institutions in Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Tennessee. All of these institutions have undertaken to provide industrial training. The report recommends the appropriation of a sum not to exceed $1000 per annum for the benefit of students showing exceptional gifts, and a similar sum for the aid of young men who wish to prepare themselves for the practice of medicine among their people.

A Strange Discovery at an Autopsy Made in Washington, D. C., on October 19th, has caused some surprise. The autopsy was on the body of a boy about ten years old, who died suddenly on the day previous. The doctor who conducted the examination stated that the cause of death was an obstruction in the intestines. There were taken from them twenty large seeds of damsons, a copper cent, a nickel, a tooth, two buttons, and other indigestible articles." The boy's parents cannot understand why the boy should have swallowed such a miscellaneous collection of hardware as that found in his stomach by the physicians. There are many of our boys and girls using as mental food trash as little fit for the purpose as the articles the boy swallowed were fit for natural food; but in their case, there is this difference that the bad literature is assimilated only too easily (II Tim. 2 : 16).

A Curious Reason is Given for a Matrimonial separation in Rhode Island. The husband, it appears, has never used liquor, coffee, tea, or tobacco in any form during his life-time. He allowed his present wife to drink tea and coffee. It seems, however, that the lady also uses snuff, and her husband, on discovering the fact several months ago, gave her notice that persistence in the habit would bring about a separation. Finding, a few days ago, that she continued the use of the snuff-box, he took her into the city to the residence of a relative, and there left her, saying that no woman could live with him who used snuff. Both parties have sympathizers among their friends, but amid the general conflict of opinion, all agree that the matter should have been settled before marriage. It is this haste and carelessness in entering into the matrimonial relation which results in so many cases of conjugal unhappiness and divorce scandals. Such carelessness is to be deplored, especially in the case of Christians who, in marrying unconverted people, disobey the apostolic injunction (II Cor. 6 : 14).

Another Young Physician has Fallen a Victim to the opium habit. On Saturday last a New York physician, whose professional career had opened successfully, and who was regarded as a young man of much promise, died through the administration of an overdose of morphine. It is said that he was a great experimenter, and he experimented upon himself with hypodermic injections of morphine to learn the effect of the operation. To such an extent did he carry these experiments that he became a slave to the habit, and practised it continually to gratify his craving for the narcotic. His body was marked all over with the scars left by the injecting needle. He was physically and mentally a wreck from indulgence in the habit. Few people are aware how rapidly the use of this seductive drug is extending in this country, and how many professional men are slaves to its power. The majority of them acquired their first experience, as this young man did, through curiosity. It is with them as with young men who visit the haunts of vice that they "may see life;" they are caught and enslaved before they are aware (Prov. 4 : 14, 15).

A Magic Powder is Said to have Produced fatal results in New York last week. A German blacksmith residing in the city, who was suffering from malaria, was advised by a friend to consult a pretended sorcerer, who claims that he can cure diseases by laying on of hands, spells, and incantations. The blacksmith visited the magician, who said that he could cure him. He informed the blacksmith that he was endowed with magical powers which he had received from a dying Egyptian, the secrets of which were contained in a volume written in blood. He then, it is alleged, gave the man a brown powder which he told him to take the next day, and which would effect a certain cure. When the blacksmith returned home he related the particulars of his interview to his wife, and told her that he would follow his directions. The next morning he took the magic powder, and soon after he was taken ill, and he died two hours later. An autopsy has been ordered to ascertain whether the death was caused by the powder. It is stated that the pretended magician is consulted by large numbers of people who implicitly believe in his supernatural powers. It is remarkable that in an age when faith is scoffed at there should be so many people credulous enough to place confidence in magic (I Tim. 4 : 1).

The Murder of Two Burglars in a Saloon in New York last week caused gratification in the police offices. A number of men were standing at the bar of a saloon in one of the chief thoroughfares of the city, on October 16th, when a man entered and immediately raised his pistol and fired at one of the party. The shot did not injure the man, but merely tore his clothing, and he ran into a billiard-room at the back, while his antagonist followed him and his companions rushed into the street. Five more shots were heard in the billiard-room, and when the police entered they found both men lying on the floor dead. It was stated that both men were expert burglars who had served several terms in prison. It appears that the men had quarrelled two years ago, and had threatened each other's lives, but it had so happened that last week was the first time since the quarrel that they had both been out of prison at the same time. They were fashionably dressed, had plenty of money, and lived in villas in an aristocratic neighborhood, but though they had had many narrow escapes from death in the course of their lawless lives, they died by their own violence at last. Crime is suicide (Prov. 19 : 16).

A Stage was Stopped by a Snake Recently in Nevada. The Carson (Nev.) Appeal relates the following remarkable incident: "On last Thursday night as the stage was coming from Markleville, the road became very heavy near Woodford's Cañon, and the horses finally stopped to rest just this side of Woodford's Station. When the driver attempted to start them again they could not pull an inch. He dismounted and took a lantern to examine the running gear, when he found, as he supposed, that a rope had been tied between the two wheels. Laying his hand on the rope, he started back with a yell of horror on discovering that a live snake had twisted itself between the hind and fore wheels, and was holding the stage securely. The reptile had evidently coiled itself from wheel to wheel when the horses stopped. The passengers got out and killed the snake, which was a mountain runner, and measured above twelve feet." The effect of the snake's position on the wheels of the stage is something like that produced by Satan in the world. He seeks by drunkenness and vice of all kinds to check the advance of the Gospel in the world; and he is never so busy as when the Church is resting (Matt. 13 : 25, 39).

The Curious Capture of a Large Eagle is described in a despatch from Norwich, Conn., under date of September 24th. On that day a boy while rowing on the Thames between Norwich and New London saw a great bird in the water furiously lashing the waves with its wings. He pulled rapidly to the spot, and found it was an eagle struggling to rise, while some object in the river kept it down. The boy attempted to capture it, and a desperate struggle ensued. Then he threw a piece of sail-cloth over it and succeeded in winding his stout anchor rope around its legs. When the lad examined his capture he saw that each of the eagle's sharp claws were tightly fixed in the backbone of a blue-fish. It is supposed that the eagle descended into a large, closely huddled school of blue-fish, and, contrary to its intentions, struck two fish instead of a single one. The double capture was too heavy ballast for an easy rise, and in the struggle the eagle's wings became soaked with water, and then escape was impossible. Its life was sacrificed in the effort to capture a prey too large for its strength. So have many men, fitted by their talents to soar to great things, fallen, never to rise, through descending into the world's struggle to win ignoble prizes (I Tim. 6 : 9, 10).

SPIRITUAL KNOWLEDGE AND ITS PRACTICAL RESULTS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For this cause we also, since the day we heard it, do not cease to pray for you, and to desire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of His will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding; that ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God."—Colossians 1 : 9, 10.

FOR the church that was at Colosse Paul gave hearty thanks to God for many most important blessings, especially for their faith, their love, and their hope. It would be a very useful exercise to our hearts if we would often give thanks to God for the gifts and graces which we discover in our Christian brethren. I am afraid we are more inclined to spy out their faults, and to suppose that we deplore them, than we are to discern the work of the Holy Spirit in them, and from the bottom of our hearts to give thanks to God for them. Paul felt encouraged by what he saw in the Colossian believers to pray to God to enrich them yet further. It should be our desire that our best brethren should be better, and that those who are most like Jesus should be still more completely conformed to His image.

THE IGNORANT IN PERIL.

Paul, as with an eagle eye, surveyed the church at Colosse, which he loved so well, and he noted that it was somewhat lacking in knowledge. The Colossian brotherhood differed considerably from the church at Corinth, which abounded in talent, and was enriched with all knowledge. The Colossians had fewer gifted brethren among them who could act as teachers, and, though this was no fault of theirs, it impoverished them in the matter of knowledge. If you read this epistle through, you will observe that Paul frequently alludes to knowledge and wisdom. To the point in which he judged the Church to be deficient he turned his prayerful attention. He would not have them ignorant. He knew that spiritual ignorance is the constant source of error, instability, and sorrow; and therefore he desired that they might be soundly taught in the things of God. Not that they were destitute of saving knowledge already, but saving knowledge, though it be the most essential attainment, is not the only knowledge which a Christian should seek after. He longs to be useful as well as to be safe. Being himself delivered out of darkness he strives to bring others into the marvellous light of grace.

Paul would have his brethren thoroughly furnished for sacred service, knowing the will of the Lord themselves, and able to teach others. He desired for them that they might possess comforting knowledge, strengthening knowledge, edifying knowledge, sanctifying knowledge, directing knowledge; so that they might be ready for all the trials, duties, and labors of life. Upon this subject I am led to make four observations, and to enlarge upon each of them. May the Holy Spirit by this discourse build us up in the knowledge of God.

I. My first subject is the great value of

for as soon as Paul felt his heart burning with love to the saints at Colosse, and had heard of the work of the Spirit among them, he began to show his love by lifting up his heart in prayer for them. He did that for them which he knew would bless them.

Notice, that intercessory prayer is a very im- portant part of the work of Christians for one another. We are not sent into the world to live unto ourselves, but we are members of one body, and each member is expected to contribute to the health and the comfort of the whole. It is true we cannot all preach, but we can all pray; we cannot all distribute alms from our substance, but we can all offer prayer from our hearts. In temporal things we may not be able to enrich the Church for lack of substance; but if we fail to bless the church by our prayers it will be for lack of grace. Whatever you fail in, dearly beloved, and I pray that you may in nothing come behind, yet for all the saints, that every blessing may abound toward them.

Intercessory prayer is to be esteemed as an invaluable proof of love, and as the creator of more love. The man who will truly pray for me will certainly forgive me readily if I offend him; he will relieve me if I am in necessity; and he will be prepared to assist me if I am engaged in a service too hard for me. Give us your earnest prayers, and we know that we live in your hearts. How sweet it is to be permitted thus to manifest our love to one another! Therefore, by your love to your Lord, and to all those who are in Him, I beseech you abound in intercessory prayer, as the apostle did.

Intercessory prayer, again, is most valuable, because it is an infallible means of obtaining the blessings which we desire for our friends. It is not in vain that we ask, for it is written, "Every one that asketh receiveth." It is not in vain that we intercede for others, for the Lord delights to answer such petitions. The unselfish devotion which pleads as eagerly for others as for itself is so pleasing to the Lord that He puts great honour upon it. Whatsoever thou wisely desirest for thy friend go about to get it for him, but hasten first to the throne of grace. If thou wouldst have thy friend converted, if thou wouldst have him strengthened, if thou wouldst have him taught of God, if thou wouldst have him quickened to a nobler life, and elevated to a higher consecration, do him this great service—take his case before the Lord in prayer; and in so doing thou hast gone the wisest way to work to enrich him.

Note, brethren, that such intercessory prayer will be all the more valuable if it is

OUR IMMEDIATE RESORT.

The apostle says, "Since the day we heard it, we do not cease to pray for you." He began to pray at once. Whenever you perceive the work of the Spirit in any heart, pray at once, that the holy change may proceed with power. Whenever you discover any lack in a brother begin on the day you hear of it to pray that his lack may be supplied. There should be no delaying of prayer. Linger not a minute, speed thee to the mercy-seat. The Lord indicates to thee what thy prayer shall be by the news which thou hast just heard of thy friend; therefore, bring his case at once before the throne of grace. Divine providence has brought the needful subject for prayer under thy notice; therefore, this day begin to pray about it.

Our prayers will be all the more valuable if they are incessant as well as immediate. "We cease not," said Paul, "to pray for you since the day we heard it." "Oh," says one, "was Paul always praying for the Colossians from the day he heard of their welfare? It may have been months and years; did he never cease to pray?" I answer, he was always praying for them in the sense which he explains; he adds, "and to desire." Now, desire is the essence of prayer; in fact, desire is the kernel of prayer, and the vocal expressions which we call by the name of prayer are often but its shell; inward desire is the life, the heart, the reality of prayer. Though you cannot always be speaking in prayer, you can always be desiring in prayer. We can hardly realize the value to the church and to the world of that intercessory prayer which ceases not day nor night, but without fail ascends before the Lord as the incense ascended from the altar.

One more observation, and I have done with this. Intercessory prayer is increased in value when it is not from one person alone, but is offered in intimate union with other saints. Paul says, "We also," not "I only," but "We also, since the day we heard it, cease not." If two of you agree as touching anything concerning the kingdom, you have the blessing secured to you by a special promise of God. I commend to you, brethren and sisters, the habit of

FREQUENT PRAYER TOGETHER.

When a Christian friend drops in, his visit will perhaps end in mere talk unless you secure its spiritual profit by at least a few minutes spent in united prayer. I frequently during the day, when a friend comes in upon the Master's business, say, "Let us pray before you go," and I always find the request is welcomed. Such prayers do not occupy much time, and if they did, it might be well spent; but such united supplications oil the wheels of life's heavy wain, and cause it to move with less of that creaking which we too often hear.

Thus have I expatiated upon the excellences which increase the value of intercessory prayer. Use much this heavenly art. It is effectual for ten thousand ends. It turneth every way to bless the church. Brethren, pray for us, pray for all saints, pray for all sinners, and by so doing you will be the benefactors of your age.

II. Our second observation from the text is this—we learn here the preciousness of

for all this earnest, ceaseless prayer is offered for this end, "That ye might be filled with the knowledge of His will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding."

First, consider the men for whom this knowledge is desired. They are saints and faithful brethren, of whom we read that they "knew the grace of God in truth," and were "bringing forth fruit" unto God. For those who know the Lord already we must not cease to pray. We dare not say in this case that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing, for a little knowledge of the things of God may suffice to save the soul; but more knowledge is a most desirable thing for those who have that little knowledge. Pray therefore for them. Let not your prayers plead only and altogether for the unconverted, but intreat for our young converts that they may be further edified. It will be an ill day when we are so engaged in seeking lost sheep that we forget the lambs. It would be very mischievous for us to neglect our work at home in order to carry on warfare with the adversary abroad. We desire life for the dead, health for the living, and maturity for the healthy. For the deeper instruction of our younger brethren let us pray.

Of this desirable knowledge, what is the measure? We desire for them "that they may be filled with the knowledge of His will." "Filled"—this is grand scholarship, to have the mind, and heart, and the whole of our manhood filled with knowledge. Paul would not have a believer ignorant upon any point; he would have him filled with knowledge, for when a measure is full of wheat there is no room for chaff. True knowledge excludes error. The men that go after false doctrine are usually those who know little of the Word of God; being untaught they are unstable, ready to be blown about with every wind of doctrine. If you leave empty spots in your minds unstored with holy teaching, they will be an invitation to the devil to enter in and dwell there. Fill up the soul, and so shut out the enemy.

Let us try to know divine truth more and more intimately. You know a man, for you pass him in the streets with a nod; you know another man far better, for you lodge in the same house with him; you know him best of all when you have shared his trouble, partaken in his joy, and have, in fact, had fellowship with him by blending your two lives in one common stream of friendship. When you learn a spiritual truth endeavor to know it out and out; to know its foundation and upbuilding; to know it by the application of the Spirit to your own soul so that you are filled with it.

This makes me notice what the matter of this knowledge is; "filled with the knowledge of His will." What is that? It means the revealed will of God. Paul would have the Colossians know what the Lord has revealed, as far as human mind could grasp it, whether it were doctrine, precept, experience, or prophecy. How well it is to know the preceptive will of God. Our prayer should daily be, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?"

LORD, TEACH ME

what is sin, and what is righteousness, that I may discern things which are excellent. Whereas there are questions in the church of God itself upon what the will of the Lord is, Lord help me not to care to know what is the will of this learned doctor, or what is the will of a certain assembly, but what is the Lord's will. "To the law and to the testimony," this is our touchstone.

Still we have not done, for we must now notice the manner as well as the matter of this knowledge; "in all wisdom and spiritual understanding." Wisdom is better than knowledge, for wisdom is knowledge rightly used. Knowledge may find room for folly, but wisdom casts it out. Knowledge may be the horse, but wisdom is the driver. We want Christian people not only to know, but to use what they know. Happy is he who knows what to do at the right time! Many people are very knowing half an hour after it is too late; but to be filled with wisdom is to be able at once to apply knowledge rightly in difficult cases.

YOU NEED WISDOM

so to conduct your affairs that nothing therein shall scandalize the weak, or bring dishonor upon the name of Christ; for mere knowledge will not suffice for this. Knowledge is the blade, wisdom is the full corn in the ear. Knowledge is the cloth, but wisdom is the garment. Knowledge is the timber, but wisdom hath builded her house. May all our knowledge be sanctified by grace and attended with the guidance of the Spirit that we may become wise to know what the will of the Lord is.

"All wisdom," saith the apostle—many-handed wisdom, wisdom of all sorts, wisdom that will serve you in the shop, wisdom that will be useful in the counting-house, wisdom that will aid the Church of God, and wisdom that will guide you if you are cast among the vilest of mankind. May you "be filled with knowledge in all wisdom."

But that wisdom which operates without must be attended by a spiritual understanding which is powerful within. I hardly know how to explain this; it is an inward knowledge of truth, the knowledge of the inward parts of things. It is a spiritual discernment, taste, experience, and reception of truth, whereby the soul feeds upon it, and takes it into herself. We know many men who know much but understand nothing. They accept implicitly what they are taught, but they have never considered it, weighed it, estimated it, found out the roots of it, or seen the heart of it. Oh, to have in the church men full of spiritual understanding!

III. Now, thirdly, let us see in the text a lesson concerning of spiritual knowledge. Paul prays for his friends "that ye might be filled with the knowledge of His will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding; that ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing." See, see the drift of his prayer—"that ye may walk." Not that ye might talk, not that ye might sit down and meditate, and enjoy yourselves, but "that ye might walk." He aims at practical results.

He desires that the saints may be instructed so that they may walk according to the best model. By walking worthy of the Lord Jesus we do not understand in any sense that He expected them to possess such worthiness as to deserve to walk with the Lord; but He would have them live in a manner that should be in accordance with their communion with Christ. You would not have a man walk with Christ through the streets to-day clothed in motley garments, or loathsome with filth; would you? No, if a man be a leper, Christ will heal him before He will walk with him. Let not a disciple walk so as to bring disgrace upon his Lord! When you walk with a king, you should be yourself royal in gait; when you commune with a prince you should not act the clown. It is well to have no lower standard than the desire to live over again the life of the Lord Jesus—a life of tenderness, a life of self-sacrifice, a life of generosity, a life of love, a life of honesty, a life of holy service, a life of close communion with God. Mix all virtues in due proportion, and that is the life of Jesus toward which you must press forward with all your heart.

Next, the apostle would have us get knowledge in order that we may so live as to be pleasing to our best friend—"worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing." Is not that beautiful? To live so as to please God in all respects! Some live to please themselves, and some to please their neighbors, and some to please their wives, and some to please their children, and some live as if they wished to please the devil; but our business is to please Him in all things whose servants we are. Without faith it is impossible to please Him; so away with unbelief! Without holiness no man shall see Him, much less please Him; therefore let us follow after holiness, and may the Lord work it in us.

I fear that many children of God grieve their heavenly Father much through sins of ignorance—an ignorance in which they ought not to remain a single day. Be it clearly understood that are truly sins. They have not about them the venom and the aggravation which are found in sins against light and knowledge, but still they are sins; for the measure of our duty is not our light, but the law of God itself. If a man pleads that he follows his conscience, yet this will not excuse his wrong-doing if his conscience is an unenlightened conscience, and he is content to keep it in the dark. You are to obey the will of the Lord; that will is the standard of the sanctuary. Our conscience is often like a deficient weight, and deceives us; be it ours to gather a clear knowledge of the word, that we may prove what is that perfect and acceptable will of God.

Look at the text again—"That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful." Paul would have us producing the best fruit. Without knowledge we cannot be fruitful; at least in the points whereof we are ignorant we must fail to bring forth fruit. Therefore would he have us to be right well taught, that we may abundantly produce fruit unto God's glory. He says, "fruitful in every good work;" and this means much.

There is another note in this verse which I beg you to notice. Paul would have them cultivate a of the best things He says—"Fruitful in every good work." Here is room and range enough—"in every good work." Have you the ability to preach the Gospel? Preach it! Does a little child need comforting? Comfort it! Can you stand up and vindicate a glorious truth before thousands? Do it! Does a poor saint need a bit of dinner from your table? Send it to her. Let works of obedience, testimony, zeal, charity, piety, and philanthropy all be found in your life. Do not select big things as your special line, but glorify the Lord also in the littles—"fruitful in every good work."

I have no doubt that you will naturally abound most in certain good works for which you have the largest capacity, but still nothing ought to come amiss to you. I have known persons in household employment in England who would not do a turn beyond their special work to save their masters' lives; these are a sort of servants of whom the fewer the better. In India this is carried to a ridiculous extreme. The Hindoo water-bearer will not sweep the house, nor light a fire, nor brush your clothes—he will fetch water, and nothing else; you must, therefore, have a servant for each separate thing, and then each man will do his own little bit, but he will not go an inch beyond. When we enter into Christ's church we should come prepared to wash the saints' feet, or bear their burdens, or bind up their wounds, or fight their foes, or act as steward, or shepherd, or nurse.

Why is it that some are not fruitful in this comprehensive way? Because they are not filled with knowledge in all wisdom. When a man says, "You ask me to do the lowest work! Don't you know that I am a man of remarkable ability who should have higher work to do?" I venture to assert that he is an ignorant man. Self-assertion is ignorance on horseback. You have probably read of in the American service a century ago. A general as he rode along saw a body of men endeavoring to lift timber. They were short-handed, and the work lagged, but their famous corporal stood by ordering them about at a magnificent rate. The general passed and said, "Why don't you lend them help and put your shoulder to it?" "Why, sir," said the great little officer, "how can you think of such a thing? Do you know who I am? I am a corporal!" The general got off his horse, pulled off his coat, and helped to move the timber, and by his judicious help the soldiers achieved their task. Then he turned to the high and mighty gentleman and said, "Mr Corporal, next time you want a man to do such work as this you can send for me; I am General Washington." Just so the Lord Jesus Christ if He were here would gladly do a thousand things which His poor little servants are too great to touch.

I know you, dear brother, you are too experienced, too old, too learned to help the Sunday-school! I know you are too respectable to give away a tract! Pray get out of such ignorant ways of thinking, and ask to be useful in all possible ways. If you have done a little, do much; if you have done much, do more; and when you have done more, ask for grace to proceed to the highest possible degree of usefulness for your Lord.

IV. And now, fourthly, notice

THE REFLEX ACTION

of holiness upon knowledge. We have only a few moments left; let my few words sink into your hearts. "Fruitful in every good work"—what then? "increasing in the knowledge of God." Look at that. It seems, then, that holiness is the road to knowledge. God has made it so. If any man will do His will he shall know of the doctrine. If you read and study, and cannot make out the meaning of Scripture, get up and do something, and it may be, in the doing of it, you shall discover the secret. Holiness of heart shall increase the illumination of your mind.

Will you kindly observe that this knowledge rises in tone? for Paul first prayed that they "might be filled with the knowledge of God's will;" but now he implores for them an increase in the knowledge of God Himself. Oh, blessed growth, first to know the law, and then to know the Law-giver!

I would call your attention to another thought. The apostle, if he is to be judged according to his outward language, often utters impossible things, and yet his every sentence is not only full of deep meaning, but is strictly correct. Notice his language here; in the ninth verse he says, "that ye might be filled with the knowledge of His will." Can anything go beyond this? The vessel is filled right up to the brim, what can it have more? Yet the apostle says, "increasing in the knowledge of God." So that Paul plainly teaches us here that, if we have so increased in knowledge as to be full, he would have us increased in capacity to know yet more; he would have our manhood enlarged, our powers of reception increased, that we might grow from being children to be young men, and from young men to be fathers, and so may be filled—filled, always filled with all the fulness of God! The Lord grant unto us to perceive with humility, that if we are already full of knowledge, we can still advance, for we "have not yet attained." Let no man think that he can go no further.

Holy Bernard says "he is not good at all who doth not desire to be better." I also subscribe to that saying. Some might become good if they were not puffed up with the fancy of their own perfection. Others are somewhat commendable, but will never grow because they judge themselves to be full-grown already. I would have you filled, and yet have room for more; filled with all knowledge, filled with all holiness, filled with the indwelling Spirit, filled with God, and yet increasing in knowledge, in holiness, in likeness to God, and in all good things overmore to His glory. The Lord add His blessing for Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Influence of the Pope and his Cardinals in the city of Rome appears to have produced no beneficial effect on society there. A Christian traveller who recently visited the seat of the Papal government, thus writes of what he saw: "I fear no contradiction in saying that in Rome's more respectable society its people are puerile, frivolous, non-progressive, and atheistic; while among the lower ranks, gross ignorance, dark superstition, ungoverned passion, and brutal cruelty prevail. The Papal Church will not lift a little finger in the cause of elevation and reform outside its own mystic circle. The sweetness and light of its influence on society at large are nil. One simple instance of this may be cited in the fact that there exists in Italy no national law prohibiting cruelty to animals; the result, certainly, of the apathy and indifference of the Church. So it comes to pass that in Rome and Naples the sinless servitors and companions of mankind are treated with savage and ruthless tyranny; and humanity, the very first lesson of Christianity, is altogether 'conspicuous by its absence.'"

"His Sombre Rivals" is the Title of a thrilling story by E. P. Roe, which is published by Messrs. Dodd, Mead & Co., of New York. Apart from the plot of the story, which is skilfully constructed, there is much in its incidents to interest and instruct the reader. Mr. Roe has succeeded in depicting in vivid colors the horrors of the war, and, without by any solitary expression hurting the sensibilities of Northern or Southern readers, has shown how terrible was the suffering on both sides in that sad time. The agony of parting, the torture of suspense, the desolation of bereavement with which homes on both sides were familiar, are drawn in this story with rare power; and the generation which has grown up since that time, can realize in reading its pages how much that struggle cost the heroes who fought and the heroines who remained suffering and heart-broken at home. Besides these scenes of sorrow there is a striking description of spiritual life. The progress from materialism, which in times of peace and happiness seemed satisfactory to the intellect, but which in the presence of sorrow and death stood revealed in its cold and ghastly emptiness, to faith in God and love for the Saviour. Mr. Roe has described with the pen of a master. The story fully equals, if it does not surpass, any Mr. Roe has yet produced. Its price, elegantly bound in cloth, is $1.50; by mail, $1.60.

Rijutei, the Corean Convert.

An Itinerant Preacher Pursued by Constables.

RIJUTEI, THE CONVERTED COREAN NOBLEMAN.

In the year 1880 an embassy from Corea visited Japan. During their stay in that country three of their number called upon a Mr Tsuda to obtain information concerning agricultural and political economy. Mr. Tsuda was a Christian, and told them about Christianity. They were pleased to hear, and on their return they told a nobleman named "Isuchan" (in Japanese, Rijutei) what they had heard and seen.

This nobleman was a personal friend of the King of Corea, who, during the revolt in July, 1882, saved the life of the queen and kept her concealed in the interior until the overthrow of the usurper Tai-unkun. The king was much pleased with the conduct of Rijutei, and offered him any reward that he might choose. Rijutei declined the proffered honors, and asked instead that he might go to Japan and study the progress and civilization of that country. His request was immediately granted.

He at once found Mr. Tsuda, and began the study of the Scriptures. As a Chinese scholar the Word of God was open to him at once. He could also converse with the educated Japanese. Not long after this he had a very remarkable dream, in which two men appeared bearing between them a basket of books. He asked what these books were, and was told they were the most valuable of all books for Corea. He then said, "What are they called?" The reply was, "These are Bibles." This singular dream seemed to him a revelation from heaven, and he prosecuted his studies with greater diligence and zeal. He soon became a sincere Christian, and was babtized on the 28th of April, 1883, by Rev. Mr. Yasukawa, a pastor of one of the Presbyterian churches in Tokio.

Rijutei is now engaged in preparing a China-Corean version of the Scriptures. He has completed the Gospels and the book of Acts, and is now at work upon the Epistle to the Romans. When this work is completed he proposes to translate the whole into the Corean language. The American Bible Society is assisting him in the work, and it is expected will publish his version at once.

An officer of the Japanese Government recently called upon him and stated that an official newspaper was about to be started in Tokio, and they wished to secure his services to edit the Corean department. He replied, "I am otherwise employed, and cannot do as you wish."

This converted Corean nobleman pleads most earnestly for missionaries and teachers. He says now is the time to move. Great changes are going on, and the way will soon be open for the free spread of the Gospel.

At a Christian convention held in Tokio, Japan, in June last, Rijutei made the following statements:

"I was born in an uncivilized country, and educated in accordance with the rude customs of my people. But recently I came to Japan, and by the guidance of the Holy Spirit and your great kindness I have been led to believe in Christ and have received baptism. But thus far I have had only a glimpse at the great truths of the Bible, and can hardly understand one millionth part of it. So I dare not presume to teach in such a gathering as this. Yet my heart is so full that I cannot keep silence. I pray you to hear me patiently, and if I am in error, I desire to be shown the right way.

"It is a great privilege of Christians that they are not to contend alone with Satan. It is by the aid of the Holy Spirit, and not by their own power or wisdom, that they are kept from destruction. Buddhism leaves man to struggle alone. It hangs a ladder high in the air on which men are to climb to heaven, and tells the people to go up on it. Thus we find that Christianity is an easy way, it is suited to our wants, and it is true; while Buddhism is difficult, does not benefit mankind, and is false."

Rijutei has opened a Sunday-School for Coreans, and is teaching the way of salvation through faith in Jesus Christ. He has decided to devote himself entirely to the ministry of the Gospel, and is at present in Tokio, in Japan. He contemplates an early visit to America and England.

A PREACHER'S FLIGHT.

When the Wesleys first commenced their labors in England Satan stirred up opposition of all kinds, and when the local judges were opposed to the new movement, the police were ready to obey their orders. The following incident, related by John Wesley in his diary, illustrates this condition of affairs.

Crabbe was the name of the first "Rounder," or "Travelling Preacher," who statedly visited St. Just, under the direction of the Wesleys. Like the saintly pioneers whom he followed, he was soon pounced upon by the Squire Eustick, who issued a warrant against him. So the next time he appeared he was seized and led by two constables to a tavern, to wait the leisure of the valiant squire. In such a case, St Just men, constables as they were, would not be hard.

"Will you let me call at William Chenhall's?" inquired the preacher, whose horse was in Chenhall's stable. "Oh, yes! if you please."

The call was made. But by-and-by, the parish officials had to lead the preacher to the Squire's house. They must needs pass Chenhall's door. There Crabbe's horse stood saddled and bridled. Crabbe suddenly slipped back from between his civil guards, in one instant was on the saddle, and in another was seen galloping off on the road to St. Ives. It was all the work of a minute. The poor constables stood staring just long enough to give Crabbe an advantage; but then, recalled to duty, they threw off their coats and started fairly in hot pursuit. Their object was by cross-ways to cut off the runaway preacher. They might have done it, perhaps, but that a John Daniel had heard the call for help. His cottage was some miles from the starting-point. When Crabbe galloped up to the gate of John Daniel's cottage, there was a fresh horse all ready. To pass from one saddle to another was, with Crabbe, the work of an instant; and off he went in defiance of constables.

One of these battered constables was John Bonetta, of whom it might have been said afterward that "he which persecuted us in times past now preacheth the faith which once he destroyed." Bonetta became a zealous Methodist, and as a leader preached the faith to his neighbors; and for nearly sixty years exemplified a saintly character of no common order.

MISS RUTHERFORD'S RIDE.

"If I might be so bold, miss, I would say do not ride Harebell this morning. I don't like his looks at all. His muscles are all of a quiver-like, and there's a lot of wickedness in his eye, which says as plain as plain can be, 'I'm ready for mischief.' Be persuaded, miss, and have the pony this morning."

So spoke Roger, an old and faithful servant of Mr. Rutherford, who for many years had proved his devotion to his employer's interests, and who regarded the horses in the stable and the dogs in the kennel with an interest as deep as though they were his own. He professed to understand both equine and canine nature, and, to do him justice, Roger's judgment, when once expressed, was rarely unsound, or his sagacity at fault.

Miss Rutherford Cautioned by her Aged Groom.

As a rule Miss Rutherford considered the old man's opinion, concerning either horse or dog, as worthy o' consideration. And no wonder, for it was he through whose skilful and patient training she had become the most daring, and for that matter the most graceful, equestrienne in all the countryside. But on this particular morning she was in high spirits and in no mood to listen to prudent counsels. It was the first bright morning after a long succession of rainy days, and she longed with an earnestness that only an ardent lover of equestrian exercise can understand for a wild gallop over the hills. But Harebell also had been confined in his quarters during the rainy weather, and he, too, was as ready as his young mistress for exercise. Instead, therefore, of paying her customary deference to the warning words of the faithful Roger, Miss Rutherford began to banter him upon his loss of courage—told him that he must be getting into his dotage now that he had become afraid of a horse, and assured him that, thanks to his training, she was not afraid of Harebell, who had always been docile under her management.

"Well, miss, if you will, you will, I suppose," said Roger; "but I do wish you would be advised by me."

"I am thoroughly vexed with you, Roger," replied Miss Rutherford, "for saying such spiteful things about my bonnie Harebell," and turning to her horse, she stroked him and caressed his noble head with her own hands, saying meanwhile, "We won't notice what the old man says, will we, dear? We shall have our scamper across the hills now the weather will let us, won't we?"

Turning to Roger, Miss Rutherford gave her instructions to have Harebell saddled and all ready for her immediately after breakfast, and desiring that Joe, the stable-boy, should accompany her.

The old man, grieved at heart, promised to carry out the instructions of his young mistress; but before doing so, he crept away into a corner of the stable, and there upon some new straw, he fell upon his knees in prayer. "O Lord," he exclaimed, "if my young lady will go out, don't let any real harm befall her, I humbly pray Thee. If anything happened to her, master would break his heart, Thou knowest."

Harebell was saddled to the minute, and no sooner was his fair rider seated, than he started briskly but with that wild, unmanageable look in his eye that Roger knew by experience meant mischief. And now they have reached the short fragrant grass which springs like velvet beneath Harebell's prancing hoofs, as with quickening speed he dashes onward. He is galloping furiously, and, for the first time in her recollection, Miss Rutherford is actually a trifle afraid of him. She endeavors to check his mad, impetuous flight, but her strength is powerless; her utmost power on the reins had no effect on the horse, who now held the snaffle bit firmly in his teeth.

At last Miss Rutherford's horsemanship and calm daring both fail her, and she is seized with uncontrollable terror. She shrieks, but her shrill cry only seems to give wings to the frenzied flight of the horse. As for Joe, the stable-boy who was acting as her attendant, he is a long way behind. A moment later and Harebell and his rider lie prostrate on the ground, the former having stepped into a hole which a mole had burrowed out, and the other insensible from her heavy fall. Upon her recovering consciousness later on, much to her surprise, old Roger was bending over her in an attitude of evident anxiety.

As soon as the reckless rider had left the house, Roger felt a resistless impulse to follow her. He mounted another horse, and did so, and it was well for her that the faithful servant was so close at hand; for Harebell was plunging violently in his efforts to rise, and his hoofs were every minute within a few inches of her unconscious form. He stayed with her until Joe came up, and then they carried her to the nearest cottage, where she lay until her father arrived in a carriage to carry her home. Many days she lay hovering between life and death. The shock of her fall had produced injuries which for a long time baffled the skill of the surgeons, and placed her life in peril.

Eventually her strong constitution overcame the trouble, and she recovered slowly. On the first day of her appearance in the drawing-room she begged that Roger might be brought to her; and the old fellow entered with moist eyes but with a thankful face.

"Roger," she said, extending her hand to him, "I owe you an apology. I am a wilful girl, but I have suffered much through neglecting your warning."

"Don't mind that, miss, you didn't hurt old Roger by your wurreds. It was only playfulness. But your white face scared me when I saw you lying on the grass. Thank God you are alive and well."

"I have, Roger, many times, and I think I've learned a lesson I needed to learn. I shall not have quite so much confidence in myself in future."

"If you have really learned that, miss, I'm thankful. Young folks don't learn that lesson easy in a general way. If you'll excuse a word from an old man as loves you and is old enough to be your grandfather, you can't do better than go on learning it. I'm an old man now, and for more than forty years I have had no confidence in myself; but I've put my trust in the Lord, and He has guided me right, and I'm trusting Him to take care o' me all through. My road's been kinder rough at times, and I've had many a fall, but that was when I looked to myself and forgot Him. He's been very good to me all through, and after forty years' experience I can recommend the same Almighty Friend to you, miss. He loves you so that He died to save you. Excuse me speaking so, miss, but I've tried Him, and now I'm an old man I can recommend Him to everybody I love."

"Thank you, Roger, I am sure you are right. I ought to seek Him and I will." Miss Rutherford did seek, as she promised, and received the invariable reward of those who seek in earnest.

POVERTY'S PREY.

A SERIAL STORY.

Home and Prison.

VICTORIA had been reaching down the two cracked cups and the loaf of bread from a corner cupboard; and now she stood for a moment looking wistfully into the fire, her pale, thin face flushed a little into almost delicate beauty. Under the pillow on which she rested her head every night, and on which it lay many a long hour of the wearyful day, there was always hidden a precious little store of money, slowly accumulating by a few pence at a time, the fund that was to pay for her own coffin, and the other costs of her own poor funeral. She had made a shroud of coarse calico for herself, and kept it carefully ready against the time it would be needed.

There was no question in her mind, or her father's, that this fund would be needed probably before the next summer came. Her doctor, who was a druggist living in the next street, assured her that good living and better clothing and warmer lodging were all she needed; but he might as well have ordered her to the south of France for the winter. It was Euclid's chief anxiety now that the sum should grow as fast as possible, lest an unusually severe winter might hasten on the necessity for it. And to Victoria it was a matter of as much interest and care as to him, so often did she reckon up the cost of a coffin and a grave, and count over the money provided to procure them for her. She thought of it again as she stood looking into the fire, and saw as vividly and fleetly as a flash of lightening her own funeral passing down the narrow, common staircase, the children trooping after it, but only her old and weeping father following as mourner. She stooped down, and kissed him, as if to comfort him beforehand for the grief that was to come.

"Is anythink ailin' you, Victoria?" he inquired in as gentle a tone as he could lower his voice to.

"Nothin' fresh, daddy," she answered; "only you'll be lonesome when I'm gone."

"Ay, ay," said Euclid. "It'll be a dark shop wi'out you, my dear."

He said no more, but sat slowly rubbing his legs up and down before the fire, while his memory travelled back over the twenty-five years that had passed since he was a strong man, able and willing to work hard and to live hard for the sake of his wife and children. Victoria saw him counting his children on his fingers, as he huskily muttered their names. He seemed to see them all, his boys and girls, who were gone out of this troublesome world down into the dark secret of the grave; they were all living in his memory, and his wife, too, who had trodden the same strange yet familiar road eighteen years ago. He had buried them all, and had never once taken a penny from the parish. His withered face lit up as the thought crossed his mind.

"Victoria," he said, as if this recollection had reminded him of Mrs. Fell, "there's a mort o' trouble down-stairs in the ground-floor back. There's Mrs. Fell as bad off or worse than us, though she do take parish pay. There's no luck in parish money, I know; but she's dead beat, I s'pose. I saw her comin' back from the pawnshop, and she looked like death. There's her boy David away, and nobody knows where he's gone to, and she's almost heartbroke. I took the liberty o' noticin', and there's not a scrap o' fire in their room. So, Victoria, my dear, if you didn't mind it, we might ask her up here a bit when we've done our tea. There's not enough for all, or we'd ask her to come up for her tea. But she's got no fire, and we have; and four of us will be warmer than two, if you didn't mind it."

"Mind it, daddy?" repeated Victoria. "I'd be right glad if she'll come."

Many a time had Victoria glanced longingly into Mrs. Fell's room as she passed the door, and wished she would call out, and invite her in. But Mrs. Fell had felt herself in a superior position to Euclid—a laundress being surely of a higher social standing than a water-cress-seller, to say nothing of living on the ground-floor instead of the attic—and she had taken but little notice of Euclid's girl amid the constantly changing members who inhabited the house.

Bess was better known to Victoria; and David had many a time shown himself friendly, and run errands for her when she was too poorly to go out herself. To-night she could not swallow a morsel after her father's suggestion. As soon as tea was over, and the cups and tea-pot put away, with every token of their poor meal, Euclid went down-stairs to carry his invitation in person, while Victoria arranged an empty box or two to serve as seats about the fire, upon which she put another tiny shovelful of coals. Her color came and went fitfully as she heard Mrs. Fell's slow footstep mounting the steps leading to their attic, followed by her father and Bess; and she received them shyly, but gladly, at the door.

"It's very kind on you and Mr. Euclid, I'm sure," panted Mrs. Fell, with the ghost of a smile on her face, "and I take it neighborly; and if there's anything as me and Bess can do"—

"Please come and sit down in the chair," said Victoria, interrupting her easily; for she was still struggling for breath. She was soon seated in the chair, which was placed in front of the fire; while Euclid sat on one side on an old box, with Bess and Victoria opposite on another. The flickering flame of the small fire shone upon their faces, and was the only light by which they saw each other. But in a few minutes they felt almost like old friends.

"She's the last I've got," said old Euclid to Mrs. Fell, nodding at Victoria, who was talking to Bess. "Her mother died on her, when she were born eighteen years ago. She were too weak to get the better on it, and she had to go. I'd five little children when she died. Victoria's got her complaint," he went on, in a lower tone, "and she's the last out o' eight on them. Boys and gals, they're all gone afore me."

"It's His will as knows best, Mr. Euclid," said Mrs. Fell, with a heavy sigh.

"I s'pose it is," replied Euclid. "I hope He knows; for I'm sure I don't. I've had no time for thinkin' of nothink but how to keep off the parish. Not as I'd say a word agen a woman takin' parish pay, a poor weakly woman like you. But it 'ud be a sore disgrace for a man to come on the parish even for his buryin'."

Mrs. Fell sighed again, and sat looking into the red embers of the fire sadly, as if she was seeing again the bright days of her married life.

"I never lost nobody, save my poor David—my husband, I mean," she said; "and by good luck he were in a buryin' club, and they gave him a very good funeral—a hearse, and a mournin'-coach for me and the two children, and plumes! But there'll be nobody save the parish to bury me; for Bess is only a child, and David's gone."

"Where's he gone to?" asked Victoria.

"He went out on a little journey nigh upon a month ago," she answered; "and we've never heard a word of him since he said 'Good-by, mother.' He's never come back again. Somethink's happened to him, I know; for he's always that good to me and Bess, you couldn't think! I'm frettin' after him all the while more than I can tell; it's wastin' me away. But it's God's will, as good folks say; and there's none on us as can fight agen Him."

"And Bess says you've been forced to part wi' your weddin' ring," Victoria replied, with a shy look of sympathy.

The tears welled up into Mrs. Fell's eyes, and Bess bowed her head in shame. For the first evening in her life, when she had no work to do, the poor woman felt that her finger had lost its precious sign of her married life. She might almost as well have been an unmarried woman—one of those wretched creatures on whom she had always looked down with honest pride and a little hardness. She laid her right hand over her undecorated finger, and looked back into Victoria's sympathizing face with an expression of bitter grief.

"I'll work till I drop to get it back," cried Bess, with energy.

"I wish my missis were alive now," said Euclid. "I'm always a-wishin' it; but she were a good woman, and she knew summat more about God than most folks, and about Him as died for us. I never was a scholar; but she could read, ay, splendid! and she knew a mort o' things. She taught me a lot, and I remembered them long enough to teach Victoria some of 'em. Victoria, my dear, there's them verses as was your mother's favorites—them as I taught you when you was little. I've forgot 'em myself, Mrs. Fell; but she's got them all right and straight in her head, and she says them back to me now my memory's gone. Sometimes I think it's her mother a sayin' of 'em. 'The Lord,' you know, my dear."

Victoria's face flushed again, and her voice trembled a little as she began to speak, while Bess fastened her dark eyes eagerly upon her; and Euclid and Mrs. Fell, with their careworn and withered faces turned straight to the fire, nodded their heads at the close of each verse, as if uttering a silent "Amen."

"The Lord is my shepherd: I shall not want.

"He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; He leadeth me beside the still waters.

"He restoreth my soul; He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name's sake.

"Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me: thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.

"Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies; thou anointest my head with oil: my cup runneth over.

"Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever."

It was with a calmer mind that Mrs. Fell retired to rest after she had left her friends to go to her own rooms, and as she thought of her missing boy she felt more at ease in the thought that wherever he was God was watching over him. At the same time David was gaining his first experience of prison life.

It was quite dark at night when the prison-van containing David and other convicted offenders reached the jail to which they were committed. As yet he was still feeling bewildered and confused; and the sound of heavy doors clanging after him as he passed through them, and the long, narrow passages along which he was led, only served to heighten his perplexity. He had hardly ever been within walls except those of the poor house which had been his home as long as he could remember, and the prison appeared immeasurably large as he dragged his weary footsteps along the stone flagging of the corridors. The spotless cleanliness of both floor and walls seemed also to remove him altogether out of the world with which he was acquainted. The dirt and squalor of the old jails would have been more homelike to him.

By the time his hair had been cropped close to his head, and the prison-garb put upon him in the place of his own familiar clothes, stained and tattered with long wear of them, he began to doubt his own identity. Was he really David Fell? Could he be the boy who had hitherto led the freest life possible, roaming about the busy streets, with no person to forbid or to question him? David Fell could not be he who was now locked up quite alone in a little cell, dimly lighted by a gas-jet, which itself was locked up in a cage lest he should touch it. Not a sound came to his ears, let him listen as sharply as he could. Where was the old roll and roar of the streets, and the cries of children, and the shrill voices of women, and the din and tumult, and stir and life, to which he was accustomed? No dream as dreadful as this silence and solitude had ever visited him.

For a long while he could not go to sleep, though his previous night in the police-station had been one of wakefulness. His hammock was comfortable, more comfortable than any bed he had ever slept on, and his prison-rug was warm; but the very comfort and warmth brought his mother to his mind—his mother and little Bess. What were they doing now? Were they shivering on their hard mattress, under their threadbare counterpane, which was all that was left to them to keep out the night's chill? Perhaps they were looking out for him. What day was it? Was it not Saturday to-day? And he had promised to be home on Saturday!

Oh, how different it would all have been if he had only escaped being caught! He would have been at home by this time; and they could have had a bit of fire in the grate, and something to make a feast of as they sat round it, while he told the story of his wanderings, and tried to describe all the rich, good folks who had been kind to him. Or if the magistrate had taken away all the money, and let him go home on his promise never to go begging again, even that would have been nothing to this trouble.

He fancied he could see his mother's face, pale yet smiling, as she listened to his danger, and his escape from it; and Bess, sitting on the floor, with shining eyes and clasped hands, hearkening eagerly to every word. Why had they sent him to jail? At last he sobbed himself to sleep; but all through the night might be heard, if there was any ear to hear, the heavy, deep-drawn sob of the boy's overwhelmed heart.

He was awakened early in the morning, and briefly told what he must do before quitting his cell. Then he ate his breakfast alone in the dreary solitude of the prison-walls, and the food almost choked him. It seemed to the boy, used to the wild, utter freedom of the streets, as if his very limbs were fettered, and that he could not move either hand or foot freely. His body did not seem to belong to himself any longer. He was neither hungry nor cold, as he might have been at home; but his head ached, and his heart was sore with thoughts of his mother. He was unutterably sick and sad. Cold and hunger were almost like familiar friends to him; but he did not know this faintness and heaviness, this numbness which kept him chained to the prison-seat, and made it appear an impossibility that a day or two ago he was rambling about as long as he pleased, and where he pleased, in the wide, free world, outside the prison-walls. Were there any boys like him still running and leaping and shouting out yonder in the autumn sunshine?

It was Sunday morning, and he was left longer than usual to himself. He was taken to the chapel, and sat in his place during the reading of the prayers and the sermon which followed; but not a word penetrated to his bewildered brain. It was much the same on the week-day when he went to school. He knew a little both of reading and writing, but he could not control his attention to make use of what he knew. He said the alphabet stupidly, and wrote his first copy of straight lines badly. He could not bring himself to think of these things. His mind was wandering sadly round the central thought that he was in jail, and what would become of his mother and little Bess without him.

SAMUEL'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 4. 1 Sam. 12:13-25. Golden Text, ver. 24. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A Panic in Israel—The King on the Farm—His First Regal Act—Popularity of the Victor—The Coronation Day—Samuel's Farewell—His Integrity Acknowledged — Rejected without Cause—A Blessed Reciprocity—Sin Brought Home—A New Covenant and a Warning—Confession Necessary—A Sign from Heaven—Samuel's New Office.

SAUL'S court at first was very small, probably only a little increase of his farm servants, and when Nahash the Ammonite had offered the most insulting terms of alliance with the men of Jabesh Gilead, and messengers brought the tidings to Gibeah of Saul, Saul was following the herd out of the fields (1 Sam. 11 : 5). The sad news from Jabesh Gilead had been proclaimed in the streets of Gibeah, and general consternation and sorrow prevailed. Had Saul stood upon his dignity, and remained inactively in the city, he would have heard the tidings sooner; but as the affairs of the kingdom were not yet fully placed in his hands, and he was not reigning by general consent, he occupied himself with farming, leaving God to bring about his full recognition as king. But political events could not but interest him deeply; he was the Lord's annointed; he marked the depression which was upon the people, and having learned the cause of it, "the Spirit of God came upon Saul when he heard those tidings, and his anger was kindled greatly."

Then occurred his

in the capacity of king; "he took a yoke of oxen, and hewed them in pieces, and sent them throughout all the coasts of Israel by the hands of messengers, saying, Whosoever cometh not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so shall it be done unto his oxen. And the fear of the Lord fell on the people, and they came out with one consent." How far Saul's spiritual life had prospered, whether he had continued to prophesy after the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and whether he now spoke under the influence of the Spirit, we are not told, but that he was now acting in accord with God's will is evident, because the fear of the Lord came upon the people, and three hundred and thirty thousand of them were gathered together. All this was done within seven days, the time of respite which the people of Jabesh had asked of the Ammonites; and the messengers returned with the glad message, "To-morrow, by that time the sun be hot, ye shall have help." Saul displayed a great deal of military talent on this occasion, so that the Ammonites were completely routed and discomfited.

This victory brought about a universally favorable impression of Saul; the people said to Samuel, "Who is he that said, Shall Saul reign over us? bring the men that we may put them to death." So quickly does public opinion turn, so intolerant is it! Saul, still "little in his own eyes," spoke with real wisdom; he said, "There shall not a man be put to death this day: for to-day the Lord hath wrought salvation in Israel." As long as Saul recognized the hand of God, all was well; as long as he acted under God, and did not take the command into his own hands, he was safe; right himself with God, he could be merciful and forbearing with man. Very often the state of our souls reflects itself upon our children, servants, and workmen; we reflect either God or ourselves upon them, according as we are living to Him or to ourselves; if we are irritable, discontented, discouraged, they will be affected by it; if we are happy, equally so.

Samuel took occasion of the present state of mind of the people to propose that they should go to Gilgal and renew the kingdom there. This was a kind of coronation day for Saul; "all the people went to Gilgal; and there they made Saul king before the Lord in Gilgal." As was the usual custom in times of rejoicing, "they sacrificed sacrifices of peace offerings before the Lord; and there Saul and all the men of Israel rejoiced greatly." But and His rejected prophet had not so much cause for rejoicing. Samuel had a few farewell words to speak at this time, in which he resigned his office as judge; he reminded the people that he had grown old among them and gray-headed, that he had walked before them from his childhood unto that day, and then he made a personal appeal to them, not so much to indicate his own integrity, as to be able to show them that as they had treated him, so they had treated God. He challenged them to bear witness against him whether he had taken ox or ass, whether he had defrauded or oppressed, whether he had taken any bribe to blind his eyes therewith, saying that he was ready to restore it. The testimony of the people was universal, "Thou hast not defrauded us, nor oppressed us, neither hast thou taken aught of any man's hand." Then Samuel called on them to declare that they took God and His anointed to be witness of what they said, "And they answered, He is witness." The prophet said no more on this point; it was fully proved that without cause they had rejected Him.

But the burden of his heart was their rejection of God. "It is the Lord," he said, "that advanced Moses and Aaron, and that brought your fathers up out of the land of Egypt. Now therefore stand still, that I may reason with you before the Lord of all the righteous acts of the Lord, which He did to you and to your fathers." A moment before he had called the Lord to be his Witness, now he stood as the one witness for the Lord. Blessed reciprocity between the Lord and those who trust in Him! Then the old man brought up the facts of past history to show that in every deliverance of His people it was the Lord who delivered them; when they cried unto Him in Egypt, the Lord sent Moses and Aaron, when they had forgotten their God and He had sold them into the hand of Sisera, and again they cried unto Him, the Lord sent Jerubbaal, Bedan, Jephthah and Samuel, "and delivered you out of the hand of your enemies on every side, and ye dwelled safe." God had been true, and Samuel had been true, but when Nahash came against them they wanted a king "when

THE LORD YOUR GOD WAS YOUR KING."

This was the sin which Samuel wanted to bring home to them, the preferring of another before their God. And yet Samuel did not lead them to despair. He showed them that, wrong as they had been, there was still before them the path of obedience; they could not undo what was done, they had succeeded in making the distance greater between them and God, but He had not therefore altogether rejected them. "If ye will fear the Lord, and serve Him, and obey His voice, and not rebel against the commandment of the Lord, then shall both ye and also the king that reigneth over you continue following the Lord your God; but if ye will not obey the voice of the Lord, but rebel against the commandment of the Lord, then shall the hand of the Lord be against you, as it was against your fathers." Oh, how full of love is our God! He is always ready to encourage those even who have been guilty of declension, and show them how they may yet serve Him! Satan accuses us, but blocks up every way of escape; the Lord deals faithfully with us about our sin, but He always shows us how we may return, and even be more blessed than before.

But it was necessary that the people should confess where they had been wrong; and in order to bring them to this point of confession, that they might recognize their sin, Samuel called upon them, "Now therefore stand and see this great thing, which the Lord will do before your eyes. Is it not wheat harvest to-day? I will call unto the Lord, and He shall send thunder and rain; that ye may perceive and see that your wickedness is great, which ye have done in the sight of the Lord, in asking you a king." Samuel knew he could count upon the Lord; he knew that with God as his witness, it was a small thing to ask that the elements should be brought into his service as the Lord's witness; he was sure of his answer before he prayed the Lord to send thunder and rain, and God did not fail him. That which love and faithfulness had failed to do, fear did in this case; "the people greatly feared the Lord and Samuel," and at last the words of confession were heard, "Pray for thy servants unto the Lord thy God, that we die not; for we have added unto all our sins this evil, to ask us a king." Now, and only now, could Samuel say unto them, "Fear not;" sin confessed leaves us in the condition to be forgiven and cleansed. "I said after she had done all these things, Turn thou unto Me." "Return, thou backsliding Israel, saith the Lord; and I will not cause Mine anger to fall upon you; for I am merciful, saith the Lord, and I will not keep anger forever.

ONLY ACKNOWLEDGE THINE INIQUITY"

(Jer. 3 : 7, 12, 13). The prophet said, "Fear not; ye have done all this wickedness, yet turn not aside from following the Lord." He showed that to turn aside would be "to go after vain things that cannot profit or deliver." What is the alternative, if discouragement drives us from God? To whom shall we go? A rebellious son will turn away from his parents to some stranger; but who shall profit us? or deliver us from everlasting death?" "For the Lord will not forsake His people;" there is no retaliation in God; Israel might reject Him, but God could not alter; His name was pledged, and for thatname's sake He would always receive them when they sought Him. And Samuel stood always on the same side as his God, "Moreover as for me, God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you; but I will teach you the good and the right way." Samuel was deposed from his position of power, but took up that of intercession and of teaching; he would not cease to be God's voice to them, although they rejected him as God's hand to govern them. Thus he called upon them to put the service of God before all else and to make it a heart matter, warning them that if they still did wickedly, both they and their king should be consumed.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

An Earthquake Causing a Great Loss of Life and serious damage to property occurred on Tuesday, October 16th, near Chios, the scene of the recent severe catastrophe of April 3d, 1881. Only a slight shock was on this occasion felt at Chios, but at Chesme on the coast of Asia Minor opposite Chios, the destruction was complete. The undulating wave extended along the entire coast of Anatolia and far into the interior of the western portion of Asia Minor. The first shock was felt at Smyrna about twenty minutes past seven in the morning. It lasted apparently only about the fourth part of a minute and was followed by three lesser shocks in quick succession, which seemed to be only of about half the duration of the first. With the first shock many dwelling houses came down. The damage was greatest on the lower slopes of the ancient Mount Pegasus, where the vibrations were much more severe than along the plain between the hill and the shore, where the Christians reside. All the villages between Chesmeh and Vouria were completely wrecked, and at least one thousand persons lost their lives by being buried under the falling walls of their dwellings. Some advices estimate the number of deaths at four thousand, but this calculation is doubtless an exaggeration. The Turkish Government issued an appeal for help in succoring the homeless people who escaped with their lives but lost their property. Its appeal states that they number twenty thousand. A tidal wave which rose to the distance of seven feet above high water mark followed the earthquake, doing much damage to the shipping.

The Franco-Chinese Difficulty is Unsolved. The French Government affect to regard the Chinese hostility as a matter of small importance, but it is evident that preparations for war on a large scale are being made in China. It is also an ominous fact that the Marquis Tseng, the Chinese Minister to the Western Powers, who has hitherto expressed his confidence in the peaceful ending of the negotiations, now speaks doubtfully. An American newspaper correspondent in Europe, commenting on the situation, says: "The treaty with the King of Annam causes grave disquiet in Paris. Annam has become a French province, and its defence is wholly guaranteed by the Republic. The suzerainty of China is abolished in Tonquin. Nothing prevents an attack on Sontay. France hopes that China will recognize these facts and come to terms, but there are no signs of surrender. On the other hand, China is preparing to blockade Canton. Dr. Harmand, the French Commissioner, estimates that it will cost France eight millions to hold the delta against China."

The Victory of the French over the Annamites at Hue is the subject of a despatch sent to the Paris Figaro by an officer in the French army who witnessed "the glorious victory." It appears to have been like a sportsman's battle in the woods, a cold-blooded butchery by monsters rather than war waged by civilized human beings. The city was set on fire and the French troops were placed within a fort commanding the only road by which the people, flying for their lives from the flames, could escape. He says: "We saw them halting at the end of the village with singed hair and garments. Then, after a few moments' hesitation, tucking up their flowing robes as high as they could and trying to protect their heads with planks against the impending shower of bullets, they rushed on. A great butchery then commenced. Two volleys were fired. It was quite a pleasure to see these fanlike streams of bullets sweeping down upon the fugitives. They were poured in twice in one minute at the word of command, and in a sure, methodical manner. It was like a jet from a huge watering pot, which mowed them down by dozens." A few tried to escape by plunging into the river and diving, but the same officer remarks: "Our men continued to kill them all the same when they came up to breathe like seals. The men then amused themselves counting the dead—fifty on the left, eighty to the right—about a thousand in all. In the village were small heaps. The sailors made bets as to the numbers destroyed. About nine in the morning all was over, and the rout of the Annamites was complete." After the victory the soldiers wandered about the city dragging terrified boys and men singly out of their hiding places, and while mocking their cries for mercy bayoneting them or clubbing them to death. The narrative would not have been credited had it not been written by a French officer.

The Trial of O'Donnell, who Followed Carey to Africa to kill him in self-defence, has been postponed at the request of his lawyers. The prisoner was brought into court, and in the jaunty, careless manner he has displayed throughout, entered the plea of "not guilty." General Roger A. Pryor, who has gone from New York to England to assist in his defence, was in court, but took no part in the proceedings. The plea on which the application for postponement was based was that a lawyer in Capetown had cabled that there were important witnesses there who could be called to testify in the case. Attorney-General James stated that he would not oppose the application for the postponement of the trial if the names of the witnesses were inserted in the affidavit, and the drift of the evidence to be given by them was indicated. It was decided to postpone the trial until November 21st. O'Donnell is well fed, but complains of his enforced abstinence from tobacco.

The Capture of the Chief of a Gang of Pirates, who operated off the Russian coast of the Black Sea, has led to some startling disclosures. The pirate succeeded in escaping from his captors but left behind letters and papers incriminating many merchants and officers in the Russian service. The New York Herald, whose correspondent cabled the news of the affair, says: "The method adopted by the pirates was to exhibit false signals, so as to lure vessels straight on to the dangerous reefs of the Tauranian coast. The crews were then left to perish on the rocks or murdered after the vessels had been pillaged and the pirates had helped themselves to what they needed. The cargoes were transferred to other vessels, placed at the disposal of the pirates by their silent partners at Kertch and elsewhere, and conveyed to Constantinople, Varna and Odessa, where they were sold in the open market."

A Convention of English Liberals Assembled in Leeds last week to consider and recommend to the government the measures most urgently needed by the country. A difference of opinion was revealed as to the relative importance of legislation to regulate the government of London, and that to extend the franchise in counties. After debate the latter was voted the more urgent of the two. At present citizens who live outside the towns, whose assessment by the poor law authorities is below sixty dollars a year, are not permitted to vote at county elections. At a public meeting held after the convention Mr. John Bright presided. He delivered an address in which he intimated that the Radical platform should include a plank affecting the House of Lords. He said: "There is one question which is not very remote, and which will have to be faced—namely, the constant conflict between the House of Lords and the House of Commons—a conflict full of peril to one of them, full of humiliation to both. The two Houses must be reconciled and be made equally responsive to the national wants."

The Condition of the Poor in England is being discussed in the press of that country. It has been aroused by the appearance of two pamphlets giving hideous pictures of the homes, the wants, and the vices of the English poor; and so much uneasiness is felt that even staid Liberal and cautious Conservative journals are seriously proposing semi-socialistic schemes for the relief of misery. The construction of artisans' dwellings by the State is a favorite expedient, and it is noteworthy that Lord Salisbury has approved this scheme in speeches. The London correspondent of the New York Sun, epitomizing an article by that statesman in a leading review, says the present age, we are told by his lordship, is out of joint, and is growing rapidly worse. "England was better when she had an autocratic monarch, an almost omnipotent aristocracy, a corrupt House of Commons, and rotten boroughs."

Opposition to Messrs. Moody and Sankey has been attempted in Ireland. In a cable despatch from Cork, dated October 18th, it is stated that rough characters have assembled in the evening outside of the hall in which Mr. Moody is holding revival meetings, and have attempted to interfere with them. The police have prevented any disturbance, and now guard the hall nightly. Mr. Moody's mission in Limerick was a success. The nationality of the evangelists should have insured them a welcome in any city in Ireland. It is strange that an American should need police protection from an Irish mob.

Evangelistic Work is Making Progress in France under the republic. Three evangelists are working among the peasants of Brittany, against great opposition from the priests, many of whom are from the lowest of the people. Among other methods of work, the preachers proclaim the Gospel at the great fairs, where many eagerly listen to the truth. A successful form of evangelization adopted there and in other parts of the country is the Bible-carriage movement. M. Pointet, in a vehicle suitably furnished with religious reading, has itinerated in not less than ten departments of the republic.

London Policemen are in Future to be Armed with revolvers. This decision has been forced on the city government by the desperate character of disturbers of the peace. The plan will at first be confined to the constables who perambulate the "outer circle," where the burglar is wont chiefly to carry on his unhallowed trade; whether it will subsequently be extended into the heart of London will depend on the success or failure which attends the experiment. The armed policeman is intended as an answer to the armed burglar; but it is a startling and significant revelation of the changes which have of late years passed over the criminal classes in the capital of England when it has become necessary to protect the lives of citizens by such a resource as this. If the English police commissioners have heeded the warnings furnished by the police reports on this side the Atlantic, they will, before furnishing revolvers to the policemen, make sure that they are sober men, and that they are not men who in cases of panic consider it their duty to fire promiscuously into a crowd of inoffensive citizens.

THE Rev. Thomas M'Cullagh, the newly-elected President of the British Wesleyan Conference, whose portrait appears this week on our front page, was born at New Inn, in the county of Galway, Ireland, in 1822, and is now sixty-one years of age. His father, Mr. Alexander M'Cullagh, was of Scotch descent, but settled at Loughnavagh, near Woodlawn, in the early part of the present century, and he retained his ancestral Protestantism among a Roman Catholic population. His wife was a Miss Rochfort, of Anglo-Norman descent, who resided in that locality. Soon after the birth of their son Thomas the family removed from New Inn to Loughnavah, which consisted of about a dozen scattered houses, while the parish church was some miles distant, and the clergyman was a notoriously worldly man. But there resided at Woodlawn, the seat of Lord Ashdown, Mr. John Trench and his family. A Sunday-school was established in the mansion, and under the guidance of Mrs. Trench and her daughters Thomas M'Cullagh and his sisters first received religious instruction.

Thomas received the elements of education in a good day-school near Woodlawn, established under the patronage of Lord Ashdown. Several years afterward he was removed to a school at Athlone, where he obtained instruction of a more advanced character. As a boy at Athlone, he exhibited a singular many illustrations of which might be given. A trivial circumstance in connection with boyish play showed of what stuff he was made. In a game with his school-fellows it fell to the lot of young Thomas's favorite top to be "pegged at" by the tops of the others. A lad of great dexterity in "splitting" tops took aim, when Thomas covered his own top with his hand and received the descending blow. The sharp iron entered his hand, and left a scar, which the President of the Conference still bears.

NARROW ESCAPE FROM DROWNING.

On another occasion he attempted—a mere lad of fifteen years of age—to swim across the broad mouth of a tributary to the Shannon, near where it empties itself into the sea—a feat which none but a very skilful swimmer should have undertaken. The passage across was successfully made; but on the return, the young Leander lost his presence of mind, and sank like a stone. An experienced diver happened to be upon the shore, and at once came to the rescue. Having raised the boy to the surface, he pushed him before him, until at length the bank was reached, and the young life saved. (See frontispiece.)

While at Athlone, where he had made considerable progress in his studies, he one day, quite accidentally as it then appeared, had an interview with a lieutenant of the Royal Engineers, engaged in making the Ordnance Survey in Ireland, who, discovering that the boy was an expert in Euclid, and in other branches of useful knowledge, offered to employ him in his division of the work. The offer was accepted, and he was engaged as an assistant surveyor, till he entered the ministry, in planning and drawing maps.

CONVERSION.

He was resident at Kilkenny in the year 1839, and while there he was invited by an acquaintance, a young man, to go with him to the Methodist chapel The preaching of the late Rev. Robert Huston had such an attraction for the young man that he became anxious about the salvation of his soul, and joined the class led by Mr. Thomas Little. While spending an evening with Mr. Huston and other friends at Mr. Little's house, prayer and religious entreaty occupied their attention, and that evening Thomas M'Cullagh, by simply trusting in Christ found the peace of mind which he was seeking. He gave his heart to God in his eighteenth year, and at once devoted his leisure hours to work in the Sunday-school, in prayer-meetings, and as an exhorter.

Soon after his conversion Thomas M'Cullagh was removed to Mallow, Cork County, where, acting as an exhorter, he ventured to exceed his commission, and took a text occasionally. His was preached at Ballyclough, in a private house, a few miles from Mallow.

His second attempt to preach was made in a small village near Mallow. On this occasion he was accompanied by a young fellow, a friend a few years older than himself, whose name was Talbot. After the little service the two set out to return to Mallow. The night was dark, and a blinding drizzle made matters worse.

At length a glimmer of light proceeded from a distance. They made for it, and found a house situated at a quadruple junction of roads. On inquiry they found that Mallow was fourteen miles distant. They could not be received for the night there, but were recommended to the

"WIDOW KEEFE'S."

A little fiddler, who had been playing tunes at this house for the peasants to dance to, volunteered to guide them. A light was burning in the cabin to which they were brought, which immediately was put out when their footsteps were heard. After much calling on their part, and whispering and hesitation inside, the door was opened and they were admitted. As they stepped in they stumbled against a living cow which blocked the doorway. (See frontispiece.)

They dried themselves by the turf fire, and then were shown to an inner room. Talbot, who entered first, reappeared declaring to his friend that he did not like the appearance of things and would not go to bed. Thomas went to see for himself, and beheld a low settle bed, out of which six heads were thrust—three at the head and three at the foot of the bed. The heads belonged to the widow's sons. Thomas, with his natural courage, at once suggested that they should get into the bed which was set apart for them, saying that all was right, and that they were in God's hands. This they did, and the young preacher was awakened in the morning by his companion, all washed and dressed, standing beside him and calling to him to get up. The widow provided a good breakfast of potatoes and fresh eggs and a noggin of milk, and at the conclusion of the repast would accept nothing in payment, saying that she would be "ashamed of herself to charge gintlemen who had lost their way." Knock-a-waddra was the name of this wild but hospitable region.

A MEMORABLE CONFERENCE SUNDAY.

When residing at Mallow, he went over to Cork, while the Conference was being held in that town, to spend "Conference Sunday." Here he heard the great Robert Newton, whose fame had penetrated even to obscure Irish villages. The celebrated preacher discoursed in the morning, in Patrick Street Chapel, on "Now are we the sons of God," etc. John Bowers, a man of less celebrity but still a distinguished preacher, preached in the evening on "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day," etc. This was a "high day" for the young exhorter. It is worthy of notice that though in popular estimation Robert Newton held by far the higher place, young M'Cullagh was fascinated more by the graceful and flowing oratory of Mr. Bowers. Mr. Bowers was a "memoriter" preacher, and paid great attention to elegance of composition, and this greatly delighted the youth, who had an ear for the rhythm of sentences.

Forty years afterward—in 1881—Thomas M'Cullagh again appeared in the same chapel, on this occasion as one of the appointed companions of the President, to represent the British Conference; and, strange to relate, at this same Conference of 1881 there was read the obituary of Robert Huston, under whose ministry the young lad in Mallow had been converted, and who had given him his "ticket on trial" for membership in the Methodist Society.

REMOVES TO ENGLAND.

When the Irish Survey was completed in 1841 Mr. M'Cullagh was transferred to the English Survey, and located at Skipton, Yorkshire. He carried with him a note of removal in which he was described as "an exhorter, and had even preached." Soon afterward he was invited to preach anniversary sermons at the village of Embsay, near Skipton. He was advertised as "from Ireland." The Baptists, Independents, and Primitives in the village gave up their services to hear a specimen of Irish oratory. On arriving at the chapel, he found the place crowded out, so that it was with the greatest difficulty that he could make his way to the pulpit. What a trial it was to the nerves of a man who had hitherto only exhorted behind a kitchen chair may be imagined. Thus he preached his first sermon from a pulpit, and in a chapel, and the success then inaugurated has not been on the decline now for more than forty years.

A CANDIDATE FOR THE MINISTRY.

In 1844, without offering himself as a candidate for the ministry, he was proposed, examined before the May district meeting at Huddersfield by the Rev. John Rigg (father of the Rev. Dr. Rigg), sent up to London to be examined in July, and, with fifty-six other candidates, he was accepted on probation by the Conference. Among his colleagues at that examination were the Revs. John W. Greeves, Josiah Pearson, Samuel Coley, John Dury Geden, Benjamin Hellier, John Walton, and William Morley Punshon. His "July Trial Sermon" was preached in the Brixton Hill Chapel before Jonathan Crowther. When the young men were before the senior ministers, Dr. Bunting, as often was the case, was very rough with them. Many a timid candidate was thoroughly cowed in spirit by the unnecessary severity of the "King of the preachers," and anticipated from it nothing but rejection. While M'Cullagh was speculating and fearing with the others in the Chapel Yard as to the result, during an interval in the examination James Osborn told him of the very favorable report sent in by Mr. Crowther on his sermon (which was on the Prodigal Son), and thus somewhat set his mind at rest.

FIRST CIRCUIT.

The Conference of 1845 appointed him to his first circuit, Workington, which comprised Cockermouth and Maryport, and where he found work enough to test his courage and patience. To the adjoining circuit of Whitehaven, William M. Punshon was sent to begin his ministry in Methodism, and the two young preachers formed a friendship ardent and lifelong. Mr. M'Cullagh, surviving his friend, preached a funeral sermon and wrote and published his recollections of their early friendship in a small volume. Occupying the first and second years of his probation at Workington, Mr. M'Cullagh spent the two concluding years of his probation at Hexham, where he had for one of his hearers a youth named Joseph Parker, now Dr. Parker, the minister of the City Temple in London and Chairman-elect of the Congregational Union. He was in 1849, and having married Isabella, daughter of Mr. Henry Hays, of Hexham, Mr. M'Cullagh removed to Shotley Bridge, Durham, where he remained three years.

It was at this time that the great agitation, known as the Reform Movement, was raging in Methodism, the secondary cause of which was the expulsion from the Conference and Connexion of Messrs. Everatt, Dunn, and Griffiths.

from the same human original. Nothing defaces, deforms, and imbrutes as sin does. What a mercy it is that sinners may be saved, cleansed, and transformed into fadeless beauty by the grace of Him who "sent His Son into the world, not to condemn the world, but that the world through Him might be saved."

Beware of the Serpent!—Bailie Dickson Said: "Those who have been saved from any degrading vice, such as drunkenness, should, if they desire to stand fast, be constantly on their guard, avoid old companions, shun the grog shop, and take every precaution against temptation. They should ever be on their guard against the old serpent, who is not dead, but is lying in wait to sting and kill them. A man whom I know, who was greatly given to drinking, was brought to Christ, and walked consistently and steadfastly for years. One day he was walking on the south side of the river, and while passing a saloon, a sudden and (to him in his own strength) irresistible temptation to enter and drink came on him. Forgetting the refuge open to all, he fell, and his fall was more grievous and deeper than ever before, but kind hands and hearts, moved and made successful by the love of Christ, went after him and he was reclaimed. 'Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall.'"

THE LAODICEAN AGE.

By Rev. J. R. Graves, LL.D.*

The Symbolical Name—Its Significance—Their Sin Laxity and Indifference—Fatal Worldly Prosperity—Expensive Churches the Product of Pride—Pride in the Ministry—False Liberalism—Persecution Needed—The Coming Tribulation.

THE Laodicean Church is symbolical of the last period; and the terms used to describe its character are symbolic of the general condition of the churches of the period covered by the symbol. The very name selected (Rev. 3: 14–22) to symbolize the period is significant. It is compounded of two Greek words, laos, the people, and, dike, judgment, and indicates, that, in this age, the people or nations will be judged; and it may very properly be called the Judgment Age.

Mark the peculiar address to this church, and what may be implied in it. It is from "the faithful and true Witness," thus reminding them of the mission to which He had appointed them, "ye shall be witnesses unto Me," which, at the close, would be fulfilled in them. Not only the opening address, but the closing promise, indicates the severe trial through which, at last, they had to pass to their thrones and crowns.

He does not charge this church, as He did others, with unsoundness touching vital doctrine, but with a sinful both as to their faith and practice; a tepidness and milk-warm sentimentality, that was nauseating; an easy accommodating themselves to influences around them, that was more sinful than even positive coldness with respect to the truth committed to them. They had become rich in their own estimation, having "need of nothing," boastful, self-sufficient and arrogant, when He who sees the heart saw they were miserably "poor, blind and naked." Yet, notwithstanding all this, He gives them the assurance that He loves them, and the proof of it in that He rebuked and chastened them; for whom God loves, He does not let alone.

Now let us look for the application of this Symbol. The Laodicean Church state embraces a period extending from the Philadelphian state until the Second Advent. There are good and sufficient reasons to place its commencement about A.D. 1776, when the church in Europe and America ceased to suffer from the civil rulers the vigorous persecutions that had followed it onward from the days of John the Baptist. From this period the churches multiplied, and, their substance no longer distrained for "fines and penalties," they commenced to rapidly increase in "this world's goods"—on account of their great numbers and wealth they began to be esteemed respectable, and treated with consideration, by those who had persecuted and shed their blood. In turn, the witnesses of Christ began to weaken in the boldness and faithfulness of their testimony against the heresies and Antichristian position the sects occupied toward the kingdom of Christ, and in this way, with thief-like stealthiness, a false liberalism stole in upon the churches which had fruited into full affiliation with manifest heresies in their organized forms, and fellowship with the teachers of those heresies by public association with them.

Notice again the charges brought against the churches of this period, not because they had departed from or renounced any vital, fundamental doctrine of Christ, but their sinful indifference, nauseating tepidness and lukewarmness with respect to all that pertain to the honor and cause of their Divine Master. They had not only become indifferent in the defence of the faith delivered to them, but lukewarm in their opposition to the destructive errors that threatened the corruption and very existence of His Truth. But more than this, the churches of this period had become, in their own estimation, "rich and increased in goods"—had become more than self-complacent, even boastful, saying, we "have need of nothing." The goods and riches in this passage are symbolic, and represent a species different from themselves, i.e., its numbers, its social influence, the number and the talents of its ministry, its activities and ability to accomplish desired results, and

ITS RESPECTABILITY.

Now all this is true of the churches of Christ in this age as it never has been since Christ established His church on earth.

We, as a people, have vastly increased in numbers—over two millions of adult members in America alone; and we are continually boasting of this sort of wealth. But how poor in a really regenerated and truly spiritual membership we may be, the one who walks amid the golden candlesticks alone knows, and He pronounces us miserably "poor." Doubtless there never was so large a proportion of our membership unregenerated as it is to-day, and becoming yearly more so. We were never before possessed of so much material wealth. Cathedral-like temples for worship, costing from $50,000 to hundreds of thousands, are seen in our larger cities and more populous towns. These are the monuments of our pride rather than of our piety; for in them are buried, as in the earth, the talents the Lord committed to His disciples to put into active employment for the conversion of the heathen, and the extension of His kingdom until He comes. It was not until the churches became corrupted, not until piety lapsed into pride, that costly houses were built. While the apostles lived, only the plainest edifices were provided for public worship, and indeed few churches owned the houses they worshipped in—Paul had no meeting house in Rome, and he nowhere exhorted the brethren to build one.

We have, as a people, now a high social position on account of our wealth, intelligence and refinement, and of this we are proud and boastful, and it has become a cross we feel quite unable to bear, to sacrifice all this by a faithful advocacy and defence of the doctrine of Christ, so unpopular and hateful to the world and false religionists.

We have already become

and boast of their number, their talents and power, but the thoughtful observe with saddened hearts that as they become eminent and popular, the temptation to "save their lives," i.e., enhance their personal influence and popularity, to win the favor of men and to gain or retain rank with educated teachers of the popular religious errors of the day, is far too strong with most, and they are influenced to affiliate with them, and thus acknowledge them before the world as their equals in all things that constitute true ministers of Christ. Thus they surrender every inch of ground upon which to stand to protest against their errors, and, as witnesses, their voices are effectually hushed, and they lose their moral courage and sink down into indifference with respect to the maintenance of all the principles that distinguish us from the adherents of false doctrine.

CHRISTIAN LIBERALITY.

We may not shut our eyes to the painful truth; spiritual declension and religious indifference, wide-spread, inveterate and increasing, characterize the churches of this period, and furnish indubitable proof to us that we have progressed very far into the Laodicean church period. Where only a score of years ago there was, in comparison to the present, an ardor of life, a zeal for, and devotion to, the distinguishing principles and doctrines of Christ, and a cheerful liberality in giving to extend the cause, there is to-day almost the absence of life manifested; and, as to warmth, only a little less than the coldness of death.

Ministers and public teachers are held up as models of piety who ignore ecclesiasticism altogether, and consider one religious organization equal to another, however unscriptural in its form, or heretical in its doctrine, and freely cooperates in religious meetings. This is called Christian liberality, and a "catholic spirit;" but it is a sickly and sinful sentimentalism.

If this state of things is allowed to continue, what must the end be? Evidently this spacious liberalism and indifference, if left to grow, will work the extinction of true Christianity. But the Master will not let those He loves alone, He will rebuke and chastise them into dutiful obedience. He has been for years past raising up within His churches a body of witnesses to plead for the maintenance of our principles, and to rebuke those who would approve, fellowship, and affiliate with the teachers of acknowledged heresies, and while, as yet, these are lukewarm when compared with the faithful witnesses and martyrs of old, yet there is pleasing evidence that the tone of their protest has yearly acquired depth and strength and boldness.

The statement of the 19th verse—"As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten: be zealous therefore and repent"—seems to us pregnant with meaning. He cannot recover His church from its sinful lukewarmness by letting it alone—He must rebuke and chasten it. In this message, by the angel of the church, He administers a severe rebuke, and He may rebuke them instrumentally by the agency of the faithful witnesses He is raising up in their midst, to protest against their indifference and sinful inconsistencies, while He foreshadows the fact that He has chastisements in store for them.

The fires of persecution by which His martyr church was kept purified must be rekindled, the persecuting power He has restrained for a season, while His church has grown rich and degenerate, must be let loose to chastise them until they will be awakened out of their state of apathy and indifference. It may be necessary, in order to recall them to their senses, for those self-same organizations with which they "have lived deliciously" to shed their blood and waste them, as they did in former ages. They will then be made to see and feel the true character of these organizations, i.e., that they are opposed to the true churches, as they are to the truth of Christ.

PERSECUTIONS YET AWAIT

the churches of Christ, which, in comparison to those of the past, are denominated by the Holy Spirit, "The Great Tribulation," and only those who are able to pass through it, and triumphantly overcome, will be allowed to sit down with Christ on His throne. The Laodicean church state, then, closes with Christ being at the door and knocking.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Presidential Proclamation of Thanksgiving Day has been issued, appointing November 29th for the purpose. In the course of the proclamation, the President says: "The year which is drawing to an end has been replete with evidences of Divine goodness. The prevalence of health, the fulness of the harvests, the stability of peace and order, the growth of fraternal feeling, the spread of intelligence and learning, the continued enjoyment of civil and religious liberty—all these and countless other blessings are cause for reverent rejoicing. I do, therefore, recommend that on the day above appointed the people rest from their accustomed labors, and, meeting in their several places of worship, express their devout gratitude to God that He hath dealt so bountifully with this nation, and pray that His grace and favor abide with it forever."

The Annual Report of First Assistant Postmaster-General Hatton was published last week, and affords much interesting information, indicating the rapid growth and development of the country. The whole number of post-offices on June 30th, 1883, when the fiscal year closed, was 47,863, an increase of 1632 during the year. The increase in the six New England States was 36; in the Middle States and the District of Columbia, 223; in the Southern States and Indian Territory, 725; in the ten States and six Territories of the West and North-west, 580, and on the Pacific slope, 68. Pennsylvania has the largest number of post-offices of any of the States, the number being 3716. New York followed with 3088, and Ohio was third on the list, with 2680. The largest increase in the number of post-offices in any one of the States and Territories during the year was in Dakota, the number being 172. Mr. Hatton recommends a reduction in the local delivery rate to one cent, and suggests that a special service should be organized for the night delivery of letters on which an extra stamp is affixed for urgency. From the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's report we learn that the mileage was 77,998,782, and the cost $4,739,478. The increase in mileage for 1883 over 1880 is 1,927,787 miles, and the decrease in cost of 1883, compared with 1880, $2,582,021.

Commissioner Hiram Price of the Indian Bureau, in submitting to Secretary Teller his annual report, says that among the things needed to secure success and efficiency in solving what is called the Indian problem are: An appropriation to survey the out-boundaries of Indian reservations. A law for the punishment of persons who furnish arms or ammunition to Indians. More liberal appropriations for Indian police. An appropriation of money sufficient to defray the expense of detecting and prosecuting persons who furnish liquor to Indians. He reports that the number of Indian pupils, exclusive of the five civilized tribes, enrolled at boarding schools during the year just closed is 5145, an increase of 654 over last year. The attendance on the day schools has been 5014, an increase of 748 over the preceding year. Of the 5143 boarding pupils, 4396 have attended schools on reservations or in their immediate vicinity, 641 have been enrolled at Hampton, Carlisle and Forest Grove, and 106 have been placed in various schools in the States.

The Project of Erecting a National Monument to President Garfield is taking definite shape. The trustees of the Garfield National Monument Association have invited an international competition, open to all artists, for a design for a monument in honor of the late President Garfield. For the design possessing the highest merit $1000 will be paid; for the second, $750, and for the third, $500. The monument is not to exceed in cost when completed the sum of $150,000. It will be erected in Lake View Cemetery, Cleveland, on a commanding eminence. The monument is to be of granite of approved quality and color, with emblems and statuary of bronze.

The Startling Increase in the Number of divorces in Illinois, Connecticut, and other States, is paralleled by the statistics of divorce in New York State, now published. These show that within three years there has been a large increase of divorces, amounting to nearly fifty per cent of the number granted in 1880. In that year they aggregated 218; in 1881, 253; in 1882, 316, and in eight months of 1883, 215, while from the number of applications now on file, it is probable that by the end of this year the last figure will be swelled to over 400, or nearly twice as many as were ever granted in any year previous to 1879.

The Approaching Luther Celebration is the subject of an address to the churches issued by the American branch of the Evangelical Alliance. In the course of the address the following suggestions are made: "As the 10th of November falls this year on Saturday, the Alliance would respectfully suggest that meetings be held on that day where convenient, and pastors are respectfully invited on the following Lord's Day, November 11th, to bring before the people in sermons or other addresses the value and blessings of the Reformation and of those quickening doctrines of life and of duty to which it reawakened the world."

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the State of New York, which held its annual convention in Poughkeepsie recently, resolved to petition the Legislature to require in every school supported by public money instruction in physiology and hygiene, with special reference to the effects of alcoholic stimulants and narcotics upon the human system. Such a law has already been secured in Vermont, Michigan, and New Hampshire.

The Week of Prayer for Young Men Commences Sunday, November 11th. This week of prayer will be observed throughout the world, by arrangement through the medium of the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association. Mr. Cephas Brainerd, the chairman of the committee, in his letter requesting us to make the announcement in these columns, gives some remarkable statistics of the progress of the Young Men's Christian Association's work. The number of associations in various countries is now over 2400. The International Committee of the United States and the Dominion of Canada reports statistics for 1883 of 737 associations, of which 679 have an aggregate membership of 52,376. Special efforts on behalf of the 60,000 college students, the 100,000 commercial travellers, the 500,000 German-speaking young men, the 500,000 colored young men and the 1,000,000 railroad men of North America are made by the International Committee with gratifying results. One hundred and seventy college associations are in operation, and the railroad corporations have shown their appreciation of the railroad associations during the past year by contributing over $75,000 to their support.

Assistant-Bishop Potter's Sermon in Prison was the first sermon after his consecration on October 20th. It was preached in the Penitentiary on Blackwell's Island on October 21st. The contrast between the magnificent service of Saturday and the simple service amid gloomy surroundings on Sunday was sufficiently marked. The bishop, however, said that he was glad to so commence his episcopal labors. His sermon, remarkable for its extreme simplicity, was appropriate to his congregation, many of whom wore fetters. Its burden was the willingness of God to receive and forgive the vilest sinners who truly repent and believe in Jesus. The congregation, though so different in dress and culture from that which throngs Grace Church, listened to Bishop Potter quite as attentively and with considerable emotion.

Mr. E. W. Oakes, whose Successful Work among young men at the Bowery branch of the Young Men's Christian Association in New York is well known, has resigned his position to commence work in the West. He is to be ordained next Sunday at Calvary Baptist Church, New York, by Dr. MacArthur, and will depart the following day for his new sphere of labor. He has accepted the charge of a vacant church at South Pueblo, Cal., which he hopes by the blessing of God to make a centre of mission work in the locality. Mr. Oakes by his intense earnestness and remarkable talent in dealing with young men has made a large circle of friends here who sincerely regret his departure, and pray that he may be still more signally blessed in the West.

Successful Revival Services have been Held at several towns in Wisconsin during the past month by Rev. George K. Little, of York, Pa. From a communication sent us by the Rev. N. G. Whitney we learn that the results of God's blessing on the services have been remarkable. In one small town one hundred persons professed saving conversion, and the religious life of the churches was quickened and strengthened. A strong Gospel temperance movement was also inaugurated.

Mr. W. Forbes, of London, England, has just closed a ten days' mission at Brockville, Canada, under the auspices of the Canadian Evangelization Society. The attendance and interest increased daily. Ministers of different denominations assisted. Among many earnest workers were Judge Macdonald and Mr. Edmund Reynolds, barristers. At the urgent request of Mrs. Pringle (wife of Judge Pringle), Mr. Forbes has also visited Cornwall, Ontario, and conducted a series of successful Gospel temperance meetings. Letters for Mr. Forbes may be sent to the office of this paper or to the Young Men's Christian Association, Chicago.

Mr. Jacob Freshman, the Missionary to the Jews, has commenced holding services in Room 24 of Cooper Union, New York. A friend of the movement has come forward, offering to pay the rent of the hall for a year. Mr. Freshman says: "The Lord is leading us as He led Israel of old. As we step into the waters, the waters divide. I came back with strong faith that God would help us; as soon as the services were opened the Lord sent help in that way." Progress is being made with the building fund. Mr. Freshman says: "We are looking at a house valued at $20,000. We can get it for $18,000. The gentleman wants $5000 down, and the rest at low interest. Toward the $5000 we have $2000 in hand, including $1000 contributed by the late William E. Dodge. We want $3000. We are holding prayer-meetings, and pleading with God to send us that amount."

A Rich Find of Gold is Described in the California journals. They state that one of the most valuable strikes known in the mining history of California was made at the Neville or Mammoth Mine, about three miles south of Amador, lately. A pocket of quartz of almost unparalleled richness was found less than 100 feet from the surface, in which was contained from $75,000 to $100,000, and being about two tons in quantity. Much of this might justly be termed huge chunks of gold, instead of gold-bearing quartz. Some of the immense pieces of almost solid gold were about as heavy as a man could easily lift from the ground. This gold is almost black, and the richest find of gold of the kind ever known in the United States at one single time. Treasure of such value moves men to envy the fortunate possessors, yet eternal treasure of a value with which this California find cannot compare is offered freely and not accepted (Job 28 : 17).

Fast Asleep in a Drifting Boat, a Woman was found on October 20th off Perth Amboy, N. J. One of the Lehigh Valley boats was passing down the narrows when the crew observed a rowboat without oars drifting out to sea with the tide. They steered for it and picked it up. To their amazement they found in the boat a woman lying fast asleep. When she was awakened she was horrified to learn the danger to which she had been exposed. She said that she and her husband were about to go out for a row and she had entered the boat, when it was found that the oars had been taken out, and she stayed while her husband went to procure some. She supposed the boat to have been secured, and must have fallen asleep while waiting for her husband's return, and did not perceive that the boat had begun to drift. How many people there are whose spiritual state is like that experience. Fast asleep while the boat of their lives is drifting out to the great ocean of eternity (Eph. 5 : 14).

A Woman Tempted and Betrayed by her husband was arraigned in a New York court last week. A dry-goods firm have for a long time missed goods from one of the departments, without being able to detect the thief. A neatly-dressed, lady-like saleslady in the department was the only person there who had not at one time or other been under suspicion. Her modest, quiet manner and her close attention to business diverted suspicion. But last week the firm received an anonymous letter, disclosing the fact that this particular saleslady was the thief, and stating where the goods had been sold. The saleslady was then arrested and at once identified the letter as being in her husband's handwriting. He had by threats and blows forced her to steal to support him in idleness, and when she refused to steal for him any longer he betrayed her to her employers. The reports characterize the man's conduct as "devilish malignity." The epithet in this case is more appropriate than it generally is. Those who serve Satan invariably find that he deceives and betrays them (John 8 : 44).

A Prisoner in a Southern Prison, who Refused to attend a religious service held there by a sea-captain whose ship touched at the port, was attracted toward the meeting, but would not enter. He stood, however, outside the door listening. The blessing of God on what he heard led to his conversion. The captain who conducted the service and who related the incident last week at a meeting in New York had the happiness of directing him to the Saviour in personal conversation. He learned that the prisoner had been committed to prison on the complaint of his wife. He was a slave to strong drink, and for eleven years had led his wife a terrible life. He had stolen trinkets, little worth in themselves, but valued for their associations, and sold them for rum. Such at last was his conduct that the broken-hearted woman was compelled to seek protection, and with her husband in prison, and her children in an asylum, her desolation seemed complete. She was a Christian woman, and for the eleven years of her husband's evil ways she had prayed to God for his salvation. The man at the conclusion of his term in prison went home, and is now a sober man laboring honorably for the support of his family.

A Thrilling Ride by Moonlight was Taken by a gentleman connected with the Sierra Lumber Company in California on October 15th. He started, just as the moon rose, to go down the flume in a box, and entered the gorge of the Cañon when it was high overhead. Below all was Egyptian darkness, but above a streak of light could be seen, and occasionally an open space would be passed, through which the moon would shed a peculiar light across the rushing waters in the flume. It was at one of these openings that the traveller's nerves were sorely strained, as he looked ahead and saw what appeared to be a jam or break in the flume. To jump out was to go down into the cañon's depths, to remain was perhaps to be dashed to pieces. On he came, nearer and nearer. He determined to risk the jam or break, whichever it was, with his nerves braced for the shock. But as he reached the spot, to his great relief, the scene changed, and what looked like a break in the flume was only the moonlight shadowed by the overhanging trees. Such an experience the Christian has sometimes to pass through on his spiritual journey. At times there appears certain disaster before him, but putting his faith in God he goes on to find that the danger existed only in his imagination (Ps. 55 : 5, 16).
